The second main point on which Signor Morelli dwells, in regard to the method to be followed in these studies, is on the necessity of a deliberate analysis, in order to discriminate between the work of different nearly allied masters, of certain purely formal elements in their styles. The number of signs by which a practised critic in any given case forms his judgment on the authorship or the genuineness of a work of art is very great: nor is he, in the act of judgment, apt to analyse or take account of the value of such signs singly. He decides by the total impression he receives from the work before him. To that impression his sense of its spiritual and intellectual stamp and aim, his perception of its tricks of composition, choice of types, gestures, expressions, forms, colours, fashions of drapery, of its mode of handling, and mastery or infirmity of execution, all contribute. Signor Morelli's contention is that among these elements are some which can be with justice and advantage systematically analysed and formulated for the guidance of the student. The points of style on which he especially dwells, as being fixed and constant in the work of any given master, at least during given periods of his career, are, in addition to those of a more general kind, the shapes and characters which he habitually affects for particular portions of the human body, and in especial the hands and feet and their attachments, the eye, and the ear. Certain it is that every artist with a style of his own does show a predilection for certain constant and special forms, apparently without regard to the individual model before him, in these particulars. It is upon the observation and analysis of such points—in other words, upon the discipline which the Germans call stylistik—taken together with the scanty critical indications furnished by the texts of ancient authors, that the scientific study of ancient classical art has been almost entirely founded. For the study of mediæval and Renaissance art a similar discipline is doubtless also serviceable; but, like other methods, it is principally of use in skilled hands. It will hardly make a connoisseur of the man who does not by nature and practice possess the power of spontaneous artistic appreciation, of judging aright, that is, empirically and without analysis. On the other hand, as is abundantly illustrated in the course of the book before us, even to the best of connoisseurs such an analytic method may be of much use in enabling him both to show to others the reasons of his decisions, and to decide for himself in ambiguous cases between masters of nearly-allied tendencies.

We have left ourselves hardly space to speak of the criticisms of particular painters and pictures which occupy the bulk of Signor Morelli's volume. Not a few of these have been accepted with acclamation by all competent students; as for instance the identification of the neglected "Venus" at Dresden as the true original by Giorgione, formerly in the house of Jeronimo Marcello at Venice; the attribution to the same master of the "Madonna and Saints," ascribed to Pordenone, at Madrid; and even the rejection from among the authentic works of Correggio of the famous "Reading Magdalene" at Dresden. This daring and at the same time convincing piece of negative criticism is conveyed in a humorous dialogue of much spirit between the imaginary Russian investigator and a young German lady of æsthetic propensities, Fräulein Elise von Blasewitz. Our author is doubtless right when he classes this seductive work among others of a generation long posterior to Correggio, and defines the class in general as representing "nothing but the Venus of the Venetians translated into the language of the Jesuits." But we incline to think both that he over-states his case against the probability of any painter of Correggio's age having painted on copper at all, as this Magdalene is painted, and that he goes too far afield when he seeks for the authorship of that picture in, or not far from, the workshop of Adrian Van der Werff. When it comes to the delicate matters of discrimination between individual Italian workers of the same school, as, for instance, between the several Milanese followers of Leonardo, or between the elder Palma, the first Bonifazio, and Titian at a certain period of his life, Signor Morelli's strict methods of analysis come in aid of his fine taste and long experience, to render his judgments almost unimpeachable. The same qualities stand him in still better stead in his criticism of the Umbrian school. Perugino and several of his assistants and pupils in that school worked, as is well known, in styles so closely similar as to render their discrimination often excessively difficult. One of these pupils and assistants was the young Raphael; and the power of Raphael's name has led posterity to attribute to his hand work of this school and period both greater in quantity and other in quality than any which in strictness, and according to the standard of his known and authentic performances, has any right to be ascribed to him. It is Signor Morelli's merit to have brought to bear an accurate and masterly analysis on this mass of material, and to have shown how several of the pictures and many of the drawings given in carelessness or fondness to Raphael have to be redistributed among his associates, of whom the neglected and decried Pinturicchio receives the chief share. This is the most contested, but also, in our judgment, the most valuable, portion of Signor Morelli's work. It is unfortunate that writers of the reputation of Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle should since its appearance have published a volume on the Early Life of Raphael, in which they not only ignore the labours of this distinguished Italian critic, but bring confusion worse confounded upon the whole subject, exhibiting in particular a scarcely even rudimentary power of critical insight as to that on which its treatment chiefly depends—the character and authenticity of drawings. Against the laborious and ingenious untrustworthiness of the work of Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle, as we pointed out at the time of its publication, it is right that the student should be emphatically warned. It is needless to say that in so doing we do not recommend him to follow the lead of Signor Morelli or of any other teacher blindfold. But the reader who, on the other hand, follows this writer with his eyes open, testing his methods and examining his conclusions as he goes, will assuredly not fail, whether where he dissents and where he is convinced, to experience at every page the scholar's truest pleasure—the pleasure of recognizing a master.

AIRS FROM ARCADY AND ELSEWHERE.*

STUDENTS of American magazines must often have read with pleasure the gay and amusing verses of Mr. H. C. Bunner. In the field of Mr. Dobson and Mr. Frederick Locker, Mr. Bunner is not the chief American poet. He comes distinctly after the author of "Elsie Venner" and the author of "The Heathen Chinee." Mr. Bret Harte and Dr. Holmes are di majorum gentium; but Mr. Bunner, to our mind, of all the tuneful Transatlantic choir, is nearest to these famous writers. In Airs from Arcady we miss a certain "Chant Royal," written, we believe, by Mr. Bunner, and with a refrain "Behold the deeds that are done of Mrs. Jones." This was a truly American "Chant Royal"; and contained a most humorous sketch, rather rough in handling, of life in the class of clerks and dwellers in cheap boarding-houses. This poem we have vainly sought in Airs from Arcady. Perhaps Mr. Bunner thinks it too rude and reckless a companion for verses in a daintier style. His prettily-printed volume is divided into sections headed "Arcadia," "Philistia," "Bohemia," "Elsewhere," and "Ultima Thule." These names will give a general idea of the character of the verses under each heading. For Arcadia and all its ways we feel as Villon felt about Franc Gontier. Mr. Bunner scarcely seems to us a rural or a classical poet; not even the Dresden china district of Arcadia is quite the native country of his soul. His refrains "Across the World to Arcady" and the like suggest a refrain of Mr. George Simcox's, in a poem which Mr. Bunner very probably never read, but which lingers in the ears of him who has once heard it. The following example of Mr. Bunner's Arcadian lay is pretty, at all events, and tuneful:—

> Ah, woe is me, through all my days
> Wisdom and wealth I both have got,
> And fame and name, and great men's praise;
> But Love, ah, Love! I have it not.
> There was a time, when life was new—
> But far away, and half forgot—
> I only know her eyes were blue;
> But Love—I fear I knew it not.
> We did not wed, for lack of gold,
> And she is dead, and I am old.
> All things have come since then to me,
> Save Love, ah, Love! and Arcady.

Indeed, on second, or rather third, thoughts, and after a third reading, we think better than we did of Mr. Bunner's opening piece; he, too, may say, et ego in Arcadia. But no number of readings reconcile us to some jarring consonants in a rondel, "O! Honey of Hymettus Hill."

In "Philistia" the first piece, "Da Capo," is conventional, like its subject, and its metre, a favourite with Mr. Bunner, the metre of "Dolores" applied to light topics:—

> 'Tis a commonplace, stale situation,
> Now the curtain comes down from above
> On the end of our little flirtation—
> A travesty romance; for Love,
> If he climbed in disguise to your lattice,
> Fell dead of the first kisses' pain:
> But one thing is left us now; that is—
> Begin it again.

How are we to scan the fourth line? In a later stanza we cannot away with "my hand" rhyming to "sigh, and"—a very unusual liberty for an American citizen to take with the aspirate. "Just a Love Letter" might have been written by Mr. Dobson, if Mr. Dobson had been a child of New York; it is fluent and smart, with a touch of regret. On the other hand, "Candor" is American through and through, and a complete success in its vein. Unluckily all of it must be quoted if justice is to be done to "Candor," so he who would enjoy it must secure a copy of Airs from Arcady, or induce some publisher to bring out the volume in England. The same remarks apply to "Accepted," a truly frank and native account of an American wooing in Philistia.

In "Bohemia" Mr. Bunner begins with a triolet, wherein he breaks the rules, serving two faults, so to speak. It is a pity, for, if formally faultless, this triolet would have been a pretty specimen. In triolets, ballades, and the like we must have the rigour of the game, so justly insisted on by Sarah Battle. "Betrothed" contains an extremely powerful situation, not very clearly presented. To tell the honest truth, we cannot make out whether the speaker in the poem is in thoroughly bad company or not. He speaks of "Nancy Lee o' Nights," whose case should certainly be "Jenny's case," but other passages do not give quite the same impression. In "Elsewhere," the best thing is a "School Romance," throwing rather a lurid light on the premature passions of American school-children. "Home, Sweet Home, with variations," contains parodies of Mr. Swinburne, of Mr. Whitman, Mr. Bret Harte, and of Mr. Dobson's way of turning a Horatian ode into a rondeau. The ideas in the Swinburnian ode are very comic; Bret Harte is too like himself in this mirror, so is Mr. Whitman; but Horace, we are sure, never could have had a friend called "Nomades"—"At home, alone, O Nomades"—and yet Mr. Bunner does not seem to be addressing a multitude of wanderers, nor speaking in Greek to several gentlemen named Numa.

Some of the verses in "Ultima Thule" are melancholy variations on "Once you have come to forty year." It is a terrible period for a lonely person whose digestion does not permit his "dipping his nose in the Gascon wine." Mr. Bunner also salutes the old flag on Evacuation Day as a loyal American should, the old flag being, of course, the new flag, not the "sanguinary banner of Albion," as the Irish leader-writer said, before the editor changed it to "The bloody British flag." Yes, we scuttled out, and our heart cannot beat as one with Mr. Bunner's on Evacuation Day. Unluckily we have nothing corresponding to Evacuation Day, no famous final victory over our late colonists. When the revenge does come, poets will not be wanting to answer Mr. Bunner as Alfred de Musset answered the German lyrist. We must fall back on the chorus:—

> Brave Brooke, he waved his sword,
> Crying, "Now, my lads, aboard!
> And we'll stop their playing Yankee > Doodle Dandy, oh!"

But his readers will not at all desire to stop Mr. Bunner's graceful variations on the national air. He is best when he is most American. His sonnet to Salvini, by the way, should not be allowed to pass without its meed of praise.

COURT CUSTOMS.*

MR. WILLIAM JONES has assumed the mantle of the late John Timbs. This is the third of his compilations which has been published, and in several ways it is the best. The book on finger-rings was very careless in many respects, and the book on credulity was only a shade better. The present volume is superior to its predecessors. It is more accurate, more carefully pieced together, and has better references—one point in which Mr. Jones's work is superior to Mr. Timbs's. Mrs. Armytage's book is not inferior in the other particulars, but she gives very few references. As illustrations, there are two views of palaces from old prints, but the engravers' names do not appear. There are also views of a Court ball, "on Her Majesty's birth-night," we are told; but it is evidently a hundred years old at least. The view of Windsor is Buck's, made in the reign of George II. Mr. Jones has a number of small woodcuts in his text, and, though they are not very well done, they illustrate his meaning sufficiently. Both authors begin with Egypt, of course; and here Mrs. Armytage has the advantage of Mr. Jones, for she confines herself to saying, "What pomp and state surrounded the ancient monarchs of Egypt we know, and how strict the etiquette of their royal households; where each servant had his appointed office—the cupbearer, the chief server, the bodyguard of the king—may all be traced, even in reading the Old Testament history." It is clear that Mrs. Armytage's knowledge of the Court customs of ancient Egypt goes no further than what can be learned from the Bible, and she proceeds in the same paragraph to speak of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. It would have been well for Mr. Jones if he had been as reticent where he was as ignorant. But he gives us a long note on the authority of Diodorus, of which it can only be said that it is absolutely without value, historically or archæologically. Further on we have another quotation from Diodorus, this time to tell us that "the Egyptian Pharaohs decorated their crowns with figures of lions, bulls, and serpents, branches of trees, and representations of flames of fire, to inspire fear in the beholders." That any one sitting down seriously to compose or compile a chapter on crowns should choose such rubbish as this, while hundreds of common modern books exist in which the costumes of Egyptian kings are described, is simply amazing, the more so that, not perceiving the incompatibility of the two accounts, he makes a long quotation from Sir Gardner Wilkinson a few pages further on relating to the double crown or pshent. The white crown was "more commonly called the atef crown," we are informed. What is the force of "more commonly" in this sentence? Apparently Mr. Jones wishes to imply that though the Egyptians sometimes spoke in English, they "more commonly' spoke in their native tongue.

If we want to find faults, however, we need not be at much trouble with either book. There are fewer errors in Mrs. Armytage's volume than in Mr. Jones's, for one reason because the lady has restricted herself to 266 pages of large type, while Mr. Jones uses small type and runs to upwards of 500 pages. It is more pleasant, however, to go through both compilations, and see what they have to tell us—if they have anything—and not to expect either strict accuracy or too much caution in the selection of authorities. Mrs. Armytage overflows with loyalty. "If," she modestly observes in the preface, "in recalling the old services rendered so heartily by our ancestors, a fresh spark of enthusiasm for old customs and ceremonies surrounding the English Court is rekindled, a small work will have a great reward." With this object in view, Mrs. Armytage of course avoids any carping at sinecures, and confines herself as much as possible to what is pleasing and picturesque. Thus, in the second chapter we have all about the royal offering of gold and frankincense and myrrh still made annually on the Feast of the Epiphany in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. While the offertory sentences are being read, two of the Chamberlain's officers bring up three purses and lay them in the alms-dish. "Up to within a few years these purses contained gold in the leaf, frankincense, and myrrh; they were placed inside a round box covered with crimson silk." The offerings are now made only in purses, and for the gold leaf thirty gold sovereigns are substituted. There are three chapters on coronations, one on baptisms, one on marriages, and one on funerals. After these, and others on progresses, receptions, and balls, we have an account of the ceremonial of the present Court, with a list of the most important posts in the household, and an enumeration of the duties of each official. Thus we learn that the Equerries are included in the department of the Master of the Horse, and that the first, or "Crown Equerry," is the really active agent of the Master—the permanent official, we must suppose, since he lives at the gate of the royal stables at Buckingham Palace, and holds his office for life. Mrs. Armytage does not give any details about a "harbinger." Among the Court officials his name is omitted. Perhaps there is no harbinger now. But if so, we should have been told when and why he was abolished. It cannot have been very long ago, for in one of the Royal Chapels there is a window to the memory of a harbinger who served Queen Victoria. The remainder of the book gives us the etiquette of drawing-rooms, levées, and State balls, and a skeleton account of the orders of knighthood, followed by a history of the royal palaces which is of no use or value, being merely an outline. On the whole, it may safely be said of Mrs. Armytage's book, that it fulfils its not very ambitious aim, and will serve for a book of reference to many matters of no great importance, truly, but which many people want to know.

Mr. Jones's book is more comprehensive. There is very little left untouched in the History of Regalia. First there is a chapter on ancient crowns, to which we have already made some reference. Next we have treatises on the crowns of England, the regalia, the coronation chair and the Kingston stone, the Court of Claims, the coronation processions and the coronations, the oath, the anointing, omens and incidents, and two or three miscellaneous chapters on various subjects relating to royalty, including an account of the escape of Louis Philippe in 1848, when Mr. Jones, who happened to be then English Vice-Consul at Havre, was largely concerned with the Consul, Mr. Featherstonhaugh, in managing to get "Mr. William Smith" and "Mme. Lebrun" on board a steam-packet. One of the most interesting passages is the account of the Championship. It seems to be extinct, at least the Dymokes are extinct. But the owner of Scrivelsby will probably be held entitled to the office should he claim it. In 1877 a suit of armour which had belonged to the last champion was sold at Christie's, and was bought, it was understood, for the Queen; at whose coronation, however, "owing to the economy of the Whigs, the champion was not called upon to perform any official duty." Mr. Jones's notes on foreign crowns and coronations are often very interesting, especially as he can never resist the temptation to repeat an anecdote, however remotely connected with his subject. The late Sir Salar Jung's visit to Notre Dame in 1867 comes in because he saw the coronation robes of Napoleon I. But if the date is correctly given, the Indian statesman's reflection loses its meaning. He was much struck, says Mr. Jones, with the remark made by the official who showed him the robe, to the effect that this was the robe "which the Emperor Napoleon IV., at present in England, will wear when he comes over to his coronation." On this the Indian observed, "One must never say this or that will occur, nor call any one king who cannot dwell in his own country"; and Mr. Jones goes on to describe the remark as "an almost prophetic saying in connexion with the fate of the unfortunate young Prince Imperial." The whole story is extremely puzzling. In August 1867, Napoleon III. was on his throne, the Prince Imperial was a boy of eleven, and no Napoleon that we can recall was in England, though some Bonaparte prince may have been paying us a visit. It is evident that we must not place too much reliance on Mr. Jones's facts and dates; and that, if we have occasion to quote him at all, it will be necessary to verify his statements. The present King of Burmah, we are told, for example, succeeded to the throne thirty years ago. The latest "coronation of French monarchs took place in 1825," says Mr. Jones. He tells the long and curious legend of the stone of Scone, and the true history which can be traced as far as the reign of King Kenneth, who removed it to Scone in 834. The Kingston stone is almost as old, for Athelstan was crowned on it in 924, and it is likely that, since other and older kings were crowned at Kingston, the same stone was used. Of the iron crown of Lombardy we have also a full account. It consists of a broad circle composed of six equal plates of beaten gold, joined together by close hinges of the same metal. Each plate is jewelled and enamelled. Within is the iron band which gives it a name. It is about three-eighths of an inch broad and a tenth of an inch thick, "and is said to have been made out of the nails used at the Crucifixion, and given to Constantine by his mother, the Empress Helena, to protect him in battle." Mr. Jones quotes Dr. Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities at some length to give the true as well as the legendary history of the relic, from which it appears that the iron ring is not mentioned before 1175. The whole crown, which is very Byzantine in appearance, is only six inches wide, and was probably intended at first as a votive offering to be hung over the altar. Mr. Jones's pages, on the whole, may be recommended as a pleasant compilation from all sources, good and bad, and very fit for the reading of people who do not care for historical accuracy or original research.

PETER THE GREAT.*

MR. SCHUYLER begins his history of Peter the Great, or, as he modestly styles it, his "Study of Historical Biography," with an excellent account of Russia as it was during the reign of Peter's father, the Tsar Alexis Mikhailovitch. From it some notion may be derived of the immense difficulties with which the future Transformer of Russia was destined to contend. As a general rule, much may be conceded to those opponents of hero-worship who depreciate individual influence, referring all great changes to the gradual growth of ideas, and reducing men who have been credited with swaying the world's destinies to the rank of mere representatives of the spirit of their age. But Peter the Great, in his civilizing capacity, represented no sentiment, no desire or aspiration, prevalent either in the narrow circle in which he was brought up, or in the Russian world outside the precincts of the Court. In the course of time, no doubt, the influence of Western Europe must have affected Russia, even if Peter had been as incapable of initiating a sweeping reform as his royal half-brothers, the valetudinarian Theodore and the physically and mentally feeble Ivan. But the gigantic changes which Peter brought about were distinctly due to his own untiring energy and invincible will. Had it not been for his arrival, Russia might have long slumbered on, lapped in that Oriental indolence which is so dear to the Russian mind. It was his quickening spirit that first inspired the new life by which the country has been animated since his accession to the throne. It is true that a Russian adage asserts that Peter only created a body; it was Catherine II. who breathed into it a soul. But this is merely an exaggerated way of saying that what one monarch of genius conceived, another developed and matured.

The leading facts of Peter's life have long been made familiar to all the world. Even Mr. Schuyler's exceptional acquaintance with what has been of late years written upon the subject in Russia has not enabled him to throw much new light upon the Russian monarch's travels and campaigns. Those important episodes in Peter's career are described at great length, and the accounts given of them are well worthy of being attentively studied. But the portions of the present work which are certain to be most novel to English readers are those which deal with Peter's internal policy, with the reforms which he inaugurated, the methods whereby he overcame the resistance with which they met, and the results to which they gave rise. In describing these Mr. Schuyler has had the great advantage of being able to refer to the rich stores of material which have been of late years collected and examined by Russian compilers and historians, but which are unfortunately of no use to students unfamiliar with the Russian language. Except through the medium of occasional translations, Western readers have few opportunities of benefiting by the immense mass of information contained in such Russian periodicals as the "Russian Archives" and the "Russian Antiquities," not to speak of the numerous valuable articles contributed by Russian scholars to magazines less exclusively devoted to the past. The existence of the historical periodicals we have mentioned shows how great a desire exists among the cultured classes of Russia to investigate the history of their country, and, if they are debarred from criticizing the policy of their present Government, to discuss that of the rulers of olden days. To them the changes introduced by Peter offer much more than a merely antiquarian interest. The fight which Peter fought was, to a great extent, the same as that which is now being carried on in Russia by the advocates of progress against the partisans of the retrograde party. The reforming Tsar was in many respects the typical Zapadnik, or "Westerner," against whom the reactionists of the present day are most embittered. The stubborn resistance offered by those well-meaning obstructives to the introduction of such institutions as flourish in the whole of Western Europe, if it serves no other good purpose, at least enables us to form an idea of the opposing forces against which Peter contended, and which he in most instances overcame.

Mr. Schuyler draws a gloomy picture of the effect of Peter's successes on the great mass of his subjects. On them many and bitter hardships were inflicted by the measures which conduced to the Tsar's glory and the extension of his Empire, but the tale of their woes has seldom been considered worthy the attention of historians. One of Peter's decrees, issued in 1713, begins with the words:—"The Tsar, pitying the people of his realm, zealous to root out unjust, disastrous, general burdens, and crafty thefts from the State Treasury, having ascertained that great falsifications and thefts are increasing the public burdens and injuring the interests of the State, and that by this many people of every station, but most of all the peasants, are becoming impoverished and ruined," &c. But, as Mr. Schuyler says, the Tsar really knew very little of the sufferings of his people. No mouthpiece then existed by means of which their cry could be uttered loud enough to reach his ears. The amount of money extracted from the Russian nation by the Government was, in 1725, more than three times as large as it had been in 1709. At the end of Peter's reign the regular army, which could scarcely be said to exist at its beginning, numbered 210,000 men, and the fleet, entirely his creation, consisted of as many as 48 ships of the line and 800 smaller vessels, manned by 28,000 men. In order to defray the expenditure rendered necessary by Peter's enlarged views, the existing taxes were greatly increased, and fresh impositions were laid upon everything susceptible of taxation. Not only upon battle-fields, but on every spot which the restless energy of Peter improved, the lives of the common people were recklessly sacrificed. To die fighting against heretics and infidels may not have seemed a needless hardship to men inspired by the loyalty and devotion which characterize the Russian peasant; but even the most stolid villager must have objected to being torn from his home, and compelled to labour like a convict till his strength failed, and there was nothing left for him but to lie down and die. The building of St. Petersburg, says Mr. Schuyler, the construction of the fortresses, the digging of canals, and the opening of harbours, "cost the lives of hundreds of thousands of men." In order to escape from the oppression of the tax-gatherers, whole village communities ran away to the frontiers, or hid in the woods. But this only made matters worse for those who remained, on whom a poll-tax was levied, amounting to 114 kopecks on the Crown and Church peasants, the small peasant proprietors, and the inhabitants of the Ukraine—an impoition which led to the strengthening of the bonds of serfage. Up till 1719 there had always existed a legal distinction between household slaves and serfs or peasants attached to the soil; but in that year a census was decreed, the result of which was that all the peasants were inscribed indiscriminately on the census lists as serfs, and they thenceforth became the absolute property of the landed proprietors, who were made responsible for the payment of the poll-tax and the furnishing of recruits. It is true that a decree was issued in 1721 by which the sale of serfs apart from land was forbidden, except in case of absolute necessity; but the effect of a prohibition thus qualified was scarcely perceptible. As Mr. Schuyler says, "The real history of the Russian people at this time is only to be found in the archives of the Secret Tribunal of Preobrashénsky and in the memoirs or traditions of the Dissenters in the North and East." The patience of the oppressed people was accepted as a matter of course by most of the Russians of the day, but it aroused the wonder of foreigners, one of whom wrote, in a ciphered despatch, to the Elector of Hanover, "Everything in this realm will have a fearful end, because the sighs of so many million souls against the Tsar rise to heaven, and the glowing sparks of rage concealed in every man lack nothing but a fair wind and a conductor."

In some instances the conservative spirit of the peasantry proved too strong for the ardent reformer. His attempt to civilize his subjects by forcing them to sacrifice their beards and to change their manner of dress resulted in an utter failure, so far as the masses were concerned. Peter regarded the beard as a symbol of barbarism, so he decreed that all Russians should either shave or pay a yearly tax, amounting in the case of persons of means to a considerable amount. The aristocratic and official classes were obliged to submit, and Mr. Schuyler tells us that until the accession of Alexander II. shaving was compulsory in the public service. After that time the rule became practically relaxed, but "it was only in the year 1875 that a decree was issued permitting the officers and soldiers of the army, except the Imperial Guard, to wear their beards when on service." The innovation introduced by Peter was no trivial matter in a country in which an edict had been issued by the Patriarch, only a few years before, against all who were so unholy and heretical as to shave their beards, "an ornament given by God, and which had been worn by all the holy prophets and apostles, and by the Saviour himself." The Dissenters objected quite as forcibly as the Patriarch to the use of the razor, and the attempt to introduce it was one of the causes which led to their rapid increase. Peter was not of an intolerant disposition in religious matters, and in some instances he treated the "Old Believers" with judicious mildness. A number of refugees had formed a Dissenting community on the Vyga, where they erected a monastery defended by earthworks and cannon. Hearing that the Tsar on his way from Archangel to the Gulf of Finland would pass their way, they were greatly alarmed. But "when the Tsar was told that Dissenters were living on the Vyga, all he said was, 'Let them live as they like.'" At another time, when he was organizing ironworks in the Olonetz forests, he asked whether there were any good smiths among the neighbouring Dissenters, adding, "If there are, then let them believe what they will; for if reason cannot turn them from their superstition, neither fire nor sword can do it. It is foolish to make them martyrs. They are unworthy of the honour, and would not in this way be of use to the State." Unfortunately, the Old Believers were generally regarded in a very different spirit, and under the influence of harsh measures their fanaticism became intensified. "Books, pictures, relics, loaves of holy bread were sent from one community to the other, with an organization which was almost as perfect as that of the Government itself. From thousands the Dissenters became hundreds of thousands, if not millions." As a specimen of the views entertained by these fanatics with regard to the Tsar and his reforms, Mr. Schuyler quotes part of an old manuscript from the Solovetsky Monastery, preserved at Kazan. After alluding to "the falling away from the holy faith by the Tsar Alexis in the year 666 [1666]," the writer proceeds to identify Peter with Antichrist, declaring that "he was consecrated to the throne of all the Russias by the Jewish laws from head to foot, showing that he is the false Messiah and the false Christ"; that in the year 1700 "he called together a heathenish Court and erected a temple to the heathen god Janus"; and that "in the year 1721 he took upon himself the Patriarchal title, calling himself Father of the country, Head of the Russian Church, and Autocrat, having no one on an equality with himself, taking craftily to himself not only the power of the Tsar, but also the authority of God, and claiming to be an autocratic pastor, a headless head over all opponents of Christ, Anti-Christ." How widely similar feelings of dissatisfaction were spread may be seen by the extracts Mr. Schuyler has made from the records of the secret tribunal of Preobrazhénsky, which tell how one peasant was punished for having exclaimed while speaking of Peter, "Since God has sent him to be Tsar we have no happy days. The village is weighed down with furnishing rubles and half-rubles, and horses and carts, and there is no rest for us peasants"; and another for saying, "If he lives long he will ruin all of us. I am astonished that people have not put him out of the way before now"; and how many other unfortunate expressers of "unseemly" ideas with regard to the reforming monarch were tortured and executed. The anxiety naturally produced by the existence of this widely spread mass of dangerous discontent explains, though it by no means fully excuses, Peter's harsh treatment of his unfortunate son, the Tsarevitch Alexis, whose sad story furnishes the theme for some of the most interesting chapters of Mr. Schuyler's excellent work.

THE POEMS OF GOETHE.*

IT is very much easier to point out the inadequacy of even a good rendering of a foreign poet, than to translate any one of his poems in a tolerable manner; and yet the critic is almost instinctively inclined to dwell upon the faults rather than the merits of such a volume as the one at present before us. It is not the malignity which is the badge of all our tribe that prompts this unkindness. If a dozen landscape-painters were to make a study of the same piece of wood or moorland, all their pictures would be different; the features of the scene, which were most prominent in the one might be entirely wanting in the others. In the same way every reader takes an especial delight in certain peculiarities of his favourite author. He thinks these characteristic; in translating he himself would endeavour to preserve them at whatever cost of other beauties, and he naturally applies the same test to any translation that falls into his hands. Besides this, he misses all that is inevitably wanting; he under-estimates what is done, since it brings him nothing new, and so he is inclined to judge harshly. We must confess that we have been subject to this temptation while reading Mr. Gibson's book, and though we have resisted the devil, he has not entirely fled from us. Still, even the most severe critic, with "the spirit that denies" at his elbow, must allow that a task of great difficulty has here been executed with a considerable amount of success.

The volume, it is true, cannot be classed with D. G. Rossetti's Dante and his Circle, which is indispensable even to Italian students, and in which many passages are commentaries as well as translations. But it makes no claim to such a position. It is intended for lovers of poetry who are ignorant of German, and by such it ought to be warmly welcomed. Many of the pieces deserve what Mr. Gibson tells us he considers the highest praise; "they do not read like translations," and it is long since a collection of poems, either original or translated, has appeared which is so full of deep thought and poetical feeling as this. Yet in some respects it is not quite satisfactory.

Heine thought that Goethe's claim to be numbered among the great poets of the world must rest rather on his shorter lyrics than his more ambitious work, and there is much truth, as well as exaggeration, in the remark. The Germans are a nation of song-writers; but we must go back to the time of Walter von der Vogelweide if we wish to find any one who can be compared to Goethe in his mastery over lyrical verse. Other poets succeed occasionally or in a single manner; he constantly and in all. But he is greatest when he seems bent only on giving expression to the thought and feeling of the moment. He then employs the simplest of language and metrical forms; he avoids brilliant imagery; he refrains from everything that can startle the imagination or surprise attention; and yet it is then that his treatment becomes most subtle and his charm perfect. Such pieces present almost insurmountable difficulties to the translator, and it is in rendering them that Mr. Gibson seems to us to be least happy. We will not dwell on mistranslations such as that on page 49, where

> Trägt er eine goldene Kett' am Hals, > Trägt er einen strohernen Hut appears as

> He wears a golden chain at his neck,
> And a straw hat he doth wear;

whereas both text and context clearly show the meaning to be "whether he wear a golden chain on his neck or [only] a hat of straw." Such slips are very rare; but the charm has vanished from many verses which are rendered with scrupulous accuracy. We are at a loss to understand why Mr. Gibson attempted the "Modern Amadis" (p. 78), since he has omitted poems that are both easier and more important; and this is perhaps the most untranslatable piece in the German language. Its effect in the original depends entirely on its highly artificial form of verse and on tricks of diction. The former is only imperfectly followed; the latter could not be reproduced. Goethe here glances back upon the dreams of his childhood with a half-mournful smile. It is a mood we all know. It was very foolish, but at the same time very pleasant, to imagine oneself a Fairy Prince, the Beast with whom Beauty was in love, or even Jack the Giant-Killer. We feel the unreality of the dream, and yet we almost wish we could dream it over again. The German poet reproduces this double feeling by making use of a number of words which, though stilted and un-German, were common enough in the fairy tales with which his youth was fed, such as obligeant, galant, emaillirt, and by introducing such childlike expressions as "Ach! ich liebte fast mich todt"; while, on the other hand, he breaks into single passages of perfectly natural and sincere emotion. The poem is a masterpiece in its own little way; but no one would guess this from the English version. It is the least satisfactory piece in the volume; but there are others from which a great part of the poetry seems to have escaped, though some still remains. The lines "To the Moon" (p. 143) are fine even in their English dress; but when we remember how much pains Goethe expended upon them from the day when he sent the first rough draft to Frau von Stein, we cannot help wishing that some passages had been more adequately rendered.

Still even in this line Mr. Gibson can do excellent work. The following song, for instance, is nobly, though not faultlessly, translated:—

> At midnight, when I crept, not very willing,
> A small, small boy, through churchyard calm and cool,
> To father's house, the curate's; light was thrilling
> In star on star till all was beautiful;
> At noon of night.
>
> When, further, as life widened out before me, > Drawn to the one beloved, the war I viewed
> Of Northern lights and constellations o'er me,
> I, coming, going, breathed beatitude;
> At noon of night.
>
> And now, as beams of the full moon, with lustre,
> Lucid and lovely, throng the dark profound,
> My thoughts spontaneous coruscate and cluster,
> Around the past, around the future, wound;
> At noon of night.

There are many other songs in the volume which are fully equal to this. If space permitted, we would willingly quote the lines "To Christel" (p. 82) and "To Belinda" (p. 123), not only on account of their beauty, but as examples of the poet's different manners. Still, while by no means undervaluing what the translator has done for the songs, we think he is happier in treating the reflective poems. Here the thought is more tangible, and the measures, though apparently more involved, are in fact more easy to catch. It is, however, in the narrative pieces that Mr. Gibson's skill is exhibited to the greatest advantage, and here his success is almost complete. It is vain to hope that either "The Bride of Corinth" or "The God and the Bayadere" will ever be placed before English readers in a more adequate way.

The poems which are cast in an antique mould present almost insuperable difficulties to the English translator. If, in spite of the conversation which Goethe had with Eckermann on the 25th of February, 1824, he were to render them into any but the original form of verse, he would certainly show more courage than discretion, and yet that form of verse cannot be reproduced in English. Even German elegiacs are by no means satisfactory to ears that have been trained by a study of the ancients; and Goethe never attained to such a mastery, at least over the hexameter, as Count Platen possessed and Wolff once displayed in a passage translated from Homer. Still in German the measure can be followed even by those who have not received a classical education, and it has obvious advantages. The very fact that it is not in strict accordance with the genius of the language lends it a foreign freedom and antique dignity. It possesses much of the virtue of marble, which, as Wilhelm von Humboldt said, "is in itself a dress"; and so the poet who uses it may freely treat of matters which would seem trivial, or even offensive, if they were brought before us in a more familiar guise. But in order to secure this advantage only the simplest words and forms of expression must be used. As soon as an elevated diction is employed the charm is broken. The stranger is only allowed to speak so plainly because he gives himself no airs, and never even tries to make a point. Now in English all simple and familiar language is apt to fall into monosyllables, and with these it is impossible to mark the march of hexameter and pentameter clearly enough to make it obvious to the untrained ear. Mr. Gibson in his rendering of the idyls has therefore attempted a task in which complete success was unattainable, but he has approached it very closely at times; and it is certainly better that the English reader should make the acquaintance of such a poem as "Alexis and Dora" in a somewhat imperfect form than that he should remain ignorant of it altogether. This, indeed, is true of the whole volume. When compared with the originals, many of the songs may seem rather wanting in grace and charm, and the critic who estimated Goethe only by means of this rendering would assign him a place among the lyrical poets considerably lower than that which he really occupies; but, when compared with other translations, even the least satisfactory of Mr. Gibson's work is worthy of considerable praise.

MARIA EDGEWORTH.*

In preparing the life of her father for publication in 1821 it was inevitable that Miss Edgeworth should unconsciously interweave with her narrative a considerable thread of autobiography, for few lives are so indissolubly connected as were those of Richard Lovell Edgeworth and his daughter. Again, the literary chronicles of the time reveal to us at recurrent intervals vivid glimpses of one who, as Byron said, was "the exhibition of 1813, as I had been the lion of 1812." But Maria Edgeworth survived her father for more than thirty years, preserving her intellectual vitality to the very confines of a long and active life. Of this second period of her career she left no autobiographic account, and until about a year ago, when an American lady produced a biography of some merit, there was nothing that could be called a Life of her. Miss Helen Zimmern, though her book is somewhat briefer than Mrs. Oliver's, has by no means merely "followed her leader," and has been able to justify herself as a biographical cook by collecting a mass of material so copious and varied as to make her task easy and her work original. She has had access to an unpublished memoir of Maria Edgeworth by her latest step-mother, once Miss Beaufort, who was her junior, and in whose arms she died. Miss Zimmern has also been allowed to examine and make extracts from a large number of Miss Edgeworth's private letters, so that she has been enabled to put forth at last what is really an authentic biography of the author of Castle Rackrent. We must commend the modest limits within which she has confined what she had to say. A little duodecimo of 219 pages is quite large enough to contain the outlines of so uneventful a life.

The passages which Miss Zimmern quotes from the unpublished letters of Maria Edgeworth are very interesting, as proving that her peculiar felicity of style, her little sparkling way of saying things, was not adopted for the sake of attracting the public, but was so native to her that she could not speak or write in any other way. Indeed, we are inclined to think that the letters are brighter and more genuine than the books, or than most of them. Miss Zimmern reveals the fact that the burden which her energetic and exacting father laid upon her intellect was even heavier than we had been led to suspect. He started her upon her literary way, and he thought himself justified to the last in patching up her sentences, expanding her ideas, and meddling in all her intellectual concerns. As early as 1780, when Maria was thirteen, her father seems to have laid his commands upon her to compose a story. He wrote to her at school:—"I beg that you will send me a tale, about the length of a Spectator, upon the subject of GENEROSITY." Dutiful as she always was, his daughter forthwith set about writing her story, which was submitted to Mr. Sneyd, the disciple of Rousseau and friend of the author of Sandford and Merton. Under these auspices the talent of Maria Edgeworth was very properly nurtured; and there is no doubt that "Generosity" contained the germ of all the didactic and realistic novels of the Edgeworthstown school. Mr. Sneyd was favourably, indeed enthusiastically, impressed. "An excellent story," he said, "and extremely well written; but where is the Generosity?" This first tale has not been preserved; and Miss Zimmern tells us that all the account Maria Edgeworth could afterwards give of it was that there was a sentence in it in which a saddle, a man, and his horse were inextricably confused.

* Maria Edgeworth. By Helen Zimmern. London: Allen & Co.

It is very interesting, by the help of this new biography, to observe how completely Maria Edgeworth was shackled by her respect and admiration for her father during all the early part of her life. The critic, in fact, is almost disposed to abandon any attempt of separating the daughter from the father; for, when she was at length divided from him by death, his habits of mind and his imaginative standards remained hers. There was, however, a much more baleful influence shed over her youth than that of her father. He desired her to write and to publish, although always on his lines; but that singular character Thomas Day, whose Sandford and Merton had been placed before her as an impeccable model, held strong views in prejudice of female authorship, and retarded the development of Maria Edgeworth's ambitions by reiterated warnings addressed to her father, with whom he had great influence. Miss Zimmern thinks that she would never have published as long as he was alive; and it certainly is a significant fact that, although various projects were set on foot, it was not until after Mr. Day's tragical death in 1789 that she set about preparing The Parent's Assistant and Early Lessons for the press. Her first publication, however, was Letters to Literary Ladies, in 1795, issued when she was in her twenty-ninth year. In these, knowing what we now know about Mr. Day's arguments and denunciations, we may see the conscientious mind of Maria Edgeworth clearing away with the besom of her staid intelligence the cobwebs of Mr. Day's impracticable prejudice. It is indeed stated that great part of the Letters to Literary Ladies is neither more nor less than a jotting down of the arguments which her father and his friend were accustomed to bring forward on the subject of female education. Her next book, The Parent's Assistant, in 1796, had even less of her untrammelled self in it. Miss Zimmern tells us that it was all written on a slate in the first instance, and subjected to criticism and ruthless alteration from her father. He, indeed, gave it its name, not the curiously infelicitous one which it now bears, which was due to the unaided genius of her publisher, but the slightly less offensive one of The Parent's Friend. Mr. Edgeworth, however, was not content with criticism; he was eager to enjoy the pleasures of joint authorship, and the next book which issued from Edgeworthstown bore the names of Richard Lovell and Maria Edgeworth upon its title-page. From this time forth, although in her dutiful affection she never suspected it, her father became an old man of the sea to her genius. Practical Education, which we have just referred to, appeared in 1798, and was a text-book of that rigid and humanitarian system of training which Mr. Edgeworth had imbibed from the writings of Rousseau, and from which Maria, by a happy combination of accidents, was the only one of his children who had the happiness to escape.

We are not, however, left to guess how Maria Edgeworth would have written if she had been left in her early years to her own devices, nor what her share really was in what Sydney Smith called "the firm of Edgeworth & Co." There is one of her books to which we can point as being unalloyed by the views or the style of her father. This is Castle Rackrent, which we have Mrs. Barbauld's authority for saying was written and published without any interference from Richard Lovell Edgeworth. It is a strange instance of parental egotism that so clever a man as Mr. Edgeworth should not have perceived, in the face of such a sparkling masterpiece as Castle Rackrent, in which there literally is not a dull page from the beginning to the end, that this was not a talent with which he and his pedantries could interfere with advantage, and that his only decorous position was that of an admirer and encourager. No such suspicion ever crossed his mind, and two years afterwards he blandly mingled his base metal with her fine silver in the Essay on Irish Bulls.

We have dwelt on this feature because we are anxious to point out that in the charming passages here printed from Miss Edgeworth's letters this rare and unalloyed style, the style of Castle Rackrent, is always present. They appear to us to be some of the most picturesque, the most easy and graceful, the most witty letters which we have read for a long time. When Maria Edgeworth visited France in 1802, making a preliminary tour through England on the way, she sent home a series of letters which seem, from Miss Zimmern's extracts, to be a string of pearls. As an instance chosen from many, we quote an account of a visit to a précieuse ridicule at Leicester, a Miss Watts, who had presented a volume of her poems to the Edgeworth family, and to whom they were so kind as to offer to pay their respects.

> When we had dined [Maria Edgeworth says] we set out with our enthusiastic bookseller. We were shown by the light of a lanthorn along a very narrow passage, between high walls, to the door of a decent-looking house; a maid-servant, candle in hand, received us. "Be pleased, ladies, to walk upstairs." A neatish room, nothing extraordinary in it except the inhabitants—Mrs. Watts, a tall, black-eyed, prim, dragon-looking woman in the background; Miss Watts, a tall young lady in white, fresh colour, fair, thin, oval face, rather pretty. The moment Mrs. Edgeworth entered, Miss Watts, taking her for the authoress, darted forward with arms, long thin arms, outstretched to their utmost swing. "Oh, what an honour this is!" each word and syllable rising in tone till the last reached a scream. Instead of embracing my mother, as her first action threatened, she started back to the further end of the room, which was not light enough to show her attitude distinctly, but it seemed to be intended to express the receding of awe-struck admiration—stopped by the wall. Charlotte and I passed by unnoticed, and seated ourselves by the old lady's desire. . . . Miss Watts was all ecstasy and lifting up of hands and eyes, speaking always in that loud shrill theatrical tone with which a puppet-master supplies his puppets. I all the time sat like a mouse. My father asked, "Which of these ladies, madam, do you think is your sister-authoress?" "I am no physiognomist"—in a screech—"but I do imagine that to be the lady," bowing as she sat almost to the ground, and pointing to Mrs. Edgeworth. "No, guess again." "Then that must be she," bowing to Charlotte. "No." "Then this lady," looking forward to see what sort of an animal I was, for she had never seen me till this instant. To make me some amends, she now drew her chair close to me, and began to pour forth praises; "Lady Delacour, oh! Letters for Literary Ladies, oh!"

When the party arrived in Paris they were at once received into the best society, their relationship with the Abbé Edgeworth being close enough to be piquant to what remained of the noblesse, and yet distant enough not seriously to endanger their safety. It is true that they suddenly received notice to quit France in January 1803, but Mr. Edgeworth went at once to Passy with Maria, and clearly explained to Bonaparte that he was not, as had been stated, the brother of the friend of Louis XVI. Meanwhile, Maria sent back to Ireland sketches of all the interesting people they met, extracts from which, all too brief for our curiosity, are here given. A vignette of a meeting between La Harpe, Mme. Recamier, and Miss Edgeworth is too charming not to be quoted here. It would make a capital subject for Mr. Marcus Stone to paint:—

> La Harpe lives in a wretched house, and we went up dirty stairs through dirty passages, where I wondered how fine ladies' trains and noses could go; and were received in a dark, small den by the philosopher, or rather Dévot, for he spurns the name of philosopher. He was in a dirty reddish night-gown, and very dirty night-cap bound round the forehead with a superlatively dirty chocolate-coloured ribbon. Mme. Recamier, the beautiful, the elegant, robed in white satin, trimmed with white fur, seated herself on the elbow of his armchair, and besought him to repeat his verses.

But of all these interiors the most curious and picturesque is that which paints Mme. de Genlis in her den at the Arsenal, grim, spiteful, neglected, yet brilliant and fascinating still. This is far too long to quote; it occupies six pages of small print in Miss Zimmern's memoir, but we have no hesitation in saying that it is the gem of the volume, and a genuine addition to our literature. This is the real Miss Edgeworth, the Miss Edgeworth of Castle Rackrent, at her best.

At Paris, it seems, Miss Maria went through the one little romantic episode of her life. She had a prim, tremulous love affair with a splendid Swedish baron. Miss Zimmern, who tells the story very prettily, does not seem to have attempted to find out who this M. Edelcrantz was who fell in love with her heroine. It was without doubt Baron Abraham Niklas Edelcrantz, the private secretary to the King of Sweden, a man of influence who combined a remarkable faculty for scientific research, particularly in the direction of chemistry, with a busy life at Court. His name before he was ennobled was Clevberg, and he died, long before the lady whom he wished to marry, in 1821. There can be no doubt that Miss Edgeworth consulted her true happiness in refusing to leave her family and follow this glittering stranger to Sweden. The only sacrifice he would not make for her was that of leaving the Court of Stockholm, where, he told her, his duty lay; and so at last they parted. Maria Edgeworth hurried home and wrote Leonora, as she confessed, "in the hope of pleasing the Chevalier Edelcrantz"; but she never even heard that he read it. The reaction after this excitement told upon her health, and it was many months before she was herself again.

We must say a few words before closing on Miss Zimmern's part of this work. As in her previous biographies of Schopenhauer and of Lessing, we find that she possesses a just sense of proportion and great skill in the arrangement and treatment of materials. Her knowledge is seldom defective, and her critical judgments are temperate and sound. But she still disappoints us a little in her style. It is more correct than it was; but it still lacks animation, character, sparkle. Her vocabulary seems to us limited for an author so experienced. It is because we look upon her as one of the most careful and promising of the young women who write in England that we venture to suggest a fault which care and study may remove.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. JOUAUST has often been less well advised than in admitting to the company of his "Petits chefs-d'œuvre" the pleasant comedy which La Fontaine and the husband of Mlle. Champmeslé (1) wrote together, and which terminates with a moral that one of the writers certainly, and according to scandal both, must have greatly consulted his own peace of mind in following. A captious critic might object that masterpiece is rather a strong word for La coupe enchantée. La Fontaine certainly could produce masterpieces in plenty, but they were not dramatic, and

(1) La coupe enchantée. Par La Fontaine et Champmeslé. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles.

Champmeslé was scarcely a heaven-born genius. But this kind of censorship is unnecessarily severe. The play is quite worthy of its pretty dress, and of M. Georges d'Heylli's pains in giving it an introduction and an appendix.

We have before us two examples of one of the numerous ingenious and valuable forms in which the late M. Joanne and his collaborators and successors have utilized the abundant materials of their well-known Guides (2, 3). Each of the books is a little volume in 12mo, very strongly bound in boards, and containing a brief but sufficient description of the district with which it deals, physically, politically, and economically arranged, an alphabetical gazetteer of communes, numerous engravings, and an admirable map. That they are appreciated in France is shown by the fact that the Loire volume has reached its fourth edition. If some English publisher would give us something of the kind for the English counties, a very great want would be supplied; for at present, except Guides specially designed for tourists (which are not the same thing), there is nothing of the sort.

The handsome volumes which M. Rothschild has published on the horse (4) and the dog (5), and which are now respectively in their third and their second editions, are avowedly founded upon "Stonehenge," but with considerable additions (as M. de Lagondie, the compiler of "The Horse and his Rider," tells us) from other writers, both French and English. In both cases English readers have something to learn from Frenchmen—for instance, as to dog-breaking, in which the peculiar character of French sport introduces some differences. The volume on the horse is, as might perhaps be expected, much the larger, and as its print is also smaller, it must contain three or four times as much matter as its companion. M. de Lagondie has included a large collection of pedigrees to guide breeders, as well as some matter, such as a section on training men as well as horses, which, though not exactly irrelevant, might not be expected.

The latest volume of the edition of Alfred de Vigny's (6) works which M. Lemerre is now publishing does not contain by any means the most interesting work of the author. Servitude et grandeur militaires has the distinction of its author's style, and some of its short tales and episodes would not be out of place in a book of "beauties." But, as a whole, it has the fatal fault of dulness, and of making the reader continually ask, and not least at the end of the book, what the author is driving at. Vigny had been a soldier, without experience of active service, and had disliked his profession. Perhaps this was not quite sufficient reason for writing a book about it. Still, nothing that he wrote could be valueless.

It has pleased fate and M. Lemerre that the "modern" volumes of his Petite Bibliothèque shall have tinted, hot-pressed paper, and the "ancient volumes" unglazed Dutch paper. We think that antiquity is the best lotie; but others may think differently. However, it is observable that the ancient division gets very rapidly out of print, and therefore those who wish for it had better note the appearance of a fifth and last volume of M. Dillaye's edition of Le Maçon's sixteenth-century version of the Decameron (7).

The fine Atlas which MM. Schrader and Vivien de St.-Martin are now producing has reached its fourth livraison (8). This contains maps of the Antarctic Circle and adjoining seas, of Roumania and Western Russia, and of Mexico. They are all admirably executed, and their great size (the sheets, when open, are twenty-six inches by twenty-one) admits of wide range and extended scale. Thus the map of the South Pole takes in the southern extremities of America, Africa, and Australia, and so shows much better than could be done otherwise the vast predominance of water in the Southern Hemisphere. But we rather wish that the sheets had been, heraldically speaking, "displayed." A fold in a map is not only a nuisance in consultation, but, unless it is linen-mounted, which adds greatly to the bulk of a large atlas, makes tearing not so much likely as certain.

It is not always that we can spare space to notice periodicals; but the chief article in the April Livre is so amusing and so well done that it must not be passed (9). It is the completion of M. Grand-Carteret's study of German caricature. It occupies some thirty of the large pages of the magazine, and it is crammed with illustrations. Add to this that, as a paper, it is very well done, and nothing more need be said to recommend it. Except persons who have given special attention to the matter, few Englishmen know much of recent German caricature, and most Englishmen have a rather low (as far as the average German periodical goes, it cannot be said an unjustly low) opinion of it. This article may improve their estimate; but it is noteworthy that the best things in it—those of Moritz von Schwind—are some half-century old.

Feu Robert Bey (10) is a crime-novel, and may be called a member of the further subdivision of mystery-crime-novel. There are some readers who never seem to tire of these things. The same or other readers have decided that, as the late M. Tourgenieff was a great novelist, all Russian novels are great. They can apply this general principle to those of "Salow" (11), and see if it holds.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

FOR the student of English politics there can scarcely be any more fascinating subject than the life of Bolingbroke (1). It has all the qualities that can attract a biographer. He was one of the most brilliant of men even by the confession of enemies who deny him the possession of solid ability and common honesty. In politics he held and advocated an interpretation of the Constitution which with different modifications has had an abiding attraction for some politicians in every generation. His literary influence has been very great. Then, too, the history of his time has been so thoroughly sifted that a biographer should find the way cleared. These are good reasons why Mr. Harrop should have chosen Bolingbroke as the subject of his "Political Study and Criticism," but they also made it incumbent on him to write a much better book. He has, indeed, treated his theme in a fashion which shows that he has none of the biographer's faculty. It is a literary sin to take a false view of a character, but it is a worse offence to take several inconsistent views of the same person. Now that is precisely what Mr. Harrop does. He defends Swift in one page from the charge of having ratted from the Whigs for ignoble motives on the sufficient ground that the Dean was a loyal churchman, and then on the next page calls him an adventurer who used politics as a means of pushing his fortunes. He deals with Bolingbroke in the same way. After quoting the famous parallel between the English Minister and the English pilot, and acknowledging that it fairly describes Bolingbroke's own course, he describes him also as an adventurer. Both these views cannot be true. Bolingbroke, indeed, plays a very subordinate part in Mr. Harrop's book, which is mainly taken up with disquisitions on English political parties, the Treaty of Utrecht, the meanness of the Church of England and the character of Voltaire—all very barren of facts and written in the now familiar style known as Macaulay and water. A certain unity is given in Mr. Harrop's book by his steady assertion of the great political truth that the country gentry and the Church are the natural enemies of mankind, and that all means taken to defeat them, including Walpole's bribery, are good.

Mr. Bond's History and Description of Corfe Castle (2) is a work of mainly local interest. He tells what little history the fortress has and gives a full description of it. The book is amply supplied with illustrations; among them is a facsimile of a bird's-eye-view drawn in 1586.

The festivities lately raging in Edinburgh (3) have inspired Mr. Douglas with the idea of republishing Principal Lee's outline of the University's history. The sketch was first printed as long ago as 1840. It will serve its turn, which is to instruct the reader who is too indolent to tackle Sir A. Grant's two volumes. Principal Lee is very flattering to the University, and profusely polite to the Town Council, dwelling much on their enlightened administration, and making no reference to the unlucky little affair of the mace. He insists much on the liberality of various citizens of Edinburgh towards the college, and comments on the comparative meanness of the Scotch aristocracy. His criticism is just enough; but he should not have forgotten Drummond of Hawthornden in his list of benefactors.

If Dr. Campbell's record of his thirty years' experience in the convict service (4) contains nothing very new, it is still fairly interesting. The author began in the days when convicts were sent to Botany Bay and Norfolk Island was peopled by them. Later he served at Dartmoor and elsewhere. His experience supplies him with many stories of the ingenuity shown by criminals in malingering, and of the proper way of treating them—by patience and the galvanic battery.

All sorts of curious old things turn up in unexpected places. Here is a Mr. Brasher, who, having decided to write a play, has gone for his plot to Scarron. Sophia; or, the Viceroy of Valencia (5), is the episode of the old novel in all its beauty. There are gallant Spaniards and Moorish pirates and lovely damsels who, on occasion, can put on men's dress, and fight like the most savage lambs. Old friends are always welcome, but we cannot say as much for Mr. Brasher's new face.

Mr. Hodge's "American Story" (6) is an agreeable exception to a rule. He does not deal in subtle analysis of characters which nobody need care about, and it does really contain a story. Putting aside the somewhat tiresome dialect of Sol Peters, who tells the tale, it is a fairly interesting legend of Indian superstition and backwood life.

To judge from the specimen before us, the series of Colonists' Handbooks (7) is a credit to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. It gives the intending emigrant a great deal of useful information, and it does not tell him that New Zealand is a land of Cockayne; on the contrary, it insists that, unless the emigrant is a good workman, stout, sober, and long-suffering, he had far better stay at home.

Major-General Mesny (8) of the Chinese army has published a brief history of Tonquin at Hong Kong. It bristles with the most enticingly barbarous names, and is full of battle, murder, and sudden death. At the end General Mesny has, in a moment of weakness, inserted a prophecy or two, which have been falsified while his book was coming to England.

In the course of time every writer who ever writ will have his Birthday Book. Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. have brought out a Wordsworth Birthday Book (9).

When the spring does come it will find the Guide-books tired of waiting to be used. We have received a copy of the eighth edition of Black's Touraine, Normandy, and Brittany (10).

SHORT STUDIES in ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY and BIOGRAPHY. By the Rev. H. N. OXENHAM. Demy 8vo. [Nearly ready.

ANCIENT RELIGION and MODERN THOUGHT. By W. S. LILLY. Demy 8vo. 12s. [This day.

BINKO'S BLUES: a Tale for Children of all Growths. By HERMAN MERIVALE, Author of "Faucit of Balliol," "White Pilgrim," &c. Illustrated by Edgar Giberne. Small crown 8vo. 5s. [This day.

THE CANTERBURY TALES; being Selections from the Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, rendered into Modern English, with close adherence to the Language of the Poet. By FRANK PITT-TAYLOR. Crown 8vo. 6s. [This day.

TONKIN; or, France in the Far East. By C. B. NORMAN, late of the 90th Light Infantry. Demy 8vo. with Maps, 14s.

"Captain Norman's book is an opportune contribution to the literature of this question, beginning as it does with the early relations between France and Tonquin before the French Revolution, and continuing the narrative of the present war down to the most recent operations."—Athenæum.

CHRONICLES of NEWGATE. By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS, H.M.'s Inspector of Prisons. Demy 8vo. with Illustrations, 16s.

"Major Griffiths's volumes will long continue to be the standard work on a painful subject, such as few men could have handled with so much good feeling and delicacy, and they deserve to be read by all students of our modern sociology."—Athenæum.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of MRS. BRAY (born 1789, died 1883), Author of "The Life of Thomas Stothard, R.A." "The White Hoods," &c. Edited by JOHN A. KEMPE. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"We could not well spare one page of the Autobiography of Anna Eliza Bray .....Her grandmother, who died in her hundredth year, and could well remember those times of Queen Anne when she was growing up among men who had seen the execution of Charles I had been the companion of her girlhood; and this not only gave an old-world tone to the future novelist's mind, but makes her in her Autobiography an authority on that near past which we are never tired of hearing.....The book is delightful."—Graphic.

MILITARY BIOGRAPHIES.

Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL are preparing for publication a Series of Volumes dedicated to the Lives of Great Military Commanders.

The volumes are designed to form a set of critical Biographies, illustrative of the operations and the art of war, by writers of distinction in the profession of arms, whose competence to weigh the military qualities and deeds of the Chiefs can be accepted. Maps will, when necessary, accompany the volumes, for the convenience of students.

The aim of these volumes is to be both popular and scientific, combining the narrative of the most romantic and instructive of human lives with a clear examination of the genius of the soldier.

The First Volume will be

FREDERICK the GREAT. By Colonel C. B. BRACKENBURY, containing Maps, crown 8vo. [This day.

MARSHAL LOUDON. By Colonel MALLESON, C.S.I., will follow it, the two Lives presenting the opposing aspects of the Seven Years' War.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS of PETER STONNOR, Esq. By Dr BLATHERWICK. With Illustrations by James Guthrie and A. S. Boyd. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"In our innocence of guile we do not quite know whether Mr. Blatherwick, the ostensible introducer of Mr. Peter Stonnor a veracious recollections, is a real person, or whether, on the contrary, he is as purely imaginative as the amiable hero with whom he has presented us. But, at any rate, we feel sure that he (if he it be) has written an unusually readable and interesting book. If Mr. Blatherwick is really a new writer, we venture to believe that he has a future before him."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE RIGHT SORT: a Romance of the Shires. By Mrs. EDWARD KENNARD. New Edition, 1 vol. crown 8vo. Illustrated, 6s. [This day.

NEW NOVEL BY MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED.

2 vols.

ZERO:

A Story of Monte Carlo.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

"The story is pleasingly told, the interest lying in the unity and rapidity of the well-sustained narrative, in the reality of the characters, and in the author's descriptive powers."
Whitehall Review.

INTRODUCED to SOCIETY. By HAMILTON AIDÉ, Author of "Rita" &c. 2 vols.

"If Mr. Hamilton Aidé achieved no other success than making his readers wish there was more of his book, the novelty of that result would be a thing to be remembered.....Some scenes in this too brief story have genuine beauty, others are humorous and caustic, and the whole story is good."—Spectator.

HENRY NIGHTINGALE: a Novel. By J. W. SHERER. 3 vols.

"A very entertaining story, with a plot that is quite out of the beaten track."—Morning Post.

SALVAGE: a Collection of Stories. By HAWLEY SMART, Author of "Hard Lines," "Breezie Langton," &c. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"They are well worth reading.....Bright, genial, and witty in himself, he tinges everything he touches with these same good qualities."—Whitehall Review.

This day is published.

AN OLD MAN'S LOVE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 12s.

"It is more original in design and donnée, not only than 'The Land Leaguers,' but than many of the author's more recent works.....Indeed the whole little story, as Captain Clutterbuck would say, goes trippingly off."—Saturday Review.

"In all respects an admirable story. There are few better specimens extant of what may be called Mr. Trollope's later style than this novel. It shows him in some respects at his best. .....There are innumerable side touches in the story, which it would be impossible adequately to describe, and of which it would be difficult to speak too highly."—Scotsman.

SECOND EDITION.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY by ANTHONY TROLLOPE. 2 vols. post 8vo. with Portrait, 21s.

"It is a fine manly character that comes out of the story of his life, and nobody will read it without feeling that he knows the writer, and, knowing him better, that he values him with increased regard."—Athenæum.

"Since Mr. Trevelyan told the story of his uncle's life, there has been published in England no more genuine or interesting record of a literary career than that unfolded in these volumes."
Saturday Review.

This day is published, Second Edition.

ESSAYS by GEORGE ELIOT; and Leaves from a Note-Book. Post 8vo. 10s. 6d.

This day is published, complete in 2 vols.

THE INSTITUTES of the LAW of NATIONS: a Treatise of the Jural Relations of Separate Political Communities. By JAMES LORIMER, LL.D., Advocate, Regius Professor of Public Law and of the Law of Nature and Nations in the University of Edinburgh, &c. &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s.

This day is published.

NORFOLK BROADS and RIVERS; or, the Waterways, Lagoons, and Decoys of East Anglia. By C. CHRISTOPHER DAVIES, Author of "The Swan and her Crew." Post 8vo. illustrated with 12 Full-page Plates, 14s.

"A charming description of the inland seas of Norfolk and their inhabitants, human and other, from the pen of Mr. Davies. The author describes his yachting adventures with such piquancy and verve that we find ourselves mentally resolving to devote our next autumn holidays to sailing the Broads instead of climbing the Alps."—Westminster Review.

"His book is full of pleasant reading, even for those to whom nature has denied all love for fishing and amateur yachting.....It will be welcomed everywhere by all who can relish healthy writing upon healthy topics. We recommend it unreservedly, but had almost forgotten to say that it is adorned with twelve admirable illustrations."—Spectator.

SEVENTH EDITION.

ALTIORA PETO. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT, Author of "Piccadilly," "Traits and Travesties," &c. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 6s.

"Brilliant and delightful.....The book is one which everybody will greedily read and greatly admire. It is the outcome of singular originality and independence..... It contains enough to equip a score of ordinary novelists for the production of a score of extraordinary novels."—Athenæum.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

ENGLAND THROUGH FRENCH GLASSES.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

PUBLIC LIFE IN ENGLAND.

By PHILIPPE DARYL.

Translated by HENRY FRITH, and Revised by the Author.

"One of the ablest of the books by Frenchmen about England. Superior in real merit to 'John Bull et son Ile.'"—Athenæum.

"This clever book.....M. Philippe Daryl has lived ten years in our country and understands its language perfectly. He has moreover the gift—rare among his countrymen—of seeing men and things amongst us, for the most part, from a correct point of view.....Altogether, this book is well worth reading."—Morning Post.

"Throughout the whole book the author shows that he is a thorough master of his subject. He has written of nothing without having obtained all possible information on the point. We can commend the book as thoroughly interesting."—Court Journal.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

Now ready, 8vo. 16s.

MEMOIRS of LIFE and WORK. By CHARLES J. B. WILLIAMS, M.D., F.R.S., Physician Extraordinary to Her Majesty the Queen. With a Portrait of the Author, and Original Sketches of La Place, Laennec, Andral, and other French savants.

"Dr. Charles Williams's 'Memoirs of Life and Work' have much medical and professional, together with some social and general, interest. Dr. Williams, who is a Fellow of the Royal Society and a man of considerable distinction, is an authority upon consumption, to the knowledge of which bronchocele disease he has contributed by his pen.....There is plenty of shrewd observation to be found in the book."—Daily News, April 12.

POPULAR NOVELS
AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE DAILYS of SODDEN FEN. By the Author of "Four Crotchets to a Bar" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

This is a really fine novel in design; and the execution is of a high order, with a just and impressive catastrophe.....Scarcely any of the characters could be spared, so new and refreshing are nearly all the fictitious beings whom the novelist has summoned from the recesses of imagination. New, too, is the scenery, new the subject, new the scope, and new the style of treatment. The fortunes of a pair of lovers do not—for once—claim attention to the exclusion of most other matters. .....The family of the Dailys, one and all, are conceived with great originality and sketched with remarkable vigour and skill. Altogether the novel is of an undoubtedly superior stamp.

MORNING POST.

A powerfully written tale; whilst possessing the interest of a romance, enters into the discussions of many social problems.

ATHENÆUM.

In virtue of its subject, of its boldly-drawn characters, of its descriptions and manner of treatment, it is pre-eminently readable. The story throws light upon a district which has not been worked by previous writers of fiction, and the picture here presented is a thoroughly pleasant piece of work. As for the characters, the whole family of the Dailys are English to the backbone. Few more weird figures will be found in contemporary fiction than that of James Daily as he sat night after night crouched on the thatch of his cottage, brooding over the dim prospect of Sodden Fen, which he has sworn never to enter except as the recognised owner. The keeping of his vow, the manner of his release, the long nursing of his insane greed and envy and fancied wrongs, are told with masculine power—which is by no means the same thing as saying by a male writer. If this novel is not one of the most vigorous which has appeared within the last year or two, it has elements of vigour in conception and execution which entitle it to much consideration, and the discerning reader will not fail to observe many indications of the best qualities that a novelist can possess.

ACADEMY.

The love passages between Aurea Chapel and her third and final fate form a piece of sunny comedy incomparably superior to what passes muster as the humorous by-play of ordinary fiction.

IN LONDON TOWN. By KATHERINE LEE, Author of "A Western Wildflower" &c. 3 vols.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

This is a very fresh, original, wholesome, clever, humorous, and yet serious story. The heroine is an excellent conception. Her lover's character is worked out and exhibited with considerable skill and humour. Here and there he attains almost heroic proportions; he reaches a noticeable height of moral dignity and nobility. Another very well conceived and well-drawn character is the hero's mother, and another is her most worthy and amiable brother. It is highly creditable to the writer to have accomplished such admirable sketches. Amusing, too, is the small satire directed against the women who yearn after the higher education, after equal electoral rights, and after what Mr. Sampson Brass would have vaguely described as "all manner of games."

ACADEMY.

This is a good, sound, interesting, and healthy novel, and one that it is impossible to read without feeling the better for it. There is a refreshingly quiet humour in some of the characters. The figure of the old man Thorold, a descendant of an ancient family, who believes that he has been defrauded of his rights, is a very striking and even pathetic one.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

Mrs. Lee has produced a sensible as well as an affecting book; it is well conceived; the story of Mr. Fowler's courtship and marriage is pleasantly told.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The story is bright and amusing throughout.....No one who knows what good writing is, no one who is original enough to enjoy originality, should miss the pleasure that this novel will give.

ATHENÆUM.

The characters in Mrs. Lee's new tale are strongly marked, and have been drawn with much artistic care. "In London Town" is an unusually interesting story.

EGYPT.

IN the reign of CHARLES II. a captain in the navy who had done his duty to his own loss and damage was told by the KING, according to Lord MACAULAY, "with ignoble "levity," that he was a great fool for his pains. The historian must bear the burden of the qualification; but the sentiments of the merry monarch seem in themselves to bear considerable resemblance to those of the defenders of the Egyptian policy of the Government. Very late in the day, when it appeared that the notion of a Berber expedition (rashly entertained last week by persons who do not understand Mr. GLADSTONE's peculiar dialect) was definitely abandoned, something like a general theory of that policy was put forward. General GORDON, it seems, has tried to get the Soudan pacified and the garrisons rescued at his own personal risk. He is a great fool for his pains. TEWFIK BEY fought it out at Sinkat to the last gasp. He was a great fool for his pains. The Government have from the beginning undertaken two things—the rescue of the garrisons and the safety of General GORDON. If they attempted to carry out that pledge, they would be great fools for their pains. But the Governor of Tokkar, who capitulated and contributed gunners to OSMAN DIGMA's force, was a very sensible fellow; and, if it be true that the Governor of Berber has made terms with the MAHDI, the Governor of Berber is a very sensible fellow too. Everything is comfortably explicable on this theory of the advantages of promise-breaking and poltroonery except the unlucky Souakim expedition. But that can be got over in a different way. There happened to be an expedition somewhere about Souakim; some troops happened, quite casually, to be coming home from India; some others, with equal casualty, happened to drop down the Red Sea from Cairo, or up it from Aden. General GRAHAM and a staff happened in the most convenient way in the world to start from Charing Cross and travel day and night to Egypt. And everything having happened in this fashion, Mr. GLADSTONE and his Government "agreed to have a "battle" like two famous heroes of legend, or like a later character of fiction observed "Hullo! here's an expedition; "let it go and kill something." It went and killed many somethings, and then it came away. Such, after much reflection, is the clear and certainly ingenious explanation of the Government conduct in the past which has been laid before the English people by their defenders in the press.

There is at least this advantage about such a defence, that it can be accepted by all sides. That the Government have acted, as they have acted towards the Nile districts out of immeasurable poltroonery or ignoble levity; that they have acted as they have acted towards the Red Sea district with no coherent purpose whatever, are propositions which here, at any rate, there is no need to dispute. If any one likes the theory and chooses to adopt it, he is welcome to it. It is scarcely necessary before at least some audacious of Englishmen to discuss or to examine it. That the KHEDIVE's servants ought to have delivered up the [illegible] places in their guardianship to the KHEDIVE's [illegible] that General GORDON ought to have relinquished [illegible] that the real object of it (the parrying of the [illegible] of popular indignation at the first news of the [illegible] of Sinkat) was achieved; that the Souakim expedition was a mere casual excursion undertaken in lightness of heart and excessive good-nature, are propositions the enunciation of which is quite sufficient to condemn them with any one who either knows the facts or has a spark of manly and patriotic spirit. The important thing is to recognize the utter hopelessness of a case which can only find such defenders and such defences. For almost any blunder or crime something like a plausible excuse can be made by a capable advocate—an excuse which at least needs some examination, some marshalling of counter argument and evidence to expose its insufficiency. Here the speech of the prisoner's counsel is sufficient for the jury, the very statement of the pleas is enough to decide the verdict. The whole of Europe and more than half England cry shame upon the Government for abandoning the faithful servants of the English and Egyptian Governments, and want to know what was the meaning of the Souakim campaign. The answer is that the servants of the English and Egyptian Governments ought to have looked after themselves, and that the Souakim campaign had no meaning at all. The despatches and documents recently issued, and not here to be discussed in detail, bring out more clearly than ever the hopelessly indefensible character at once of the policy of the Government and of the explanations or non-explanations of that policy in Parliament. It is now evident that even Sir EVELYN BARING, whose antecedents have caused him to be not unjustly suspected of lukewarmness in carrying out a bold policy, and who certainly is guilty of advocating "scuttling" from the Soudan, is found on the other side as regards the abandonment of General GORDON. He distinctly urged compliance with GORDON's suggestion that the Souakim victories should be utilized and not thrown away. The Government rejected his and GORDON's advice. He expressed serious alarm about Berber; Mr. GLADSTONE is as serenely indifferent about Berber as about Khartoum. Finally, not indeed Sir EVELYN's locum tenens Mr. EGERTON, but Generals STEPHENSON and WOOD recommended the seizing of the last chance a week ago; the usual refusal was once more forwarded from England. Against all light and knowledge therefore has the Government acted, and it is left by Mr. GLADSTONE's account waiting till General GORDON (who is absolutely cut off from communication) communicates once more views which he has set before Mr. GLADSTONE again and again, and which have been constantly and calmly set aside. With regard to General GORDON himself, it is obvious that his sanguine expressions as to Khartoum and its safety were wholly conditioned by his belief in the approach of English troops, and ceased when he was disabused of that belief. His "indig-"nation at being abandoned" is a decisive fact. And one not less decisive and hitherto unknown is that he not only offered Colonel STEWART and Mr. POWER the choice of retreat by the Equator, but offered them the choice of retreating "with him." This must have meant complete discouragement, and of itself cancels all expressions of confidence before it. It is General GORDON's last word. On the other side, Lord GRANVILLE's utterances close with an obliging expression of "respect and gratitude" for General GORDON's "gallant conduct." That is what the Government can do for their officer who is in peril of his life.

Considering, however, the attitude of Ministers themselves in Parliament, it would be unreasonable to find fault with their too faithful followers out of it, who, following the example they themselves condemn, prefer illogical and perhaps thankless fidelity to deserting their colours. Mr. GLADSTONE, after his memorable display of verbiage last week, has turned sulky, has "fallen back on the "privilege of declining to give an answer," and has thus admitted that no answer can be given. Lord HARTINGTON is conciliatory and apparently not quite comfortable. Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE is engaged in a careful comparison of the telegrams of the Standard and the Daily News in order to arrive at a knowledge of the facts in Egypt. He knows nothing about Khartoum—except of course that it is, according to his own and the PRIME MINISTER'S statements of last week, at once in "very great peril" and in "no danger military or other." He knows nothing about Berber; he knows nothing about the date of the last telegram from General GORDON; he knows nothing as to the relations of war or peace between England and the MAHDI. There was once a traveller who lost his way, and met a very small child. He asked the child what the name of the place was, and the child said "I don't "know." He asked where the road led, and the child said "I don't know." He asked where the child lived, and the child said "I don't know." Being then very tired and very hungry, and rather cross, the traveller said, "Do you know anything?" And the child burst into a flood of tears, and said "I don't know." It would be painful if the UNDER-SECRETARY imitated the child completely; but it might almost be worth while to try the effect of the question "whether he knows anything" respecting the fate of the garrisons for the rescue of which England's honour is pledged, of the officer who was sent out to save Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government from defeat, of the vast regions which England, after forbidding Egypt to stir a finger for their help or defence, refuses now to help and defend herself.

The Government, however, is apparently too busy about its last important determination to pay attention to details. It is characteristic of incompetent practitioners in politics as in medicine to put their faith in panaceas. Mr. GLADSTONE'S first heal-all for Egypt was the paper Constitution; his second was General GORDON'S mission; his third is the now notorious Conference. This Conference ought not to have been necessary at all, and, if necessary, ought to have been prepared for by a demonstration of ability to govern Egypt, and not by a demonstration of mingled reluctance and incapacity for that task. But these considerations are immaterial compared with that which has been already insisted on—the advantage, namely, which the Conference gives to the ill-will and the cupidity of France. The cheerful announcement that all the Powers have accepted except France simply means that all the Powers whose acceptance is unimportant have accepted, and that the Power whose acceptance is important has not. Mr. GLADSTONE, it is true, puts the matter in a different form. France will come in, but after preliminary communications. It is exactly as to the nature of these preliminary communications that doubt is felt. That France on the granting of conditions would come in is undoubted. But, as the granting of those conditions might be equivalent to the surrender of all the advantages gained by England during the last two years, it is permissible to look with not a little disquiet on the progress of negotiations on such a subject under the control of a Minister so incapable in matters of foreign policy, so obviously disgusted with Egyptian matters, and so prone to prefer worthless and faithless "friendships" to valuable and solid alliances as Mr. GLADSTONE.

THE REPORT OF THE CROFTERS' COMMISSION.

WHEN the names of the Commissioners for inquiring into the condition of the crofters and cottars in the Highlands and islands of Scotland became known rather more than a year ago, it was clear that, whatever the ultimate form which their report might take, at least all shades of opinion would be represented. At the head of the list stood Lord NAPIER and ETTRICK, a Whig peer and a Lowland laird, whose diplomatic career is too well known to require comment. Next to him we read the names of two gentlemen who stand prominently among the representatives of those old Highland families which, amid changing times, have retained their landed estates. Of these two, one, Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE, is a Liberal in politics, and recently contested the county of Invernessshire unsuccessfully with the other, Mr. CAMERON, of Lochiel. The fourth, Mr. FRASER MACKINTOSH, is a Radical member of Parliament, and was for a considerable time factor on the MACKINTOSH estates, where it has been said that he did not put in practice the principles which he has since advocated. Mr. NICOLSON is a lawyer, and is, over the border, a celebrity in his own line. Mr. MACKINNON fills the recently created chair of Celtic languages in the University of Edinburgh, and is a native of the Island of Colonsay. It was, no doubt, a well-appointed Commission, and one certainly likely to have the interests of the crofters at heart.

The Report commences with certain remarks on the prejudices existing amongst those on whose evidence many of the conclusions had to be based. One of the causes of this bigoted state of mind was the previous influence of agitators. These men were in the habit of going before the Commission to the various places which they visited, and of creating grievances for the crofters to complain of. On one occasion, for instance, a crofter in Tiree complained that he was not allowed to cut peats in the island. At the time no cross-examination revealed the truth. But it afterwards appeared that, although the complaint was true, it was true on the ground that there were no peats in the island to cut. The words had simply been put into the man's mouth by an agitator who was not quite up to his work. Another fertile source of prejudice is stated to be the glamour thrown over the past by the traditions of former days. The documentary evidence which exists on this subject goes to prove that, bad as the crofter's condition is in many places now, it was far worse a hundred and fifty years ago, and that the improvements have been due to the usually judicious action of the landlords. The crofters were then sub-tenants of the tacksmen, or larger farmers, and were described as being ground down and impoverished by the exactions to which they were exposed. Poor as they may be, such remarks as this would be at present entirely inapplicable to their case.

The Report deals with six distinct subjects—land tenure, the fish trade, education, the administration of justice, deer forests, and emigration. The grievances complained of with respect to education and the administration of justice are slight and easily remedied. They are of purely local importance, and do not raise questions of far reaching principles. The encouragement of emigration is advocated, and even State aid for this purpose, if very judiciously applied, is thought desirable. Under this head some very interesting statistics are given as to the various arrangements that should be made for emigrating families, and the cost in different cases. The treatment of the much-vexed question of deer forests is clear and impartial, and will, it is to be hoped, settle the matter until agitators can venture again to ignore the established facts. On all these points the Commission is practically agreed, as well as on the measures advocated to improve the fish-trade. Here, however, Mr. CAMERON of Lochiel is rightly timid about recommending the large expenditure which these would entail. The fish-trade is of very great importance, since the crofters of the West Coast and Islands derive a larger income from fishing than from the cultivation of their crofts. It is stated also by experts that this industry is capable of enormous development, especially in the West and North—in the districts, in fact, in which poverty is most extreme. The difficulties with which the fishermen have to contend are of several kinds. In many parts of the coast it is impossible to find shelter for the boats. Small boats can be beached; but those of a size really suitable for their work require harbours to be made. In their present condition, also, the crofters are in most cases too poor to be able to afford these large boats, even when several combine together for the purpose. In order to help them to purchase these, it is proposed that the Government shall advance money on favourable terms, the boats being of course insured. But these methods of help would be but of slight service if communications were not also improved. It is not only necessary that a quicker and easier access to the various markets should be obtained, but also that telegraphic communication should be more extensively opened. Herring are most erratic in their behaviour. Fishermen may go out day after day meeting with but moderate success. But unexpectedly they may have an enormous haul, which, could they only sell it, would go far to provide them with comfort for the coming winter. But there is too often no means whatever of sending the fish away, and they have not sufficient salt to cure them. It is clear that, if they had first of all the power of sending rapidly for a steamer to take what they have caught, or to bring them a large store of salt, they would be able to take advantage of those periodic strokes of luck. As matters stand now, it is an uncommon thing for these stores of splendid food to lie in stinking heaps by the roadside, to be ultimately used as manure. But the expense of all these improvements would be great, and the Western Highlander has not always shown himself worthy of such sacrifices of money. It is to be hoped, therefore, that if these recommendations are carried out, it will be done with great caution. The money should be tentatively expended in the most favourable cases first, and the experience so gained should be applied to modify the schemes as they expand; and, above all, nothing should be done which might, even indirectly, foster the spirit of dependence on external assistance.

By far the most important recommendations in the Report are those which refer to the land tenure. And fortunately here two members of the Commission, Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE and Mr. CAMERON of Lochiel, have recorded their protests against the proposals. We say fortunately; for a more unpractical, and at the same time more revolutionary, scheme has seldom been advanced by any politician of a serious turn of mind and an experience of the actual working of the relations between landlord and tenant. To all the mass of complaints which formed a large portion of the evidence laid before the Commission there was a common basis—poverty; and one of the chief causes of this poverty is the smallness of the crofts farmed by each family. Every remedy, then, to the present discontent, likely to prove of any permanent value, must depend upon giving to the crofters either larger pieces of land or some other means of supporting themselves apart from the land, and also upon ensuring that the population of each district does not increase beyond the power of that district to support it in average years. We have space only for a rough outline of the scheme proposed in the Report. "Townships" or "communes" are to be legally established, which are defined as "farms, or parts of farms, occupied in common or in "division by several tenants." Each of these townships is to consist partly of arable and partly of grazing land, and is to be governed by a council composed of the heads of families, who are to elect a constable to transact their business. Here we have to start with the elements of very pretty quarrels. But the height of absurdity to any one who knows the habits of the Western Highlanders is reached, when it is gravely proposed that this constable shall "co-operate with "the sanitary inspector of the parish in matters regarding "the improvement of dwellings and public health." These townships having been constituted, they are to have the right to make their landlord pay half the expense of erecting and maintaining the following improvements—fences or walls between the whole of each township and neighbouring lands or townships, and between the arable and grazing land of each township, in addition to this such roads and bridges as may be required. Nor is this all; if a township is overcrowded, it is to have a right to an increase of land at a valuation, or to throw off a new township on the same terms; and for all this the landlord is to pay as before. It is perhaps needless to expose the absurdity of this scheme, as it will clearly lead directly to most of the evils against which it is a supposed remedy. The oldest pig in a farmyard is just as likely to co-operate satisfactorily with a sanitary officer as the constable of a township; the internal quarrels will be endless, but all will unite against the landlord, who will be put to great expense, and will have the pleasure of seeing all control of his estates pass out of his hands. But, worst of all, it is a deliberate encouragement to local increase of population. The two dissentient Commissioners have stated their objections at considerable length and with great clearness, and two of their observations should suffice to settle the question. Sir KENNETH MACKENZIE points out that all the worst evils in the Highlands are found chiefly, if not solely, side by side with common pastures; and Mr. CAMERON of Lochiel remarks with great justice that the scheme will affect the landlords injuriously by the exact measure of their having acted in past times in accordance with the wishes of the people. That is to say, that where evictions have been carried out already, the landlord will not suffer; but that when, in the past, he has sacrificed his own interests to the supposed welfare of the people in order to please them, he is to be repaid by loss of money, property, and influence.

The Report over and over again asserts that the condition of the crofter in the present is an improvement on what it has been in the past. Why is this? The cause is not far to seek, and is due simply to the fact that landlords have, on the whole, judiciously improved their estates year by year and little by little. Labour has been employed in buildings and roads to an enormous extent, and one by one cottages have been improved, crofts fenced, and, above all, opportunities have been tried of amalgamating small pieces of land, where death or emigration has enabled this to be done without hardship, while at the same time all subdivision has been absolutely forbidden. It is in no revolutionary legislation, but in such gentle remedies as these, prudently applied, that the cure for what evils still exist must be found.

INCOME-TAX REFORM.

MR. HUBBARD'S periodical motion in favour of an unequal Income-tax might perhaps have excited a stronger interest if it had been new, or if it had been likely to succeed. The majority of members had heard the same arguments from the same speaker year by year since their first entrance into the House of Commons; and although some of them, having no special knowledge on the subject, may possibly have been convinced, they have found that economists and practical financiers invariably differ from Mr. HUBBARD. A sufficient number of members rose to support the motion for the adjournment of the House, partly out of deference to the mover, and also as a protest against discourteous attempts to prevent discussion. It was not surprising that on the following day the benches on both sides of the House were thinly occupied, inasmuch as Mr. GLADSTONE'S intervention in the debate was wholly unexpected. He had perhaps regretted the change in official arrangements which had devolved on a colleague the introduction of the Budget. Mr. HUBBARD had given him a welcome opportunity of delivering a fluent disquisition on finance; but, in his pleasure at returning to his favourite subject, he forgot the gratitude which he owed to his involuntary benefactor. Like the horse in HOMER, which has broken his headstall, Mr. GLADSTONE exulted over the field of finance, indulging in triumphant ridicule of Mr. HUBBARD'S hackneyed remarks, and especially of his scanty audience. He was willing to acknowledge and even to exaggerate the anomalies of the Income-tax, that he might taunt his adversaries and the general community with their error in refusing the offer of repeal which he made as a bribe to the constituencies on the eve of the election of 1874. It seems that for some unexplained reason the offer can never be renewed.

In his many eloquent speeches on the Income-tax Mr. GLADSTONE has, probably of set purpose, confined his defence of equal and uniform duties to elaborate statements of the difficulty or impossibility of differential assessment. He has no difficulty in quoting high authority for a system which he might, if he thought fit, show to be demonstrably just. It seems that Mr. GLADSTONE himself, when he was young in office, proposed some change in the practice to Sir ROBERT PEEL, who summarily dismissed the request as absurd. Prudent statesmen are generally disposed to reserve some of their motives and reasons when they have given a sufficient explanation of their conduct. Sir ROBERT PEEL would not have been daunted by detailed impediments if he had satisfied himself that incomes ought to be taxed according to a graduated scale representing their respective sources or the supposed merits of their owners; but he had no disposition to engage in academic controversies when he had persuaded Parliament that the practical objections to inequality were numerous and grave. Mr. GLADSTONE, who often invents far-fetched reasons for foregone conclusions, has in this instance followed the example of his former chief. He has been always consistent in his apology for the alleged grievances of which Mr. HUBBARD complains. Mr. GLADSTONE'S great Budget speech of 1853 was addressed to a House of Commons which had largely shared in the popular delusion of a differential Income-tax. If he had fully exposed the prevailing fallacy, he would have convinced only his more intelligent listeners. His exposition of practical difficulties was more generally intelligible; and perhaps it was more readily accepted because he undertook that the tax should be gradually reduced during a few years, and that at the end of the time it should be abolished. It has now become perpetual; but an experience of more than forty years has made the burden less obnoxious. It must also be remembered that the contributors to the tax once governed the country, that their power was greatly impaired by the establishment of household suffrage in boroughs, and that, when the Franchise Bill is passed, only a small fraction of the constituency will pay a shilling of Income-tax.

Mr. HUBBARD'S annual protests are survivals from a time when almost all those who were assessed to the Income-tax believed that they bore more than their due share of the burden. Mr. GLADSTONE quoted with a feeling of amusement, and at the same time with literal accuracy, a speech in which Sir FITZROY KELLY proved to his own satisfaction that every class of contributors was overtaxed in comparison with every other. The loudest in complaint have always been the taxpayers under Schedule D. Sometimes they dwelt on the meritorious nature of incomes earned by their own labour and risk; but their favourite argument was derived from the precarious or temporary nature of their receipts. Mr. HUBBARD is in the habit of combining both the supposed anomalies; and in his late speech he proposed that the rate of payment or schedule should be roughly estimated by a reduction of fifty per cent. on the percentage on realized property. It is not clear whether he would demand a further abatement in consideration of the origin of professional or trading incomes. The proposal, though it may at first sight appear plausible, bristles with injustice. Those who share Mr. HUBBARD'S opinions would only relieve individual traders, while they would impose the full rate of duty on shareholders in industrial or mercantile companies; yet there is not the smallest reason why the profits of associated capital should be unfavourably distinguished from the earnings of private traders. Professional incomes may not involve a similar complication, but their partial exemption would operate as a gratuitous boon to be provided at the expense of other taxpayers. It is true that the income of a lawyer or a doctor is only worth a few years' purchase calculated according to his age, his health, and his prospects. An equal income derived from the Funds would be capitalized at a far lower rate of interest, representing three or four times, or perhaps in some cases ten times, the value of the professional income; but projectors forget that the duration of the tax is in both cases exactly the same with that of the income. A law officer at the head of the Bar may earn vast sums only for three or four years; but when he retires he leaves a successor to inherit the burden as well as the revenue. The collective income of a profession generally tends to increase, and if it remains stationary, it is practically equivalent in duration to an ownership in fee simple. In other words, Schedule D is as permanent as Schedule A, though it includes a larger number of successive taxpayers.

The only injustice which has been inflicted on taxpayers under Schedule D has arisen from occasional changes in the rate of duty. It was hard on those who were earning precarious incomes during the latter part of the Crimean War to pay fifteenpence in the pound, with little expectation of profiting by the reduction of the percentage some years afterwards to a third of the amount. If the rate of taxation had been unaltered, all inequalities would have corrected themselves in the course of two-and-forty years since the first institution of the duty. The allowances which are made to owners of small incomes up to 400*l.* a year compensate not unfairly for the larger proportionate contributions of householders with narrow means to indirect taxation. For the reasons which have been given, no reduction ought to be made in consideration of the short or uncertain term of enjoyment. Even if such an adjustment were theoretically equitable, it would, as Mr. GLADSTONE suggests, be wholly impracticable to graduate the tax in accordance with innumerable varieties of tenure. Mr. HUBBARD would tax a trade which may be really hereditary at a lower rate than landed or funded property; yet it is notorious that a bank, a brewery, or a great publishing house frequently descends from father to son for two or three generations. It is only when such a business falls into the hands of a limited Company that Mr. HUBBARD would deprive shareholders, who may perhaps be needy, of the privilege which he demands for wealthy capitalists.

One test of fair taxation is the relative maintenance of the pecuniary position of the taxpayer after the introduction of a new impost. Probably no other part of the fiscal system complies with the condition so nearly as the Income-tax. A fundholder with an annual receipt of 1,000*l.* may be considered three times as rich as his neighbour who derives an equal income from a profession assumed to be worth ten years' purchase. A tax of ten per cent. on both incomes would still leave the proportion of three to one between their respective possessions. It is not the business of financiers to redress the inequalities of fortune. The allowance which is made under the existing law for premiums on life insurance is an anomaly, though it does little harm, except in supplying a precedent for dangerous irregularity. With all its faults, the Income-tax is probably the fairest impost which is paid, as long as the rate is not suddenly and frequently varied. A natural curiosity as to the substitute which was to be proposed by Mr. GLADSTONE in 1874 will probably never be gratified. If he intended to supply the deficiency which would have occurred by an increase of the Succession Duties, the owners of property would have felt little gratitude for his benevolent remission of a more obnoxious tax. The uncertainty of [illegible] introduces into duties on succession a gambling element; and it is possible that the occurrence of two or three deaths at short intervals might reduce a family to ruin. Mr. GLADSTONE appears now to have returned to a more orthodox doctrine.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

IT is quite intelligible that the smallness of the Government majorities on Monday night should have frightened and disgusted the thorough-going supporters of Mr. GLADSTONE. Had any Leprechaun whispered in the ear of Mr. PARNELL that here was a fine opportunity of shuffling the cards, the greatest, wisest, strongest Government of modern times (as it is known to be on the infallible authority of its own members) would have found itself in a position from which even Mr. GLADSTONE'S eel-like faculty of evasion could hardly have devised an escape. So soon, too, after Mr. FAWCETT'S glowing prophecies of majorities of a hundred and fifty, the thing was specially annoying. But it may be asked in all good faith and good temper whether the apologists of these awkward accidents have not somewhat abused the principle of the saying "Heads I win, tails you lose"? They say that the smallness of the majorities was due to the traitorous conduct of the Conservative whips in forcing a division; but they say also that the Government determination to prevent their followers from taking part in the debate was notorious and avowed. It is not easy to see how these two things can by any possibility agree together. If Ministers refused to take part, and to allow their followers to take part, in the debate, they must have wished to hasten the division, and in that case it is impossible that they should have been unfairly treated or taken by surprise by the division being hastened. They cannot possibly claim credit for their noble conduct in deprecating delay, and credit for being caught napping by being taken at their word. They must declare to win with one horse or the other, and they clearly cannot change colours or saddles to suit the exigencies of the situation. On the other hand, it is impossible to approve the conduct of Mr. CHAPLIN in making a formal attack on the inclusion of Ireland, and declining to put the question to the test of a division. That the majority would, as is confidently (and safely) asserted, have exceeded that for the second reading is pretty certainly a mistaken assertion. But it would, no doubt, have been large. Under the crack of the whip, the present Liberal party rarely fails to answer, though it is only under the crack of the whip. But this might have been a reason for not interposing a formal trial of strength between the regular combats on second reading and in Committee; it could have been none for proposing such a trial of strength and then evading it. The proceeding is one of those numerous tactical blunders which have distinguished the conduct of the present Conservative Opposition to a degree not recently paralleled in Parliamentary history. The matter is the more unfortunate as it resulted in the handling of the most important part of the whole subject—the inclusion of Ireland in the Bill—after the desultory, incomplete, and unreal fashion which is inevitable when the author of a motion admits that it is only a motion pour rire. Battles, it has been remarked, are never so much won as they are lost; it is to be rather hoped than expected that HER MAJESTY'S Opposition will be contented with the proof they have already given of this sententious, but true, saying.

Nevertheless, the incidents both of Monday and Thursday prove, though in different ways, that it is only by the old device of locking the voters up in the coach-house that the imposing majorities which rejoice Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S soul can be got together. The alleged desire to shorten debate is, of course, not necessarily connected with any inability on the part of the Government to find defenders of their measure who have anything to say. But it happens, by one of the fortunate coincidences of politics, to cover such inability if it exists. The self-denying ordinance which the majority (who could not put themselves to the further self-denial of coming down to vote) passed, it is said, on Monday night does not seem to have deprived the House of any remarkable displays of argument or eloquence, to judge from the speeches actually pronounced. Mr. GLADSTONE, indeed, took the opportunity of descanting on the precious qualities of the Tory party before he (Mr. GLADSTONE) left it. In the abstract, the spectacle of Mr. GLADSTONE asking "Where is that party "now?" and deciding that it is nowhere, or in a very bad place, is interesting. The political student has the advantage of being able to come to the conclusion that, if Mr. BRIGHT's account of the Liberal party some forty years ago or thereabouts, and Mr. GLADSTONE's account of the Tory party of the same time, be taken without any grains of salt, the general political character of our fathers must, on the whole, have exceeded in moral and intellectual excellence that of the politicians of any age recorded in history. Unfortunately, our fathers themselves did not think so. The purity and high-mindedness of the Tory party of WELLINGTON and PEEL was far from being such an article of faith with the Liberal of the day as it is with Mr. GLADSTONE, and the stern and unbending Tories of the same time were by no means filled with that burning admiration for Mr. BRIGHT and his friends which Mr. BRIGHT now frequently expresses. This is unfortunate, but it is the way of the world. It may be doubted, moreover, whether Mr. GLADSTONE's affidavit that all parties to which he (Mr. GLADSTONE) has ever belonged have been pure and high-minded parties, advances the logical argument for the Franchise Bill very far or in a very irresistible manner. It is, however, somewhat unreasonable to quarrel with a tacit confession on the part of the Radical party that there is nothing to be said for themselves except that they have a great majority. There is more legitimate ground for objection in the attempt made in some quarters to convict of obstructive tautology any fresh attempt to include redistribution, if not also any fresh attempt to exclude Ireland. The childlike plea of Mr. GLADSTONE that the Government has brought in a very simple Bill, and that it is a shame to debate it as if it were a complex one, is not likely to deceive any one who has not made up his mind to be deceived. The simplicity of the Bill is notoriously a malicious simplicity—a simplicity designed to evade and to limit discussion. On the other hand, it is the undoubted privilege of Parliament to discuss without limit other than that imposed by positive rule. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in getting Sir R. CROSS's motion as to registration silenced, struck an awkward stroke at his own side. For the decision showed how large is the range of subjects introducible and there arguable.

In fact, however, and the fact is sufficiently obvious, the cavils made at the full discussion of this momentous measure merely illustrate the reckless intolerance of opposition which is more and more characterizing the Radical party. It is practically asserted that a majority on the second reading ought to decide the whole matter, and, as was seen before the second reading was voted, it is further asserted that any proceeding other than a direct negative to the second reading moved and debated with the utmost speed is obstruction and factious delay. It is not easy to meet with argument a party which has avowedly dispensed with argument; but there is certainly no difficulty in showing the absurdity of the attempts to limit discussion of such a measure as that now before Parliament. As for its simplicity, it would be perfectly possible to repeal the whole Statute Book in a Bill of one clause, and every institution of the realm that does not depend upon statute might with a little ingenuity in draughtsmanship be abolished by another Bill of a single clause or by a second clause in the same. The measure now before the House, simple as it stands, is in effect a larger measure, and one involving more complicated issues than any that has been before Parliament within living memory. The effects for good or for evil which it must produce are vaster, the indirect consequences in the way of opportunity given to party manœuvring which it involves are more numerous and intricate than those of many a Bill whose clauses and sections and subsections have been numbered by scores and hundreds. The pretended duty of dealing with it as merely a little Bill of half a dozen simple provisions may pair off with the pretended right of "tacking" itself—a right very similar in nature to others actually claimed by modern Radicalism. In such a case craft must be met by craft, and the trick of dissembling complex issues in a simple Bill by the expedient of disentangling those issues, and considering them separately, in the form of amendments. Nor, if Ministerial partisans were wise, would they make such a pother over the matter. For this desperate impatience can only suggest what has been already hinted at—a profound sense of insecurity as to the temper of Parliament and the possibility of keeping the majority together.

GHOSTS AGAIN.

As the Nineteenth Century does not publish an illustrated Christmas number, Messrs. GURNEY and MYERS present their tale of "Apparitions" in the flowery month of May. The name "Apparitions," which the champions of Psychical Research have given to their article, is a little misleading, as appearances often are. But seemingly an editor who invented "Brain Waves," and who says he does not think the term a metaphor (still less a mixed metaphor), will allow the article to be the first of a series. Beginning, as in the present number, with mere anecdotes about psychical discomfort, the authors will finally lead up, we trust, to a genuine apparition, very old and curious. There is a great deal of argument and reasoning in this paper, reasoning and argument which we fear the public will skip, especially as the beginning of the season is a period somewhat frivolous and flippant.

The advocates of the old-fashioned ghost maintain that a question which has been agitated since the days of cavemen may now be settled at last by statistics. They appeal, like Mr. GALTON, to the public for statistics, and their appeal may be listened to in an age when "vice is expected to be "decent, art to be moral, and science to be popular." Ghost stories, indeed, were popular before they were scientific. "The public are for the first time being made partakers "in scientific work," cry our authors, just as it might have been observed, "The public are for the first time "being made partakers in artistic criticism," on a recent occasion. Unluckily, just as experts in art would have none of the public verdict on sculpture, so experts in science as a rule deny the name of "scientific" to the methods of Psychical Research. This may be mere professional jealousy and prejudice; still, perhaps the scientific world knows as well as other people what deserves the name of "scientific," and what not. But we are prepared to admit that, if shots at the meaning of Amalekite cylinders are a branch of "science," so is the collection of ghost stories.

A serious philosopher (in whose works we do not remember to have seen the statement) is said to remark that "The number of well-attested coincidences between the appa- "rition of a person and his death does not exceed the "limits that the laws of chance allow." If there are as many as three well-attested instances of a moribund person being in several places at once, we incline to think that the coincidence does exceed the limits that the laws of chance allow. The coincidence is the miracle, you cannot explain the miracle by the coincidence. Messrs. MYERS and GURNEY have attempted to collect instances of both sorts. They want people to tell them tales of strange experiences, but they also wish to find out what proportions of people are without strange experiences (subjective chiefly) altogether. If the whole of humanity could be polled, an average, and a conclusion, might be got by this process. Say that thirty billions of people never saw or felt anything out of the way, that thirty thousand people had seen absent friends at the moment of their death, and that nine or ten millions of men and women had enjoyed presentiments which came to nothing, and had beheld absent people without rhyme or reason or coincidence. Then you might say, as ten millions are to thirty thousand, such are the odds that an apparition of a moribund person is only a coincidence and a fluke. Mr. PROCTOR has published a good many cases of these extraordinary coincidences that seem almost incredible, but had nothing extra-natural or psychical about them. The statistical method would give the odds in favour of, or against, any coincidence being what the laws of chance allow.

Unfortunately, no body of instances can be collected large enough to found a conclusion upon—that, at least, is how the matter strikes us. You need not a few hundred cases, or even a few thousand, but millions. The specimens secured by the Society of Psychical Research will be too poor to argue upon. Let us give an example.

In the Fortnightly Review Mr. MYERS publishes personal reminiscences of the late Duke of ALBANY. It appears that the Prince was a good deal interested in ghost stories and strange experiences of a supposed extra-natural character. Mr. MYERS adds, in a foot-note, an anecdote which has already, we believe, blossomed in the London letters of some correspondents of country newspapers. Two days before his death ("writes a friend from Cannes") the DUKE "would talk about death." The lady to whom he spoke on this topic asked him why he chose it, and he informed another lady that "for two nights now the Princess ALICE "has appeared to me in my dreams, and says she is quite "happy, and wants me to come and join her."

This anecdote might, to some minds, suggest the opinion that an extra-natural warning was permitted to the Prince. But, in an earlier page, Mr. MYERS has told another story, in which he avers that Prince LEOPOLD was not without experience of hallucinations even when awake. "It was at "Cannes, when suddenly the beach at Cannes became the "beach at Osborne, and every well-known detail was re-"produced with exactness." A man who had one experience of this kind when wide awake might probably dream often enough of the dead with considerable vividness, and it is only reasonable to regard the tale of the warning dream (if authentic, and the evidence is very second hand) as a case of coincidence.

We might go through the tales in Messrs. GURNEY and MYERS's article, and give an authentic "presentiment," or "warning," or sensation of discomfort, where nothing followed, for every example of theirs which was rendered interesting by a coincidence. The best tale is told by the Head-Master of Clifton, Mr. WILSON. When an undergraduate at Cambridge, he felt as if he were going to expire, and "thought he'd better name it," like the Brethren in Princess Ida. He did name it to a friend. "He pulled "out a whisky bottle and a backgammon-board; but I "could not face it." Which? Could not Mr. WILSON face the backgammon-board, or was he daunted by the whisky? The coincident death of a twin brother may by some minds be regarded as the cause of Mr. WILSON's discomfort. Similar incidents are well known to the stage, and all have heard of the two BLANCS and the Corsican Brothers. Of course some sympathy of unusual force may exist between twins. In the meantime, we are well acquainted with the case of a man of letters who experienced sensations exactly like those described by Mr. WILSON, and whose very face assumed the air of a dead man's; but—nothing came of it. Then we have a Scotchman's account of how he felt a mysterious call to go home; and, on arriving there, found that his wife had suffered from an accident. Against this we set the instance of a lady who, after her daughters had started on a water-party, felt an intimate and irrepressible certainty that they would be drowned. Something called her to hurry off to Paddington and stop them before they could take the train to Henley. She did not; and the young ladies enjoyed themselves very much. Indeed we have an apparition of a son—a clergyman distinguished no less in golf and cricket than in learning—who appeared to his mother when his body was at a distance. The anxious lady wrote off at once to her child, who assured her that nothing particular of any description had occurred to him when his wraith went wandering. Now, if his clerical throat had been cut "at that very moment," what a delightful, creepy coincidence, what an excellent apparition at the point of death, would have been afforded! But, as nothing coincided anywhere, the tale rather injures the coincidences. There is not so much in a coincidence. We have backed Zero at one table, merely because it had that instant come up at another. The speculation was successful, though the odds were thirty-six to one against it; but surely no psychical influence was at work on the wheel of fortune's roulette. That Mrs. ARTHUR SEVERN should waken and feel as if she had received a blow on the lip when Mr. ARTHUR SEVERN, at a considerable distance, was really the sufferer appears curious. But is it more curious than that one sister should dream she was pursued by a black monster, and at breakfast-time should discover that another sister had in a dream seen her thus pursued? In the innumerable multitude of dreams some must occasionally take a track where facts or other visions are encountered. Even the story of Mr. BROWNING's sleeve-links, which had been taken from a murdered man, and which made an Italian clairvoyant say "something here cries out "murder," may be explained in more than one way as obvious and natural as any psychical and extra-natural hypothesis. Indeed, to entertain such a hypothesis is to fall back on the pseudo-scientific explanation of matière meurtrière destroyed by MALEBRANCHE in the case of the Divining Rod. "We are obviously as yet only on the "threshold of Apparitions," say Messrs. MYERS and GURNEY, and we do not expect, in this life, to be more than dwellers on the threshold, or to see through the wall "that severs "ghosts from shadow-casting men." After all, our immediate interests are in life. Psychical Research will never be an antidote to Communism and Atheism. Belief needs faith, and cannot, any more than science, be based on ghost stories.

THE BUDGET.

THE three provisions of the Budget are, in the inverse order of their respective importance, reduction of the duty on four-wheel cabs, degradation of half-sovereigns to the rank of tokens, and conversion of Three per Cent. Stocks. Mr. CHILDERS gives notice that a much graver fiscal change is looming in the not distant future. He has borrowed from Mr. GLADSTONE, who can seldom be charged with bad taste in the use of language, the wantonly offensive title of Death Duties for the taxes which are properly called the Legacy and Succession Duties. The representatives of the landed interest have been often warned of their imprudence in meddling with the present adjustment of taxation. They have, it is true, obtained one of two instalments of a subvention in aid of local rates; and a further change in the same direction may possibly be made under the proposed County Government Bill; but Mr. CHILDERS plainly tells landowners that the Succession Duties are to be increased; and, if his words are correctly reported, he must be understood to mean that real property will be taxed more highly than personalty. The announcement had in former years been anticipated by Mr. GLADSTONE; but Liberal financiers have apparently doubted the readiness of the present House of Commons to add largely to the burdens on land. The opportunity for readjustment for which Mr. CHILDERS ostensibly waits will probably not occur till landlords and farmers are alike disarmed and disfranchised by the impending changes in the representative system. Some theorists hold that Succession Duties on real or personal property are more legitimate than other taxes, because transmission by inheritance or will may be regarded as a creation of positive law. It is much more certain that the incidence of such duties is in a high degree vexatious; and that they are especially burdensome when they fall upon the successor to land, who may be often compelled to procure the money by sale or mortgage. There seems to be no sound objection to a corresponding tax on property held in mortmain or in trust for public purposes. Corporations, though immortal, might, for purposes of fiscal symmetry, be supposed to die once in every thirty or forty years.

The remission of a fraction of the Carriage Duty is hardly worth discussing, though experience shows that the benefit will accrue to the trade and not to the consumer. Since Mr. LOWE repealed the exorbitant duty on horses and carriages let for hire, the number and the quality of flies, especially at roadside railway stations, have not been perceptibly improved. The present reduction is too small to produce any change in the amount of accommodation or in prices. The proposed debasement of a portion of the currency has produced so much adverse criticism that it may possibly be withdrawn. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER wanted three-quarters of a million for the purpose of restoring the coinage to its full weight, and he was naturally unwilling to impose a new tax. The simplest plan, when the Government has to make a small capital outlay, is to borrow the money and pay it off in a limited time. Mr. CHILDERS prefers the alternative of substituting coins with an alloy of one-tenth for that part of the gold currency which is seldom sent out of the country. Whatever may be the merits of the plan, it ought to be recognized as an expenditure of the public capital, though it will cost nothing except as far as it diminishes an existing reserve. There seems to be no reason why the policy of debasement should not be extended or repeated. Tokens which are up to five pounds a legal tender would still be current at their nominal value if they were intrinsically worth only eight or seven shillings. Few persons, except bankers and money-changers, could state offhand the real value of a sixpence or half-crown; but all are willing to take a shilling in payment, because they know that it will always procure a shilling's worth of commodities. The apprehension that sovereigns might be discredited abroad by the proposed change in the value of half-sovereigns can, perhaps, only be tested by experience. Mr. CHILDERS's proposal involves the satisfactory admission that the loss on light gold ought to be borne by the State, and not by private holders or bankers. It would assuredly be much better to alloy half-sovereigns than to compel shopkeepers and their customers to return to the primæval method of dealing with coins as according to their actual weight as bullion. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has written a clever and spirited letter in condemnation of Mr. CHILDERS's proposal; but he entirely fails to understand the question. It is true that the Bank of England, if it receives half a million in ten-shilling tokens and pays out the same nominal amount in sovereigns, will have lost ten per cent. of the amount in gold. The drain of bullion would be ten times as great if the Bank exchanged gold for its own notes. If the ten-shilling pieces maintain, as tokens, their nominal value, the supposed transaction will involve no loss of value. There can scarcely be a doubt that ten-shilling pieces will be as secure as half-crowns against actual depreciation.

The conversion of a large part of the debt into a stock bearing a lower rate of interest had been foreseen since last year's issue of a large amount of Terminable Annuities in the place of Consols. The expectation that a reduction in the amount of Three per Cent. stock would raise its price in the market has been fully justified by the result. In any case, the stagnation of trade, the cheapness of money, and the comparative scarcity of first-class securities would probably have brought Consols to par. They are now at a premium of about two per cent.; but the price is still not high enough to secure the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER against risk if he were to give the necessary year's notice of compulsory conversion. Accordingly, he now offers 108*l.* in Two and a Half per Cent. stock, or 102*l.* in Two and Three-quarter per Cent. stock, for each 100*l.* of Three per Cent. Consols. As an inducement to accept the terms, the new stocks are guaranteed against reduction of interest or compulsory redemption for a period of twenty years. Fund-holders who prefer the retention of their present rights are exposed to the risk of compulsory payment at par whenever the Government may think it safe to undertake the operation. No holder will know beforehand the decision of other public creditors, though it will largely affect the expediency of voluntary conversion. If the owners of one-half of 400,000,000*l.* Three per Cent. stock were to accept Mr. CHILDERS's offer, the remaining half of the stock would be so considerably appreciated that he might perhaps be able at once to give notice of compulsory redemption. Some competent critics doubt the expediency of the creation of an intermediate stock at 2¾; but probably Mr. CHILDERS and his advisers have sufficient reason for trying the experiment.

The reduction of the annual charge of the debt, if it is effected, will furnish the best justification for the modern policy of paying off the whole or a large part of the principal. It is perhaps to be regretted that the proposed operation will increase the nominal amount of the debt. Some financiers will probably hold that it would have been better to wait till the price of the Three per Cents. rendered a compulsory conversion safely practicable; but in such cases a certain confidence may reasonably be reposed in the official judgment of those who are responsible for the choice between alternative measures. As long as Consols were below par, reductions of the debt were most conveniently effected by purchases in the market. Payment of the nominal amount would now be more advantageous to the State. The present high price partially strengthens the contention of those who formerly doubted whether it was worth while to improve or maintain taxation for the purpose of investing the proceeds in the discharge of debt, with a return of three and a quarter per cent. Fifty years ago the proposition that it was expedient to leave the money to fructify in the pockets of the people was generally accepted; but at that time Finance Ministers had ample employment for surplus revenue in the abolition of taxes which were injurious to trade and industry. It was undoubtedly more desirable to liberate the manufacture of bricks, of glass, and of paper, than to pay off portions of the debt. The present Excise Duties are comparatively unobjectionable; but, on the other hand, money applied to the payment of debt is invested at a lower rate of interest. There are, perhaps, political and social reasons for reducing the national liabilities; but, as it has already been said, the best economical argument in favour of such operations is that they facilitate the reduction of the interest.

It may be hoped that Mr. GLADSTONE's economical experiments may not, as in 1853, be interrupted by the burdensome consequences of a rash and timid foreign policy. The existing Two and a Half per Cent. stock was then created by a conversion of the South Sea and of some other minor stocks. It was Mr. GLADSTONE's avowed object to establish a market for stock of the lower rate of interest, in the hope that it might tend to accelerate a general reduction of the annual charge. About ten years before, Mr. GOULBURN, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, had succeeded in a compulsory conversion of the great mass of Three and a Half per Cent. funds. It was impossible at that time to repeat the operation; but probably the measure of 1853 might have gradually effected its object, if the Russian war had not shortly afterwards begun. Mr. GLADSTONE, though he was then not in the front rank of the Ministry, contributed to the disastrous policy of his colleagues the absurd device of taking a vote for the expense not only of sending the Guards to Malta, but of bringing them home. A series of invitations to encroachment was readily accepted by the Emperor NICHOLAS; and one result was that the reduction of the interest on the debt was postponed for thirty years. Mr. CHILDERS shares, at least nominally, the responsibility of summoning the Conference on the affairs of Egypt which seems to almost all politicians outside the Cabinet pregnant with danger, if not with war. The success of the proposals embodied in the Budget is contingent on good fortune, which, however welcome, will be undeserved.

FOREIGN OPINION ON EGYPT.

IT is as easy for those who manage the affairs of this great Empire to make too little, as it is to make too much, of foreign judgments respecting it. Yet to ignore it altogether is infatuation. Men engaged in the actual conflicts of political life have undoubtedly a touch of certain facts of the situation which a mere spectator cannot have. Nevertheless, in many cases the spectator's judgment is more trustworthy. The actors in great political events cannot, do what they will, view them impartially. They are—in this country at least—tied by Parliamentary tradition; by party ties, which men long engaged in public life find it hard, and often impossible, to break; and by the bonds which their past words and actions put upon them. An intelligent observer of public affairs who has never sat in Parliament will for this reason often give a much sounder opinion respecting them than one who has. In the first place, he feels free to speak just as he thinks; and, in the next, his thoughts are shaped by the evidence which comes before him, and not by forces which have nothing at all to do with evidence. For this reason, in all important affairs, a wise man, before committing himself to any line of action, will take pains to gather, not only the views both of his friends and of his opponents, but also and particularly of those who are presumably impartial. He will not seek the opinion of others because he has not an opinion or purpose of his own, but simply because no one can act effectively who ignores the opinion, and consequent action or inaction, of others. Those who are in favour of a policy directed to national and imperial, not to cosmopolitan or humanitarian, ends will be on these grounds not inclined to let the movements of foreign opinion escape their notice. It is not that an English Government should follow the advice of foreign Governments or the tendencies of public opinion in any country abroad. On the contrary, our policy should be simply national and imperial; but a just estimate of the nature and strength of foreign feeling is a factor in the estimate of how and why the policy which we have at heart is feasible.

Now the present Government has contrived to treat foreign opinion with ideal stupidity. On the one hand, it has attached a morbid importance to it; and, on the other, has not looked it in the face to see whether or not there was anything in it to be feared. In the words, in the acts, and, it may be safely said, in the thoughts of the Cabinet, the one thing only that can be construed into something like a resolute purpose has been to look to somebody else to make up their minds for them. And, like most people who do not know their own minds, they have earned nothing but the contempt of those to whom they now helplessly look for guidance. The one thing which in the course of Mr. GLADSTONE's present administration has won the respect of foreign opinion—and we can safely appeal both to the action of foreign Governments and to the whole tone of the foreign press for the accuracy of this assertion—was the first intervention in Egypt. It is true that wiser counsels might and ought to have made it unnecessary. But when the emergency came, the Ministry for once acted with vigour and intelligence. And at that particular moment their vigour and intelligence stood out in striking contrast with the vacillating and unintelligible policy of the other Powers most nearly interested in the Egyptian question. Public opinion in France was unwilling that that country should co-operate with England in Egypt for fear of the wider complications which French action might involve. Public opinion in Italy was in favour of co-operation with England. Italy was also materially ready for co-operation, for at the moment of our intervention the annual manœuvres of the Italian army had placed a more than sufficient body of troops on a war footing. But the Italian Cabinet, with the infirmity of policy which the state of parties in the Chamber has long encouraged, ignored both the plain interests of Italy and the plain feeling of the country. The opportunity was let slip, and England was suffered to do the work alone. For the first time since the fall of Lord BEACONSFIELD'S Administration, it seemed that something intelligible, purposeful, and manful inspired HER MAJESTY'S Ministers. We agree with both Conservative and Radical critics that the war—or, as Mr. GLADSTONE prefers to call it, the military operations—in Egypt ought not, with the reasonable management which all sensible men use in their private affairs, to have ever happened at all. Nevertheless, granting the errors which led up to anarchy in Egypt, it cannot be denied that our intervention became at last imperative; and that intervention restored to this country much of the credit and authority which a couple of years of Gladstonian rule had caused it to forfeit.

If only that intervention had been the result of a settled policy, and not of a spasm! If only it had been the action of serious statesmen, dealing with weighty affairs in a far-sighted spirit, and not the chance effort of a divided Cabinet! But such as it was, it placed England in the position which she must always maintain as the preponderating Power on the Nile; and all that has happened since—the blunders, the vacillations, the alternate fits of temerity and cowardice, the mixture of "bloodguiltiness" and of turning one's cheek to the smiter, the evasions and the equivocations, the reckless confidence in a single man, and the scandalous indifference to his safety—all have not undone the effect of our intervention. We are still there; it depends only on ourselves whether we stay there or not; and, if we go, another Power, or other Powers, will be there in our place. We are there, too, it must be remembered, far more by the force of opinion than of arms. It is the intrinsic reasonableness of our claim to preponderate in Egypt which alone can permanently enable us to do so. If France were now to attempt in Egypt the same coup de main which she carried out three years ago in Tunis, the first successes would be on her side. And, if England is to maintain her place possibly, but not necessarily, as the protecting Power, though assuredly as the Power which must exclude the protectorate of others, we shall do so by (next to our own resolution and intelligence) the common agreement of the world that our interests there are more permanent and more substantial than those of other countries. There is little that is sentimental in our relations with Egypt. Much, though perhaps not all, of the interest which the French people take in that country is an affair of mere windy feeling. NAPOLEON, in telling his troops at the battle of the Pyramids that forty centuries were looking down upon them, gave them to understand, with archæological inaccuracy but with much practical knowledge of the French character, what the main interest of France in Egypt amounts to. It is, for the most part, a sentiment without historical, political, or geographical foundation. NAPOLEON appeared as a conqueror in Cairo and Alexandria, as he did in most European capitals, except the one in which we write; but the French expedition to Egypt, which ended in defeat at our hands, gives France no more prescriptive right to speak with authority on Egyptian affairs than the still more disastrous campaign of 1812 would justify her in taking a similar tone with regard to Russia. Our own interests in Egypt are real, vital, imperial.

We have followed with some care the course of foreign opinion on the Egyptian question, as reflected in the newspapers; and the agreement of opinion among those who are friendly, unfriendly, and indifferent to this country in condemning the action of our Government is so strong as to leave no doubt in any mind open to reason as to how others see us. Whether Mr. GLADSTONE is infallible, and the rest of the world under a strong delusion, may be an interesting question for speculation. CARLYLE somewhere tells the story of the man who stood on his head in public, and then declared that all the bystanders were topsy-turvy. It may be said in reply to what we are now observing that the French papers are naturally embittered against us. Nevertheless, when we do anything sensible and consecutive, they speak of us, not indeed kindly, but with respect. If the tone of the German press has been, ever since Mr. GLADSTONE'S accession to office, often unfriendly and generally contemptuous, is the cause to be sought in German lack of intelligence, or in the mistakes of our own Government? Are we, as a nation, at the present moment prospering in the world? Do we find any of the outward and visible tokens that other nations think well of us? If there is a foreign country where Mr. GLADSTONE enjoys an especial personal prestige it is Italy. Yet we believe that we are accurate in saying that no single journal which speaks with the least authority has failed to condemn his recent policy. Indeed, outside the columns of the merely party organs in England we should be glad to know what paper in any part of the world with a reputation to gain or to lose maintains that the present course of our Government is wise or creditable. CAVOUR, not a less sagacious statesman than Mr. GLADSTONE, made it a cardinal point of his policy to win over the public opinion of Europe to his side before making his astonishing strokes of policy; and Prince BISMARCK, who cannot be said to be even inferior in sagacity to CAVOUR, has repeatedly shown, in opposition to his personal tastes and inclinations, how truly he deems it a power which cannot be safely ignored by the strongest and most autocratic Minister.

CREMATION AT WESTMINSTER.

IT would perhaps have been better for the reputation of the House of Commons if, according to the new Radical theory of its duties, Dr. CAMERON'S Cremation Bill had been voted upon without being debated. There is doubtless a good deal to be said for the decision and against it; but the speakers for and against contrived, with remarkable ingenuity and unanimity, either not to say it or to say it as badly as possible. Neither Dr. CAMERON nor any of his supporters grappled manfully with the obvious difficulty that the practice they champion adds to the danger of insufficiently certified deaths, and that the measure which they advocate made no attempt to improve or strengthen the present means of certification. None of them really faced the strong, though perhaps exaggerated, sentimental dislike to the practice, and several of them exaggerated the supposed religious dislike. On the other hand, none of the opponents of the Bill attempted to tackle seriously the very awkward fact that, according to high and unchallenged judicial opinion, there is absolutely nothing to prevent all of us from cremating each other in our back gardens except the possible objection of the neighbours. Cremation, since Mr. Justice STEPHEN'S decision in the matter of Dr. PRICE, stands in precisely the same position as organ-grinding. If anybody with a locus standi objects to the organ-player, he must not grind in a certain place; and if anybody with a locus standi objects to the cremator, he must not cremate in a certain place; but otherwise there is no more possibility of stopping cremation than there is of putting an end to the murdering of "Là ci darem" or "Che farò?"

If Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had announced any intention of taking steps to put this anomalous condition of things out of its condition of anomaly, if Sir RICHARD CROSS had urged his successor to take any such steps, both would have been in relatively strong positions. But at present they seem to be of opinion that, if they cannot stop indecent cremation, at least they can take care not to organize cremation into something like decency. The impartial inadequacy of the general argument on both sides was faithfully sustained in points of detail. When Dr. CAMERON talks about prohibiting cremation being a reactionary step, he talks language which is good enough for a local Caucus, but which really ought not to be talked before the House of Commons. A man who starts back from a dead cat or an open drain takes a reactionary step—and a very sensible one. The cursed word "reactionary" has not in itself any more virtue or vice than the blessed word "Mesopotamia." On the other hand, the remarkable collection of miscellaneous and inaccurate learning which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT brought together was not much more relevant than it was accurate. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and that great authority WACHSMUTH think that the Greeks did not burn their dead as a general practice. LUCIAN, who perhaps knew the Greeks as well as WACHSMUTH, and who was nearly as clever a man as Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, says exactly the contrary. Moreover, Sir WILLIAM ought surely to have remembered what is perhaps the finest passage in all Greek poetry, that which tells how the balance-holder ARES, the changer of bodies for gold, sends to the loving ones at home, instead of their heroes, the shapely urns filled with scanty dust fresh from the pyre. But perhaps ÆSCHYLUS, as a wicked Tory, has been excluded from Sir WILLIAM'S recent reading. As for the disuse of burning when the Roman Empire became Christianized, it is by no means certain that this had much to do with either Christian principle or Christian prejudice. Therefore the whole parallel from ancient times is practically as valueless, on the one side, as Dr. CAMERON'S bugbear of "reactionary" is on the other. Considering, indeed, the calibre of some of the arguments used, it is rather surprising that nobody pointed out how greatly the revived use of what upholsterers are pleased to call "overmantels" would assist the convenient and seemly disposition of urns, or brought in Mr. WATHERSTON'S favourite subject of the silver duties, and argued that, with remission and the introduction of cremation, CELLINIS in shoals could not fail to be developed, and the art of the goldsmith would rise from its low estate in Britain. This would have been as amusing, and certainly as reasonable, as Mr. LABOUCHERE'S remarkable statement that opposition to cremation is opposition to the laws of nature, or Sir RICHARD CROSS'S equally remarkable, though more accurate assertion, that practical politics are not governed by philosophy. Apparently Mr. LABOUCHERE is under the impression that spontaneous combustion is the natural end of a body left to itself; otherwise it is not easy to see how those who oppose cremation oppose the laws of nature. And if practical politics are not governed by philosophy (which, considering the Government which has now been in power for four years, is quite true) so much the worse for practical politics.

It is unfortunate that no one in the House took the trouble to clear away all this rubbish on both sides, with other rubbish (such as the plaintive remark of a right reverend prelate not long ago, that the dead were shouldering the living out of the country), and to discuss the matter reasonably. There is a very great deal to be said on both sides. But the first thing to be said is, that obviously things cannot go on as they are. It is disgraceful to public decency that such a proceeding as that recently carried out in Wales should be permitted, and yet not in some way or other regulated. It is not only disgraceful, but it is extremely dangerous. Had the man LAMSON, instead of committing the clumsy crime for which he justly suffered, taken a house in some unfrequented district, poisoned his brother in-law, furnished the district registrar with a proper certificate, and cremated the body, à la Dr. PRICE, on a neighbouring moor or hill, it would appear that there would have been not only no means of detecting his crime, but none of interfering with his proceedings. There is thus in the present state of things at once a public scandal and a public danger. If it be thought that the extreme difficulty of guarding against foul play with cremation, the undoubted feeling against it which exists in the minds of a large number of people, and the difficulty of arranging for it either on a large or small scale, be decisive, then let some means be taken to prevent such performances as those of Pontypridd. If, on the other hand, the arguments of the innovators find favour (among which arguments Dr. CAMERON'S talk about reaction is certainly not to be counted), then let some Bill with better and stronger safeguards than those of Dr. CAMERON'S very unskilfully-drawn measure be devised and presented to Parliament. Between these two courses there is, as the law has now been declared to stand, no middle course. When Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT tried to meet the case against him by saying that, "as far "as he knew, the law was silent about cannibalism," he used one of those arguments which continually surprise his friends and enemies alike. It is difficult to understand how such a very clever man can say such very silly things. Perhaps in his capacity as Home Secretary Sir WILLIAM has heard of several cases of cannibalism in England recently, of an active if not considerable section of the population who are anxious to become cannibals, of restaurants arranged for their gratification, and applications to the City Markets Commissioners for stalls in Farringdon Street. Other people have not heard of these things, but they have heard of parallels to all of them in the case of cremation. On the other hand, the scientific advocates of cremation will be ill advised if they continue to urge their cause by drawing ghastly and loathsome pictures of the state of matters among the cold Hic jacets of the dead. That sort of thing is far more likely to create a possibly illogical, but certainly not unnatural, resentment against the wanton profanation of thoughts and memories sacred to all who think and feel. There are those no doubt to whom the idea of "two handfuls of white dust "shut in an urn of brass" is less melancholy, just as there are those to whom it is more melancholy than the idea of OPHELIA'S transformation; and it is quite impossible to balance or to decide between two moods of feeling. But in, at least, the preliminary stage the question is not one of feeling at all, or rather of a feeling which ought to be common to both sides. Irregular cremation is both a nuisance, a danger, and a scandal; it can only be stopped as a nuisance, and doubtfully as that. This is a state of things which calls for some action—whether action by way of prohibition, or action by way of regulation, is a question which might well have been discussed in Parliament, but unluckily was not.

THE GREAT CONSPIRACY.

THE grotesque names of the new explosives continue to be as familiar in our mouths as ever. Three or four times every week we hear that some villany has been done, or attempted, or threatened with them. Even when they are not mentioned, the class of person who uses them is found to be busy somewhere. It has got to such a pitch that every disaster is at once attributed, if not to dynamite, at least to the dynamiter. When a railway-bridge in Spain gives way, and kills more than a hundred passengers, it is instantly concluded that an Advanced Republican has been at work. Happily inquiry generally shows that misfortunes of this kind can be more plausibly attributed to the good old forces of folly and bad workmanship. The bridge in Spain probably came down, like the bridge over the Tay, because of the dishonesty of the contractor—a conspirator whose success in killing ought to turn the dynamiter green with envy. We are gradually learning more about the real nature of this latter pest. The preliminary inquiries into the charges against EGAN and DALY, otherwise DENMAN, now being conducted at Birmingham and Liverpool are in the highest degree instructive. Whether or not it is ultimately proved that the prisoners are guilty, there can be no doubt that a knot of equally silly and malicious intriguers have been very busy preparing mischief in this country for some years past.

The contents of the tin pot found under the elder-tree in EGAN'S garden are both funny and instructive; but much the most remarkable thing about them is their existence. The tin pot contained an elaborate constitution of something called the Irish Republic, and a variety of other documents of a highly compromising character. From these papers it appears that there are a number of conspirators in the Northern counties, and probably elsewhere, who cannot persuade themselves that they really are conspiring until they have written it all down on a big piece of paper. Then they shut the precious document safely up in a can, and hide it just where even a Scotland Yard detective would have sense enough to go and look for it. One of their intelligent chiefs carefully adds a number of other proofs of guilt, so as to make the discovery of their caché as dangerous as it was certain. If some cowardly crime did not come every now and then to show that they are in earnest after their mean fashion, it would seem that we had to deal here with a set of boys whose heads had been turned by reading penny-dreadfuls. The constitution is a piece of literature such as has been common enough from Servia to Peru for many a day. According to CARLYLE the disease of description-making came in just when JENNER had succeeded in nearly exterminating small-pox. The disease of constitution-making broke out about the same time, and has raged with equal fury ever since. The Irish have suffered from it as acutely as anybody, though, owing to the vigilance of the brutal Saxon physician, not quite so publicly. The last constitution—the last, that is, for the present—is, as far as can be judged by extracts, quite as good as many others, European and American, for which innumerable heroes have sworn to die. All the "whereases" and "thereofs" are in their right places. It proceeds duly from things to persons, and is illustrated by "another lengthy Fenian document" intended to show how the constitution is to work under the existing peculiar circumstances. The lengthy document sets forth the duty of every B. to his A., and is very explicit on the important questions of subscriptions. It is the first duty of a good Irish conspiracy to provide for A. and B. There are many nice little places in it for secretaries, civil and military, who are to recruit "boys" and collect pennies, which they also have the charming privilege of spending. How the pennies were spent is, naturally, not always plain. With a delightfully Irish ingenuity and prudence, the various officers of this conspiracy kept all their really dangerous receipts and accounts. From these it appears that, with appropriate gratitude, they have done something to encourage the trade of friendly Birmingham by buying arms. A few hundred rifles and revolvers were bought and stowed away till the happy day came for upsetting the British Empire; but a considerable margin must, however, have been left which was disposed of in ways easy to guess at.

The State Papers of the Irish Republic deal very largely with the personal concerns of its statesmen. In style they adhere to good old models. If it were not rash to suspect their authors of so much literature, it might be supposed that they had gone to the notes of MACAULAY'S History and copied some interesting Jacobite letter. All the simple-minded old disguises are found in them as good as new. The egregious authors talk about the "firm" and "long "cloths and short" just as if this jargon were not perfectly familiar to every police in Europe. Perhaps the most Irish feature of all this scribbling is the rule laying down the law as to what is "to be done with the black list of "traitors, spies, swindlers, and other criminals in the "I.R.B." If it was to work at all it obviously had need to look after this very large section of its members. Accordingly, it is not surprising to find a JAMES BARRETT writing to "Dear EGAN" to tell him how "KILMARTIN and "three friends came from Birmingham on Sunday night," and called "G." an "informer and rotten member." This pained "G." particularly, as it was said in the presence of sixteen fellow-members of the "I.R.B.," and BARRETT wants his dear EGAN to say what is to be done under these distressing circumstances. Again, a JOHN MORAN writes to say that "a centre from Bury, a very energetic fellow," had been putting nasty questions about the disposal of the subscriptions. The centre from Bury thought the money was going in a suspicious way, and he "as good as commanded" MORAN to be more careful. This appeared to "J. F. EGAN" to "be enough to make a saint swear." It was certainly enough to irritate an Irish conspirator. Accordingly, JOHN MORAN was wigged for listening to the "poor arguments" of the stranger. A person in authority in London was called upon to punish that meddlesome centre from Bury who wanted to know how the money went. "J. D.," the person in authority, was prompt to censure and point out that this sort of thing would bring about a "visit from "Scotland Yard, as there are a great many strolling about at "the present time." "J. D." was ungrammatical, but sagacious, and there has been a visit from Scotland Yard, to be followed by many others, let us hope. The light which this bundle of nonsense throws on the character of the conspirators goes to support a suggestion already made that the use of the cat should be extended for the benefit of the dynamiters. These venomous rascals have obviously got a love of theatricals of the sham heroic kind which would make them feel the moral unpleasantness of that punishment as keenly as the physical. Flogging makes it quite impossible for the sufferer to pose as a martyr.

THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

ON Thursday there was another debate as to the CHIEF COMMISSIONER'S scheme for Hyde Park Corner. On the report of Supply Sir ROBERT PEEL fulfilled his promise to bring the matter forward again. Unfortunately his speech was somewhat blustering in tone, like that of a man who has a bad case, and knows it, which was far from the truth. Several of his assertions were loudly contradicted, and the whole debate assumed an unpleasantly ill-tempered form. Sir ROBERT attacked the Royal Academy for their evidence in the BELT and LAWES trial, and for a petition they had put into circulation that morning. This was in itself a blunder. But Sir ROBERT PEEL went further and defended the statue. Here his audience were clearly against him. The Royal Academy may, as he asserted, be a "degenerate and meretri-"cious body," whatever that may mean, but calling them so will not make WYATT'S statue a good one. The line to take was that which Sir ROBERT adopted at first. The statue was placed on the arch in the DUKE'S time, with his approval, and with that of the nation and the army. But when he went into other matters the House was not with him, and, except for the singular speech of Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, the subject might have been considered settled when Sir ROBERT sat down. Mr. LABOUCHERE followed with a characteristic speech, and Mr. LOWTHER'S short plea, bringing back the House to a position which may be defended—namely, to the great DUKE'S own opinion—was wholly disregarded. The vote was carried by a large majority.

The speech of the CHIEF COMMISSIONER was well worthy of the speeches he made last week. He contradicted himself again and again in exactly the same odd fashion. He denied that he had sheltered himself behind the PRINCE OF WALES, and then proceeded to perform that strategical movement once more. He had only named the PRINCE "for the purpose of praising the public spirit "with which he had come forward." The PRINCE OF WALES will, no doubt, be highly flattered by this extraordinary excuse. Having patronized the PRINCE OF WALES, Mr. LEFEVRE proceeded to assert that Mr. BOEHM is an Englishman. As we observed last week, the one redeeming feature of the business consists in the undoubted power of Mr. BOEHM to give us a good work of art. Had Mr. LEFEVRE taken that line every one would have been with him. But when he says that Mr. BOEHM is an Englishman he challenges contradiction on all sides. He went on to repeat that three of the leading sculptors of the day refused to compete, but did not either give their names or explain why he had asked them to follow such a course. Neither did he say why, if he had wished English sculptors to compete, he appointed Mr. BOEHM without competition. In short, a lamer apology has seldom been put before the House; and Mr. LEFEVRE had much better have held his tongue, the more so as Mr. RYLANDS denied, on the part of two eminent sculptors, that they had been asked to compete. The result of the whole affair is that for months, perhaps for years, to come Hyde Park Corner will be in an incomplete state; and eventually we may have a fine foreign statue to add to the other foreign statues which testify to the countrymen of GIBSON and FOLEY that they cannot practise the art of sculpture.

COASTING AND TOBOGANNING.

THE severity of the American winter, with its continuous ice and its lasting snows, is made a source of pleasure by the ingenious and hardy people. Their winter sports are numerous and healthful. Skating is popular with all classes, and the number of experts is very large. Sleighing is also a common amusement; and, after a good fall of snow, the Seventh Avenue Boulevard at New York is one of the most animated places that one could wish to see. Curling is played by the Scotch residents, and an occasional game of baseball on ice is seen. Ice-yachting, of which we propose hereafter to give some account, is a unique and exciting sport. Nothing, however, is more popular in localities adapted to its enjoyment than coasting, which is simply sliding downhill on a small sledge. In Canada the people have almost given up the ordinary style of coasting for a variation of the sport known as tobogganning.

All that is necessary for the full enjoyment of coasting is a hill, with a good open bit of roadway at its bottom, a moderate amount of well-packed snow, and the sledge—or, as it is commonly called, sled. These sleds are simple contrivances, admirably adapted to the purpose for which they are used. The favourite kind is made of three pieces of board, one for the seat and one for each runner. The seat is sawed out in front in concave form, and at the rear has a convex overhang, like the stern of a cutter. The object of the concavity in front is to allow the rider, who sits well forward, free play for his feet in guiding the sled. The runners begin at the extremities of the concave front, and terminate at the point where the convexity of the overhang begins. They are made of solid pieces of wood, from six to eight inches high, and are shod with iron runners having convex faces. A sled made in this manner is very solid and durable, and has the quality, much desired by the American boy, of sitting close to the ground. It rides over uneven places in the course with great ease, and is guided with facility. There is another kind of sled, known as a jumper from the tendency it has to jump when passing over a slight unevenness in the ground. Its runners are made like those of a sleigh, with stanchions, and are shod with flat irons.

The favourite places for coasting in cities are unfrequented streets on hillsides. The pastime naturally wears the surface of the snow very smooth, and makes it unsafe for pedestrians or horses. Hence city ordinances usually forbid coasting within certain limits. Within the boundaries of every American city, however, can be found streets laid out, but with no houses in them. Here the small boy revels in his sport. He goes to the top of the hill with his sled, and, if he has room for a companion, takes the forward seat, with his friend behind. The force of gravity starts the sled down the slippery inclined plane. Every moment increases its speed, and before the bottom of the hill is reached it is going at a pace that quite takes away one's breath. The rider who sits in front guides the sled by occasionally striking the heel of his shoe into the snow, thus drawing the head of the sled the way he wishes it to go. This is the decorous method of coasting. It must be said, however, that the American boy, with his usual delight in being unbeautiful, is fonder of coasting in a much less dignified style. He likes, to borrow an expression from the game of euchre, to "go it alone." He seizes the sled in his arms and clasps it to his breast, with a mingled air of affection and delightful anticipation. Then he launches himself forward. The sled lights upon its runners, and the boy face downward upon the sled, the principal point of contact being in the region of the waistband of the boy's trousers. A momentary expression of surprise and regret may overspread the countenance of the boy at the shock of contact, but it soon fades away as the exhilaration of plunging downhill head foremost makes itself felt throughout his being, and he delivers many more lunges out behind with his stoutly-shod feet than are necessary for the skilful direction of his vehicle. Coasting may be enjoyed by a large party on one sled. The American boys are very fond of large sleds, and the principal kind is known as the "double-ripper." It is made by placing a long and narrow platform upon two sleds, one at each end. The front sled is attached to the platform by a pivotal contrivance, which permits of the sleds being turned to one side or the other in steering. The rear sled is fastened firmly. A party of ten or a dozen persons may mount such a sled, and, guided by some experienced coaster, go skimming down the hillside and along the level ground at the bottom for a surprising distance. The greatest coasting place in the United States is probably Boston Common. In this public park, situated in the heart of the city of Boston, there is one long walk which runs diagonally across the entire common. There is no steep incline, but a gentle descent, which makes coasting there a very safe and exhilarating, though not thrilling, sport. But the number and variety of sleds which are to be seen there, and the enthusiasm with which the Boston boy goes into the fun, make the scene enjoyable to the spectators, of whom there is always a goodly number. The best coasting on the American continent is undoubtedly at the falls of the Montmorenci, near Quebec. Away through the highlands to the north-east of the city the river forces its way until its waters are suddenly crowded into a narrow gorge, whence they fall a sheer two hundred feet into the St. Lawrence. A ceaseless cloud of dense mist arises from these falls, and when the pool below is frozen over, as it always is in winter to within a few feet of the foot of the falls, the mist collects as it descends, and is gradually frozen into two immense cones. One of these, known as the gentlemen's cone, is shaped like a sugar-loaf, and rises to the height of 150 ft.; the other is less lofty, reaching to an altitude of about 75 ft., and is flatter on the top. This is the ladies' cone. Steps are cut in the sides, and by dint of hard climbing the ardent coasters reach the top. Boys with iron-shod traineaux, or sleds, are always ready for employment. The coaster seats himself on the sled, with the boy in front to guide, and away they go down the steep and glassy side of the cone, at a pace that is appalling to the inexperienced, and always thrilling to the oldest lovers of the sport. The impetus gained is so great that the sleds sometimes run a mile over the smooth surface of the frozen river.

But in Canada, where winter sports are, perforce, cultivated to the highest point, the great pastime of the people, from the Governor-General down, is Tobogganing. This is coasting, as we have before hinted, in a different form. The tobogan is made of a piece of thin, tough wood, usually birch bark, though any wood that is fibrous and pliable will answer the purpose. The wood should be about $\frac{1}{4}$ths of an inch in thickness, and the tobogan is from 15 to 24 inches wide, and from 4 to 8 ft. long. This piece of wood is curved upward in front, and the forward end is held in place by a brace on each side. The tobogan is further strengthened by a light rod, about an inch thick, running along each side, and by several cross pieces of similar size. The tobogan is nothing more or less than an Indian sledge, and the name is a corruption of an Indian word. When the Indian goes to the woods in the winter to cut wood, or to shoot game, he always takes his tobogan with him to use in drawing home his load. Its broad, flat surface makes it ride lightly over the snow. This is its normal use, but the Canadians have found a way to make it an instrument of fun; and like all things that are adopted by pleasure-loving people of means, it has developed from a rather rough contrivance into something elaborate and often costly. The sport of tobogganning has grown immensely in popular favour within the past twenty years. The method of operation is apparently simple, but all who have tried it are quite ready to acknowledge that it requires coolness and skill. The present way is this:—a soft cushion is laid on the tobogan, and on this ladies and gentlemen—not more than three—seat themselves, with their legs tucked up in front of them, much in the manner of a tailor. The steersman mounts behind on the left knee, the right leg being used as a rudder. Having seen his passengers comfortably seated, he gives the tobogan a start, and away they go down the hill at a constantly increasing pace. Ten, twenty miles an hour are slow; the tobogan often goes at the rate of thirty. Formerly the steersman sat in front and guided the tobogan by the use of a bit of stick in each hand. If the head of the tobogan went too much to the right, he plunged the right hand piece of stick into the snow, thus drawing the tobogan in that direction. This had to be done very gently, as a too forcible dig would pull the vehicle round too far, and over it would go. It had, and has still, a provoking way of righting itself and going off down the hill at a tremendous pace before the scattered riders could regain their feet. The tobogan must be treated with gentleness and forbearance. It is a restive steed, and will not brook rough treatment, as many a tiro has found to his discomfiture. In the old days, when the tobogan slide was au naturel, the glacis of the citadel was the favourite spot at Quebec and Kingston, while at Montreal it was the mountain. Now, however, tobogganing is a cultivated plant and the slides are built for the purpose. An inclined plane 50 ft. high and about 150 ft. long is built of heavy timbers. On one side is a walk by which the tobogganing parties return to the top after having slid down. The central part of the plane is divided into two or three slides with ridges of snow between them. The slide itself is well sluiced with water in good freezing weather, and soon presents a glassy surface. The tobogans fly down these perfectly smooth sides at an astounding rate, and run far along the level ground at the bottom. Montreal has five clubs for the cultivation of this sport, and each has its own slide. The Montreal Club, founded in 1879, until recently was the only one. It has a fine ground on the mountain-side above Sherbrooke Street, near Côte St.-Antoine. It has four slides, one 800 ft. long, the others 500 ft., and a club-house. The Tuque Bleue Club, founded November 26, 1883, has now more than 500 members. It has an artificial slide, 40 ft. high, at the Montreal Lacrosse grounds. The slide is 32 ft. wide, has four four-foot shoots and two stairways, and is 450 yards long. The Park Club, which was formed about the end of November, 1883, has now over 600 members. The club has a wooden shoot, or slide, 20 ft. high and 140 ft. long. The entire course, however, is about 1,400 ft. long, and has a descent of 84 ft. The Lansdowne Tobogganing Club, named after the Governor-General, was formed on December 22. The Governor-General and Lady Lansdowne have become its patrons. It already has over 350 members. The slide is on Fletcher's Field, a wide public space below the mountain. It begins with a wooden shoot, 12 ft. high and 50 ft. long, and the entire course is 600 ft. in extent. The Beaver Club was organized on January 14, 1884, and already numbers more than 100 members. The wooden shoot at Marlborough and St. Mary Streets is 12 ft. high and 112 ft. long, with a course of 600 ft. extending upon the river. On ordinary nights these courses are illuminated with torches and large lamps. Chinese lanterns and decorative illuminations are employed on special occasions.

Of course, during the great ice carnival at Montreal, tobogganing is at its height. The costumes of the various clubs are picturesque, and the dresses of the ladies are arranged with a special view to producing a pretty effect. One would think that the position of a lady upon a tobogan must necessarily be awkward; but the Canadian women, who are straight, strong, healthy, and comely beings, are adepts at the management of their costumes. The Governor-General took the first ride down the slide of the club bearing his name at the recent carnival, thus formally opening it. The town lived on tobogans, skates, and snow-shoes; and visitors from the United States went home to dream that they were tobogganing down hills 1,000 feet high with no tobogan.

LEO XIII. ON THE FREEMASONS.

THE Encyclical against the Freemasons issued by Leo XIII. on April 20 can have taken nobody by surprise. The fact that his predecessors, as the document words it, "recognized this deadly enemy for what it was, and what it aimed at, the moment it left the obscurity of a secret conspiracy to step into the light of day"—to say nothing of the present tension of the relations of Church and State in Italy—would alone sufficiently explain such a procedure. And in fact his Holiness began by referring to the censures of some previous Popes, dating from Clement XII., who issued the first Constitution on the subject in 1738, and including the illustrious names of Benedict XIV. and Pius VII. And in its present form the Society cannot be considered older than the beginning of the eighteenth century, though it already includes more than 10,000 lodges and 100,000 members, and its own traditions claim for it no less remote an origin than the reign of Solomon, or even the Creation or the Flood, and thus Moses is alleged to have been grand master, and Aholiab and Bezaleel grand wardens. Others have variously connected it with the Templars, or the Rosicrucians, or the Assassins, and in later days with the Illuminati and the Carbonari. Certainly, as Hallam observes, it would be interesting to know more of the antecedents of the Society at a period when Masons were literally architects, and when it is remarkable that "they were never legally incorporated like other trades, their bond of union being stronger than any charter"; indeed their chapters are prohibited in an Act of Parliament of 3 Henry VI., because they fixed the price of labour contrary to the Statute of Labourers. But unfortunately, as Hallam adds, "the subject has been treated only by panegyrists and calumniators, both equally mendacious," and accordingly little is really known about it. Into the earlier history of the Order, if it had one, the Encyclical does not enter; we may have a word to say about it by-and-bye. Meanwhile the sweeping assertion of a writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica, that "no one now believes the stupid slander that Freemasons are engaged in any definite conspiracy against the State, religion, or social order," can hardly be accepted as it stands. There is at all events a very widespread impression that in this respect Freemasonry on the Continent differs greatly from its English form, and the same writer indeed himself adds that there is something in their fundamental principles, their indifference to theological beliefs, and their recent movements, which perhaps justifies the suspicion and even hatred with which they are regarded by Ultramontanes; and moreover "the German, Dutch, Belgian, and French magazines of the craft occasionally exhibit a temper which is not favourable to Christianity." It is hardly wonderful that an Association avowedly based on an ideal of unity, which at least ignores all distinctions of creed, and pays e.g. equal honour to the Bible in a Christian and the Koran in a Mahometan country, should be looked on with suspicion by many Christian believers who are not Ultramontanes, or even Roman Catholics. It cannot anyhow be denied that the Pope has a plausible case for his denunciation, and he is no doubt correct in saying that some even among the Masons have confessed that, assuming the principles of the Catholic Church, this action of her pontiff was amply justified. What strikes one indeed on the surface of the Encyclical, as compared with former papal utterances on the subject, is the moderation of its tone. It seems to be the ambition of Leo XIII. to restate from an historical standpoint, or what at all events he regards as such, the leading principles on burning questions of the day affirmed by his predecessors in a more uncompromising and arbitrary fashion. He does not condemn the Freemasons without explaining in detail the errors with which he holds them to be chargeable, and is careful to add that many excellent persons belong to the Society in ignorance of its true character. But a brief analysis of the Encyclical will best convey to our readers a knowledge of its general purport.

After referring to the warnings of former Popes, which however have failed adequately to arrest the growth of the movement, he notices the immense strides it has made during a century and a half, and the dangers thence ensuing to all authority both in Church and State, especially the latter, for the foundations of the Church are too secure to be shaken by any human power. Hence he resolved, from the moment of his accession, to do what he could to meet this serious danger, and he has already dealt with the question in previous Encyclicals directed against Socialism and Communism. For the Masonic must be viewed as one of many secret Societies, differing in origin, name, and form, but all alike bound by secret oaths imposed as a condition of membership, and having in the main a common policy and a common end. In this secresy and "sliness" they resemble the old Manicheans. There is also an oath of implicit obedience imposed, and those who neglect it, or betray the secrets of the craft, are threatened, and sometimes visited, with "extreme punishment," so dexterously inflicted that the police are unable to detect the criminals. This refers of course to the current reports of the assassination of persons deserting the Society and betraying its secrets. All this however must be understood of the sect "viewed as a genus," and having affiliated and cognate societies, not of the individual members, many of whom, though not free from blame in joining it at all, are ignorant of its real aims, and take no part in carrying them out. It has also different branches, and those who belong to one may know nothing of the more extreme theories professed in others. This is more or less true probably of the different "degrees" of Masonry, those who are initiated into the lower only not being acquainted with the special teaching imparted to members who pass into a higher grade. There are however, according to the Encyclical, certain leading principles common to all alike, and first that of "Naturalism," which denies divine revelation and therefore repudiates all dogmatic religion; hence its special enmity is directed against the Catholic Church, the authoritative guardian and exponent of that revelation. And from this follows a policy not merely of absolute separation of Church and State, and the entire exclusion of religion from public and national life, but of actual persecution of the Church, her clergy, her religious orders, and her primate, as exhibited in his deprivation of all civil power and the consequences which have flowed from it. Even on the principle of theism—which the Naturalists as such profess to maintain, while rejecting revelation—they are not agreed, and many among them repudiate religious belief altogether, and thus the very foundation not only of supernatural and Christian but of natural virtue is undermined, since the distinction of right and wrong and the law of justice and morality depend on the acknowledgment of a Divine Creator and Moral Ruler of the world; and this acknowledgment is weakened or imperilled, if not actually withheld. Moreover their denial of original sin and the consequent weakness and imperfection of human nature is fatal to the due practice of self-restraint and the cultivation of virtuous habits. Then again their treatment of marriage as a purely civil contract is no less fatal to the highest interests of domestic society, while their doctrine of human equality strikes at the stability of all civil government. On this disintegration of all authority, ecclesiastical, civil, or domestic, the Encyclical dwells at some length, noting that the Masons have meanwhile cunningly and hypocritically managed to ingratiate themselves with civil rulers in order the more readily by their aid to oppress the Church. On the other hand there can be no real conflict of interests between Church and State, which should mutually respect and support the rights belonging respectively to each in the Providence of God. In conclusion the Pope urges on the bishops and clergy the duty of employing all available means for the extirpation of "this impure plague, which is creeping through all the veins of the State." In the first place, the Masonic conspiracy should be unmasked and exhibited in its true colours; in the next place, the clergy are bound by assiduous preaching to impress on their flocks the sacred duties of religion, and in this great work laymen may effectually co-operate, whence the importance of fostering and propagating the Third Order of St. Francis, as well as other pious guilds and associations, such as that of St. Vincent of Paul; and above all the greatest care should be given to the formation and education of youth, as "the hope of human society," and this is an obligation which concerns both teachers and parents. Finally it is necessary to be instant in prayer, for no human efforts can avail to cast out these poisonous seeds from the Lord's field, unless the Master of the vineyard graciously deigns to accord His help to our endeavours.

There is little that can fairly be condemned as unreasonable in the substance of this Encyclical, especially in the practical advice which forms the conclusion. How far the Pope is justified in ascribing to the Masonic body the "Naturalistic" and other objectionable views with which he credits them, is a question not easy to determine in a case where the sources of authentic information, as Hallam complains, are so far to seek. It will be observed that he throughout treats the Society — as does the Encyclopædia Britannica — as only dating from the beginning of the last century, and takes no account of the venerable antiquity to which it lays claim, or its alleged connexion with Pythagorean, Eleusinian, and other mysterious systems in the course of its transition from the ancient to the modern world, or of the supposed relation between the old Roman collegia and the mediæval societies. It is said that such communities certainly existed in Gaul and Britain, and that there is evidence of invitations being sent from the West to the building corporations of Byzantium. Somewhat later the cæmentarii and liberi muratores seem to have grouped themselves round the Benedictine abbeys, and the abbots were often themselves architects. There was always a suspicion of dangerous liberalism about these societies, and they were condemned by some mediæval Councils. The charges against the Templars—which however were grossly exaggerated, if not wholly false—and their suppression at the Council of Vienne in 1311 are matter of history. But Freemasonry in its present form cannot be traced beyond the beginning of the eighteenth century. In England the first four lodges were established June 24, 1717, the leading spirits being Desaguliers, a French Huguenot, and James Anderson, a Scotch Presbyterian, who compiled the Book of Constitutions. There are now 60 provincial grand lodges and 1,200 lodges in England, besides a grand Chapter for the royal arch degree, a grand Lodge for the mark masters, a grand Conclave of Knights Templars, and a supreme Grand Council of the ancient and accepted rite of the 33 degrees. In Ireland the first lodge was founded in 1730 at Dublin, and there are now 350 of them; in Scotland the first grand lodge was opened in 1736, and there are now 400. We cannot stay to trace the history of the craft on the Continent, where it is very generally credited with a political and revolutionary character. In America there was a strong anti-Masonic agitation in 1826, caused by the kidnapping and supposed murder of a man called Morgan of Batavia by the Masons. There are several negro lodges in the United States. It is probably true, as has been asserted, that "Masonry takes its colouring in each country from the state of thought and feeling by which it is surrounded," and this may help to account for the alleged diversity of English and foreign Masonry; but it seems to be also true that its general tendency is in a democratic and non-Christian direction, though very many of its members may be both loyal subjects and orthodox Christians. The name of Free Mason has been derived from the Norman-French Frère Maçon, but various derivations are suggested for the word Mason. Between the fierceness of its Jesuit assailants, who found an eloquent spokesman in the author of The Jew of Verona, and the enthusiasm of attached panegyrists, it is difficult for outsiders, who are neither Jesuits nor Freemasons, to attain to any exact knowledge of the true state of the case. And until some further information is forthcoming they may be pardoned if they incline to the alternative suggested by Balaam, and neither bless altogether nor curse altogether a sect which comes before them in so questionable a shape that it absolutely refuses to be questioned. But the presumption must always lie against any secret association that its secrets are either too trivial or too criminal for exposure.

THE NEW YORK THEATRES.

As the season waxes in London it wanes in New York. In a few weeks now the assembled singers and songstresses of the world who have been divided between the rival Italian operas of New York will soon cross the raging main for the Italian opera of London. And with the departure of the Italian opera and the arrival of Barnum's Circus—his Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth—the New Yorker begins to discover that winter is past and gone, that the sudden and brief spring has arrived for a short visit, and that the torrid and tiring summer will be upon him in the twinkling of an eye. And when the New Yorker has made this discovery, the theatres find that their audiences fade and dwindle into nothingness, and that the eyes of the theatre-goer turn longingly to Coney Island, where nature provides grand effects of sea and sky and wind and wave altogether beyond the capacity of the most deft and ingenious of scenic artists.

The theatrical season which is now drawing to a close in New York began with a blare of trumpets, and bid fair to be one of the most notable in the annals of the American stage. And such indeed it has been, although it has not altogether fulfilled its promise. At the Academy of Music, the opera company consisted substantially of Mme. Adelina Patti, Mme. Etelka Gerster, and Signor Galassi—tres voces et præterea nihil—for the performances as a whole were unspeakably shabby. At the New Metropolitan Opera-house, the newness and rawness of the building itself, and the inexperience of the manager, united to deprive the performances of the perfection which had been promised. But the operas were handsomely mounted with all the glory of new scenery, rich costumes, and ample and appropriate accessories. Now and again Signor Stagno and Signor Campanini, Mme. Nillsson and Mme. Sembrich, Mme. Scalchi and Mme. Trebelli, took part in performances which quite came up to the high expectations excited at the beginning of the season. Herr Scaria, Herr Winckelmann, and Frau Materna are soon to give a series of Wagnerian concerts at the Metropolitan Opera-house, every seat for which was sold long before they arrived in America. At the beautiful Casino Theatre, with its rich Moorish architecture, Herr Millöcker's Beggar Student has been succeeded by a revival of Herr Strauss's Merry War, which has already had two long runs in New York, once in German at the Thalia Theater, and again in English at the Germania Theater, now the Star. The company at the Casino is one of the best ever formed anywhere for comic opera, and the performance of the Merry War approaches close to absolute perfection. The cast includes Mr. Frederick Leslie, Mr. W. J. Carleton, Mr. Perugini, Miss Lilly Post—a charming vocalist—and Mme. Cottrelly.

At the Star Theatre, Miss Ellen Terry, Mr. Henry Irving, and the Lyceum company appeared in the autumn for a month, and then set out on a tour of the chief towns of the United States. They were succeeded by Mr. Edwin Booth, by Mr. John McCullough, by Mme. Modjeska, and by histrionic artists of less importance. Neither Mr. Booth nor Mr. McCullough was seen at his best; and neither seemed to be in good spirits or in good health. The company which supported Mr. Booth was wholly unworthy of him—excepting only Mr. Eben Plympton, who acted in New York the same parts he played with Mr. Booth in London—and the performances were in marked contrast to the careful and elaborate productions which marked the early days of Mr. Booth's management of his own theatre. Mme. Modjeska's engagement was made memorable by the production of Nadjesda, an original drama by Mr. Maurice Barrymore, which proved to be a feast of horrors as to its incidents. It was, however, a strong and well-knit play, with a chief part affording most extraordinary opportunities to the actress. The primary situation of the prologue is not unlike a situation in M. Coppée's admirable drama Severo Torelli, which was produced at the Odéon in Paris about the same time that Mr. Barrymore's Nadjesda was done at the Star Theatre in New York. This situation is to be found substantially in the last act of Victor Hugo's Marion Delorme. No doubt it exists also in other plays. We note the coincidence without intending any reflection on the originality of Mr. Barrymore's play, which in other respects bears no resemblance either to Severo Torelli or to Marion Delorme.

Wallack's Theatre continues to live on the leavings of the London stage, and the only two plays which have there proved even slightly attractive and remunerative are Moths and Lady Clare. Of these the latter has been the more successful. It is well mounted, and the acting is not bad; it is machine-made acting, indeed, good enough in its way, but conventional in the worst sense of a word much misused and abused, and it is acting wholly devoid of dramatic vitality. The thick and ragged utterance of Miss Rose Coghlan and of Mr. Osmond Tearle in the chief parts lends credibility to the prevalent American belief in the existence of an alleged "English accent." The two young people are brightly and lightly played by Miss Measor and Mr. Buckstone; and Miss Helen Russell gives point and force to the impossible female villain Melissa Smale, who is from Yorkshire in the play as it is done in New York, and not from America, as in the play as it was done in London. To see Lady Clare, this blurred and heavy copy of the Maître de Forges, is to be moved to protest again against the English mania for dramatic decanting. The Maître de Forges is a highly ingenious novel, though plainly not of the first order of merit. In colour and feeling it is French, and this national quality is inherent in the situations, and not to be extracted by any process of "adaptation." It is a pity that we cannot have in place of this vulgarized, not to say brutalized hybrid, a simple translation or close adaptation of the original French play, retaining the essentially French characters, scenes, and flavour. At the Madison Square Theatre, where only American plays are acted, Mr. H. H. Boyesen's Alpine Roses has met with success. Mr. Boyesen is a Scandinavian by birth, but he went to America as a youth, and he writes English like an American. He is one of the new school of American novelists, and it was because of his success as a novelist that the management of the Madison Square asked him to write a play. Alpine Roses is a pretty and unpretentious idyl, founded on Mr. Boyesen's own short story Ilka on the Hilltop. At the Union Square Theatre, Separation, another American play by Mr. Bartley Campbell, has met with equal success. Although written before M. Sardou's Odette, Mr. Campbell's Separation is very like it; but the American play lacks the strength of motive which holds the French play together. Only the fine acting of Mr. Charles Coghlan keeps the part of the husband from being contemptible. Inadequate as the motive is, individual scenes are handled with strength, and there are lines of genuine beauty closely bordering on poetry, and the lighter scenes are in the true vein of comedy.

Altogether the most successful theatre in New York this season has been Mr. Daly's; and the latest play is perhaps the most successful. Mr. Daly was the first discoverer of the contemporary German drama. More than twenty years ago he made the first adaptation of Mosenthal's Deborah for Miss Bateman, who acted Leah throughout Great Britain and the United States. Ten years ago Mr. Daly turned his attention to German comedy, which had been singularly neglected by English dramatists. To this day The Gu'nor and Where's the Cat? and Our Regiment are the few recent plays of German origin known to the London stage. It is astonishing that no English manager has brought out the Big Bonanza, Mr. Daly's very comic adaptation of Herr von Moser's very comic Ultimo, or Lemons, Mr. Daly's version of Herr Roseu's Citronen. From Herr von Moser Mr. Daly also took the Passing Regiment, and from Herr Rosen another comic play, which he called Needles and Pins. From Herr d'Arronge he has adapted Dollars and Sense, and from Herr Schonthan Seven-Twenty-Eight. Mr. Daly's latest adaptation is called Red-Letter Nights, and it is from the German of Jacobson. It is an amusing trifle, admirably acted by Mr. Daly's admirable company. Like the other plays, it is produced in the United States by special arrangement with the German author, who receives a percentage of the gross receipts of the theatre. By several years' hard work Mr. Daly has succeeded in establishing in New York a theatre devoted to farcical comedy akin to that seen at the Criterion in London or the Palais Royal in Paris, except that Mr. Daly's plays are free from the slightest trace of the taint which clings to the deodorized drama of Gallic origin. By arrangement with Mr. Terriss of the Lyceum Theatre, Mr. Daly will bring his whole company to London in July to act for six weeks at Toole's Theatre in Seven-Twenty-Eight and Dollars and Sense, and perhaps in other of Mr. Daly's adaptations, as well as in Garrick's Country Girl and Cibber's She Would and She Would Not, two old comedy revivals in which Mr. Daly's excellent company has been very successful last season and this.

The latest addition to the many places of amusement in New York is the Eden Musée, an attempt to provide Americans with a rival to Mme. Tussaud's or the Musée Grévin. A handsome granite building, in the modern French Renaissance style, has been erected by a French company in Twenty-Third Street, near where Booth's Theatre used to be. Hitherto a really good collection of waxworks has not been seen in the United States; and the very word has a comic sound, recalling the late lamented Artemus Ward and the perennial Mrs. Jarley. It cannot be said that the present exhibition is altogether successful. The portraits are not as good as Mme. Tussaud's, and the various scenes and groups are not as well arranged as at the Musée Grévin. The models of Gambetta and of Bismarck are excellent, and those of Mr. Gladstone and President Arthur are appalling. A Napoleonic trilogy showed the neatness of the French dramatic faculty; one scene set in scenery set forth the death of the Prince Imperial in Zululand, and another set forth the death of Napoleon III. at Chislehurst, while between the two was a reproduction of Veli's statue of the "Dying Napoleon." The nationality of the artists is amusingly betrayed in most of the figures. Mr. Edison was born in Montmartre, and Washington is crossing the Delaware amid the ice in a boat propelled by Breton sailors. Even the wild roughs of the Far West who are hanging a murderer, by order of Judge Lynch, in the chamber of horrors below, passed the days and nights of their youth in the barrières de Paris. There is a story told—first by Mr. Locker, we believe, and then set forth in Punch by Mr. Du Maurier, if we mistake not—about an American Minister to England who said he had been to Mme. Tussaud's, and, when asked how he liked our waxwork, answered that it seemed to him much like any other English party. So the Musée Grévin seems much like any other French party—though it is hard to give vivacity to a wax figure. And so the Eden Musée seems like any other American party, in which there might be a strong admixture of foreigners, and especially of Frenchmen.

SCHOOL BOARD GRIEVANCES, REAL AND FALSE.

UP to this present not one of our statements regarding the School Board has been contradicted or explained away, for the very simple reason that we set down nothing but plain facts which did not admit of denial. The Chairman and other sensible members have replied to our criticisms with perfect tone and temper, and an effort has already been made to remove the faults and abuses which we pointed out. But unhappily the Picturesque Journalist has chosen to build a superstructure of legends upon the basis of our statements, and thus the good effect of our criticisms may be decreased unless we go a little out of our way to show how much of credit the Picturesque Journalist really deserves.

Take an astounding production called "At War with the Three R's," which appears in the Telegraph of April 21st. An excited School Board Visitor rushes up to the parish doctor and the Correspondent, and inquires whether the medical man "regards Mrs. Barlifter as a person in possession of her senses." The convenient doctor testifies to Mrs. B.'s sanity; whereupon the official explains that the woman had just attacked him with a half-gallon saucepan, because, as she remarked, he was "one of the gang of child-killers who worked the scholars to death by means of witchcraft for the sake of the blood-money the Government allowed for the job." Like a true son of science, the doctor at once rushes off to see the fond mother and study witchcraft at the fountain-head. Mrs. Barlifter then begins an oration which is couched in a dialect hitherto left unprinted on the phonetic system. The words "thrue" and "marciful" and "murther" are used frequently; but they occur in sentences of such fine grammatical quality that it is hard to imagine a low-class Irishwoman using them. Mrs. Barlifter extracts herself with ease and propriety from the most intricate parentheses, she generally uses verb and nominative with care, and only her occasional habit of dropping into the Dublin accent prevents her speech from being dramatic and pure. She says that, in order to get the capitation grant on each child, "whenever there's a lesson that it's past human powers to dhrive into them, the masters pat the boys three times on the head, and that's the charm that works on them, and in time their brains is worn out, and they knock under as you say, doctor, and the masters get the blood-money. And so the popilation of the poor is kept down so that there may be more for the rich." The Daily Telegraph Correspondent heard all this, for he was in the room. Let it be observed that the brother of the murdered boy was in school the day before, "and himself heard the word capitation grant spoken of, and come and tould" Mrs. Barlifter. The day before!! And the Visitor called at the house without knowing that the over-worked boy was dead. Very well. The Correspondent went with the doctor and saw the schoolmaster, who "in six months had taught the three boys to read and write and figure beautiful." The good master was distressed, for the two brothers (one of whom was the youthful informer who ferretted out the particulars about the capitation grant and the witchcraft) had both continued to attend school after Billy was dead and buried, so Mrs. Barlifter's suspicions were unknown to the school staff, and we cannot be surprised by learning that "the master failed to see the joke." We shall now see how a plain tale will put down this remarkable literary man.

1. If the Visitor called at the house, he could only have done so on account of the marks shown in the duplicate registers sent to him weekly.

2. Billy had attended regularly for six months, so on the first occasion of his non-attendance he was marked "Absent" in the registers.

3. At twelve o'clock on the same day a formal note would have been sent asking for the reason of absence. Billy's brother would naturally take the note, and when the answer came the lad would have been marked "Sick" in the Visitor's register.

4. If the Visitor called on a child who was marked "Sick" he would have exceeded his duty and wasted time.

5. When Billy died, then Dicky would have told the master; the word "Dead" would have been inserted in the register which reaches the Visitor every Friday night.

6. If the Visitor paid a visit without looking at the register, he neglected his duty; if he paid a visit after looking at the register and seeing the entry "Dead," he was a fool.

7. If the master sent away the register without giving such easily-obtained information to the Visitor, he will be dismissed, (and deservedly dismissed), for his district and school can easily be found by the simple expedient of issuing eleven circulars to the Superintendents of Visitors.

8. The words "capitation grant" would never have been used by the master at all. The masters received until recently one-half the examination grant on reading, writing, and arithmetic; one-half the grant on class subjects; and one-half the examination grant on special subjects; but no master would talk to boys about grants, and least of all about the capitation grant.

9. Every head teacher under the Board has been directly asked concerning the truth of the story, and none of them know anything about it. Q.E.D.

The next story, about a lad who went first to school at eleven years of age, refused to learn because he had a companion who could read "penny dreadfuls" to him, lost his learned companion, studied primers in corners till he could read words of three syllables for himself, and then resolutely refused to study anything more than Second Standard work, is plainly ludicrous.

1. The boy lived in a fairly good neighbourhood, for he had a bed with "sacking and mattress."

2. He eluded the Visitors by his own efforts for eight years, his father evidently desiring to send him to school.

3. He would not learn writing or arithmetic.

4. Yet he passed the First and Second Standards.

5. But if he was absolutely ignorant (as the writer says) of writing and arithmetic, he must have failed in those two subjects.

6. If he failed in those two subjects, he could not pass the Second Standard, for he would have been presented for examination in the First Standard twice in successive years.

7. Therefore, he never passed the Second.

8. No Second Standard boy could read "penny dreadfuls" unless he were exceptionally forward, because the numbers are as hard as the ordinary three-volume novel.

9. No boy could teach himself (as this boy did) to read three-volume novels by two months' study.

10. Any teacher who allowed a lad to remain blankly ignorant for twenty-two months out of twenty-four would be dismissed unless the lad were imbecile.

11. Therefore the whole story is mythical.

We have exposed this silly attempt to discredit the Board, because we do not desire to be associated with such sad puerilities. We are about to bring forward certain hard and definite contentions which might be discredited if we allowed them to be classed with the blatant concoctions of picturesque scribblers.

Three weeks ago we published a statement concerning a decent working-man who had been harried by School Board clerks. The man was brought before the magistrate a second time, and spent the usual bad quarter of an hour among the thieves and brawlers; he was then put in the dock, and pleaded his cause as well as he could. The prosecuting clerk overstated the "criminal's" weekly income by 10*s.*, and the Bench imposed a fine of 3*s.* This seems rather hard luck for the poor soul. He showed nineteen certificates proving that his children have regularly attended school for ten years; he proved that his boy is now in the Sixth Standard, having passed the fifth at the last examination; yet he was worse treated than the foul-mouthed rowdies who make fun of the visitors and never dream of paying their fines. His boy received the following testimonial from the master of the school, who is a rather distinguished University man:—"——— has been with me for the last five or six years in the above school, during which time I have had ample opportunity of forming a correct estimate of his character and qualifications. I know him to be truthful and trustworthy. For a long time he was my special monitor, having charge of my class, cupboard-keys, and my private desk. He is one of the most intelligent lads I have ever had under my charge, and I consider all his work excellent. He has passed Standard V. of the Educational Departments Examination. . . . I am sure that in every way he would give the greatest satisfaction."

Further than this, it appears that the boy obtained nine prizes for regular and punctual attendance, and the Honour Certificate granted by the Education Department. It is evident, then, that the man who was fined must have taught his children to be honest, or his son would not have been put in charge of desks containing money and cupboards filled with tempting knick-knacks; he must have kept the boy very regularly at school for three years, or the Honour Certificate could not have been obtained; and the unusual record of nine regular attendance prizes could only have been gained by a lad who, for five years, went to school on more than 95 per cent. of the occasions on which the place was open. Judging from ordinary evidence, we are inclined to think that this fined and worried man is a good, worthy citizen who has brought up his family in a reputable way. Was there no way of dealing with him save by putting him in the dock? Could not his children, whom he has so carefully trained and educated, have been spared the pain of seeing their father ordered about by policemen? We think so. These active and intelligent clerks cost 34,000*l.* a year; yet they leave 100,000 children out of school. Why not spend some time in looking after wastrels and vagabonds, instead of pestering and mulcting a poor respectable wretch who has obeyed the law invariably? This question we leave to the public.

Some other instances of vexatious action on the part of the beadles in mufti have been brought to our notice. Most of the visitors are careful to be inoffensive; but whenever a new official caste is created by law, certain members of the caste invariably assume lordly airs towards the public, and this disposition on the part of the visitors should be sternly checked. One official lately called at the house of a scholar whose name is pretty well known in England and elsewhere. The visitor asked if the householder's children attended any school; whereupon the housekeeper said "No," adding that there were no children, and further stating that her master was unmarried. The visitor again asked if the gentleman had no children, and, on receiving the same answer, inquired, with an obvious and unpleasant insinuation, "Are you sure?" This is the true rudeness of the beadle, and we think that it might, with advantage, be stopped at once. There are irritable gentlemen who might take it badly, although of course it may safely be ventured when only a woman is in the case. A few months ago a very poor woman alleged that she had been twice summoned, and that on each occasion the School Board officer had taken three shillings from her outside the police-court and had then sent her home. Counsel was provided for this woman, and the officer was subjected to an awkward cross-examination, but no answer could be got to the question, "Why were the two summonses not heard?" and there the matter rested. But this singular story is significant, as showing what an officer might do if he chose. It is nonsense to say that no such extortion could be practised by a tyrannical and almost irresponsible clerk. We know of several cases in which the Board has dismissed officers for extorting money from poor people. One fellow went so far as to go round and collect fines which had been actually imposed; another was sent away at a day's notice for squeezing money out of certain poor creatures whom he had frightened; another stole money on a really heroic scale; so, in the face of these examples, it is silly to talk about impossibilities. We do not wish to blame the Board unduly; we only say that their officers can make the poor very uncomfortable, and that the most rigid precautions should be taken in order that beadles may not develop into bullies. Besides gentle and benevolent visitors, who give advice and speak soft words, there are vain and petty roughs, who use their brief authority in a fashion that causes much unmerited pain to people whose lives are made hard enough without official interference.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.—I.

THE past week has been one of great excitement in the world of art. On Monday the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours and the Royal Institute opened to the public with their season's exhibitions. On Wednesday the Grosvenor, and on Friday the Royal Academy, had their "private" views; so that, in addition to the number of minor galleries, we have the four most attractive of the year all upon our hands together. In a first article it will be best to mention briefly a few pictures or sculptures which appear most meritorious, reserving detailed criticism for a future occasion. The multitude of works in the Royal Academy and in the Royal Institute contrasts unfavourably with the more select show of the Grosvenor and the old Water-Colour Society. It is, of course, well that young or struggling artists should have the chance of calling attention to their powers; but of the nearly two thousand pictures at Burlington House, of the more than one thousand at Prince's Hall, it may be asserted that the world would be very little the poorer if nine-tenths were lost; whereas it would be hard to spare even one or two from the Grosvenor or the Society's Gallery in Pall Mall. These select exhibitions are perhaps not so attractive to the general public; but they are very grateful to the critic, who finds himself saved the trouble of picking and choosing, and saved also from the fear which, in spite of what artists may say or think, most critics feel, of neglecting modest merit or the work of new artists who have their way to make in the world. The old Water-Colour Society has only tried and established painters in its ranks; and though there is, strictly speaking, no Society at the Grosvenor, an invitation to exhibit is issued to a very small company.

Taking the galleries in order we may begin with Pall Mall. There are only 301 pictures exhibited. Of these, in the order of the catalogue the most remarkable are as follows:—"View of the Amphitheatre at Pola in Istria" (6), by Mr. Glennie, a small work in size, but very large in treatment, and warm in colour; "A Lane near Dorking" (9), by Mr. Birket Foster, who also exhibits "Passing the Flock" (65), "A Windfall" (232), "An Itinerant Musician" (244), and "Gypsies" (252), all charming little works, especially the "Windfall," in which the bark of a tree is painted as only Mr. Birket Foster can paint it; "The Captive Princess" (27), by Mr. H. S. Marks, R.A., in which the birds are marvellous for their texture and their human expression, while the Princess is commonplace to the last degree; "A Deserted River-bed" (36), by Mr. A. W. Hunt, a very characteristic example of this charming artist, who also sends nine other works, some of which we shall have occasion to notice again; "Cutting and Tying Corn, Midhurst" (39), by Mr. Thorne Waite, a fine Sussex landscape by an artist of great power, who exhibits here four other pictures and at the Institute one, all of them well worthy of careful examination; "Chrysanthemums" (58), which bears the sad note in the catalogue "Mrs. Angell's last work"; there are several other lovely little pictures by this lamented artist, some of which we hope to notice at another time; "Entrance to the Port of Marseilles" (63), by Mr. William Callow, a fine work, large in treatment and bold; "Timon and Apemantus" (64), by Sir John Gilbert, R.A., in reality a landscape, the figures being wholly subordinated, gloomy in colour, and altogether pervaded with the sentiment of the melancholy lines from Shakspeare appended to it in the catalogue; "London Bridge, with St. Magnus and the Monument" (83), by Mr. Marshall, who sends other London views to this gallery; "Crowns of Flowers" (93), by Mr. Charles Gregory, a pretty little work, but spotty, as is also, but in a less degree, the same artist's "Deserter" (140), which, however, is a powerful and dramatic picture; "A Champion of the Cross" (101), by Mr. Lockhart, in which the Old presents the captive Moorish king to his mother; "The Silk and Calico Bazaar, Cairo" (109), by Mr. E. A. Goodall; "Snowdon" (113), by Mr. Whaite; "Ben Nevis" (115), a summer moonlight scene of great beauty, by Mr. H. P. Jackson; and Mr. Carl Haag's grand picture, one of the largest he has ever painted, "Eliezer returning from his Mission" (116). The white-robed Rebekah sits on her camel, which Eliezer leads through a rocky pass. A guitar is in her hands. Behind are followers on a long procession of camels winding through the narrow defile. This is a magnificent work, well worthy of the great artist by whom it is painted. "Viola" (125) is by Mr. Poynter, who exhibits at the Royal Academy a still more elaborate study from apparently the same model, as well as a "Psyche" (170) in this gallery. All are marked with the usual care and knowledge we have been taught by long experience to expect from this accomplished artist, who also sends a very pleasing landscape, "St. Radigund's Abbey" (201). We must return to this gallery before long, not having nearly exhausted the list of its treasures.

The Grosvenor Gallery, as we have said, resembles the exhibition of the old Water-Colour Society in the selectness of the gathering. In this preliminary notice it will be sufficient to mention only the most remarkable pictures, taking them rather in the order in which they occur to the mind than in that of the catalogue. By far the greatest work is unquestionably "King Cophetua," by Mr. Burne Jones. The beggar maid sits high on the throne, the King below her, and two choristers above in a kind of gallery. The King's figure, in fantastic armour, the crown in his hand, his shield and lance leaning against the wall before him, his love-sick look as he gazes up at the object of his adoration, is one of the most beautiful Mr. Burne Jones has ever conceived or painted. We wish we could feel as well satisfied with the lady. She is, in the first place, far from being lovely. Her hands hang listlessly down, and she does not in any way answer to Tennyson's heroine:—

> Her arms across her breast she laid;
> She was more fair than words can say.

Still, though it is easy to find fault, this is a fine work, and the finest by far in the gallery, if not, indeed, the finest of the year. Something more than a rumour asserts that an attempt will be made to obtain it for one of the national collections. Next, by way of contrast, may be mentioned Mr. Calderon's "Aphrodite, 'fresh as the foam.'" The goddess lies on a wave of the bluest Mediterranean, her golden hair floating behind her. The sea-gulls flock round her, and the water is streaked with foam. Whether as an idealization or as an exercise in harmonious colour, this picture is to be admired almost without reserve. Three portraits of Mr. Alma Tadema come next. One represents Herr Lowenstam, seated at his etching-board, with his copper before him. The second is Signor Amendola, who, with his graver in his hand, is chasing the surface of a metal statuette. The third represents a young lady seated, and, though not quite so pleasing a picture, is absolutely true to nature, with that ease of manner and pose which can only be given by the highest art. At the Royal Academy Mr. Alma Tadema has a large canvas, showing "Hadrian in England visiting a Romano-British Pottery." It is in the place of honour in the Great Room, and deserves the distinction; yet we have seen many of the artist's less ambitious pictures which we prefer to it. The Emperor, with his attendants, is on a kind of staircase-landing. The shopmen bring specimens of the so-called "Samian ware" before him, one of them mounting the stairs in front. Below is a counter where selling and buying are going on. There is a certain want of colour in the picture. The figure of Hadrian is by no means prominent. Well worked out as it is, this does not rank among the artist's greatest triumphs. The Grosvenor has two charming little pictures by Mrs. Alma Tadema, and the Royal Academy a larger one, "Saying Grace" (1642), a very sweet and pleasing work, showing a group of pretty children and their nurse at a table. At the Grosvenor the number of portraits is perhaps excessive, but most of them are very fine. Mr. Millais sends three, two of which represent Lady Campbell, first as a child, painted some years ago, and then as a bride. The third is the portrait of Lord Lorne, which the artist intends as a present to Canada. It is firmly but somewhat hurriedly painted. Near it is a second picture, "A Wood Nymph," by Mr. Burne Jones, a very decorative work in his usual manner. Two portraits by Mr. Richmond in the same room, "Miss Dora and Miss Rose Mirlees," will be much admired, the second especially for its finely composed landscape background. A portrait of "Mrs. Duff," with a background of conservatory foliage, by Mr. Collier, is very charming. Mrs. Collier comes very near her husband this year. Two nymphs on a sandy shore in an atmosphere of golden haze form a finely-conceived illustration of the line—

> By the tideless, dolorous, midland sea.

In her portrait of Miss Huxley (592) at the Royal Academy Mrs. Collier shows still higher powers. The drawing and colouring of the hand and arm, although somewhat dark, are among the best examples of the year. The Grosvenor Gallery contains excellent examples of Mr. Julian Story, Mr. Macbeath, Mr. Legros, Mr. Watts, Miss Tennant, Mr. Rooke, and Mr. Bateman.

The picture to which most sightseers will hasten at the Royal Academy is the "Cymon and Iphigenia" of the President. Yet it cannot be considered a satisfactory piece of work. Iphigenia is very fair, but Cymon is very tame, and looks at her as if the sight was the most ordinary in the world. The accessories are not happy, the trees being especially unpleasing. A golden light is over everything, but the moon is setting or rising in the background. Opposite to this picture hangs a still less satisfactory "Idyll, 1745" (347), by Mr. Millais. A soldier-boy, in a stiff, unnaturally scarlet uniform, plays his fife for the benefit of three girls, who appear to have seated themselves in the stream of a brook. On the same wall is Mr. Orchardson's "Mariage de Convenance" (341), a picture in which there is even more space "to let" than usual with this artist. A lady and gentleman, the latter elderly, are seated at either end of a very large table, over which hangs a lamp. A man-servant in attendance completes the group. The chiaroscuro is admirable, the colouring very harmonious, the expression of boredom but too distinct; yet this is a picture few people will care to look at twice. Mr. Long sends "Thisbe" (358), a Babylonian girl listening at a chink in the wall. The face is finely painted, but the wall is very flat and incomplete. Mr. Calderon's "Night" (340) is on the same side of the room, and will be generally admired. Two pictures by Mr. Hook (346, 352) are in his usual manner, the first, "The Mirror of the Sea-Mew," being by far the most pleasing. Mr. Poynter's "Diadumene" (368) is a very small, but very complete, nude study; and he also sends two remarkable portraits in crayons (1358, 1359), so different in style that it is difficult to believe that they are by the same artist.

The whole impression produced by the Academy this year is by no means favourable. It is not "up to the average," except in one feature, the sculpture, which goes far to redeem this branch of English art from the aspersions lately cast upon it. Mr. Thorneycroft's "Mower" (1356), Mr. Gilbert's "Icarus" (1355), Mr. Lawson's "Gladiator" (1309), some bronze heads by Mr. Kinloch, and a very fine relief by Mr. Bates, "Socrates" (1712), which we believe obtained the first prize at the winter competition, are all works of which any school might be proud.

The Institute of Painters in Water Colours, like the Royal Academy, suffers from a congestion of poor pictures. To find the good ones implies search. The large picture by Mr. Walter Langley, "Among the Missing" (275), will probably make a greater impression on the mind than anything else in the rooms. It is a sad scene feelingly rendered. The Cornish fisherfolk have assembled at the door of a post-office to gain tidings of absent boats. It is blowing hard, and the pavement shines with recent rain. An old woman leads away one of the bereaved wives, and comforts her as best she can. The faces are more highly finished than the draperies; but, taken altogether, this is a fine work, and well deserves the place of honour which it occupies. "Satisfaction" (244), by Mr. J. Nash, which hangs near it, is rather empty. Among the sand-hills of perhaps the Belgian coast a man in the costume of half a century ago lies dead on his face. A sea-gull hovers near. A very spirited portrait (22) of Mr. Linton, the President of the Institute, is contributed by Mr. Walter Wilson. "Summer and the Winds" (92), by Mr. George Wilson, is fantastic, but not without signs of careful study and of an eye for harmonious colouring. Mr. Walter Crane's "Diver" (108) will surprise the visitor by its excellent drawing and fine effect. "The Bazaar at Suez" (745) is a carefully-painted picture by Mr. Simpson, who has given his figures a most Oriental aspect. "Priscilla" (613), by Mr. Linton, is extremely pretty. We must reserve for the present a notice of the numerous and excellent landscapes to be found in this Gallery.

VOLUNTEERING.

THE author of John Bull et son Ile, with that vivid perception of the superficial aspect of things essentially characteristic of a Frenchman, has remarked that the rate of insurance is not altered for a man when he enrolls himself as a volunteer. And he observes, with a certain apparent justice, that the commercial value of a man's life is not, in the opinion of those most interested in the question, altered by his undertaking to defend his country. The French are a logical nation—a term usually applied to people who are enabled by consummate accuracy of thought to derive definite conclusions from uncertain premisses by the simple process of ignoring half of them—and there is no doubt much that is suggestive in the view taken by the biographer of our nation. And this is the more observable since, in the early days of the movement, it was a common sarcasm amongst regular soldiers that the Volunteers were to be ordered out of the country only in case of invasion. It is now nearly twenty-five years since the movement began which produced the present Volunteer force; and it has never done anything since but drill, act in the capacity of guards of honour to royal personages, go to reviews which are forms of holidays, shoot at targets, and wear its uniforms.

It is, in fact, a common view to take of the Volunteers in general that they shoot, drill, and camp out, just as other men play cricket or football. Nor is this view incorrect as far as it goes. Officers and men alike enjoy a march out or a review, and the pleasure of hitting something, even a sheet of iron, with a firearm is naturally implanted in every Englishman's mind. Most men on this side of the Channel consider physical exercise as essential to a healthy condition of body; but few have enough spare time to become proficient in more than one kind of outdoor occupation; and if they choose to devote the energy which might be spent in athletics, useful only to themselves, in doing what they can to make themselves efficient soldiers, so much the better for the country. And even if it were the mere playing at soldiering which it is often supposed to be, Volunteers would still in a crisis be more efficient than their neighbours. The mere injustice of this opinion would of itself be quite unimportant, if it did not also lead to the force being actually treated by the authorities as a joke. In fact, the chaff that has been scattered broadcast on this subject has probably done more than anything else to make the Volunteers resolve to be taken seriously. And perhaps they are now taken as seriously as the regular army, for at any rate they have an existence off paper. The real truth is that our army, as is admitted by every authority not bound by his position to state the reverse, is in such a state of inefficiency as would create an almost universal panic amongst all but the far-sighted politicians of Birmingham were it fully realized. But the facts are obscured by the showers of compliments from the speech-makers at the War Office. Those, however, who get some glimmering perception of the reality are apt to lull the fears naturally called forth by recollecting that there are two hundred thousand Volunteers actually in the flesh. And then, when they read the charming and laudatory little speeches made by the inspecting officer after each inspection—how that when the Volunteer movement first started he didn't believe in it, how that they have now proved that they are real soldiers, how that they have stood the test of ridicule, and how that now the country may rely on them for its defence—they turn away from the subject probably with the remark that, if the French did come, they would get a "jolly good licking." It would, no doubt, be difficult suddenly to change this tone, just as it is difficult to leave off any habit which is the result of constant want of backbone. When smooth things have been prophesied for years, it is not easy to start the prophecy of rough things without any obvious reason for the change. But, after the first plunge had been made, and when the first cry of indignation had subsided, it would soon be seen that the Volunteers would respond to a little wholesome criticism, given in the right spirit, not only by a greater desire to fulfil their duties in a more soldierly manner, but also by an increased respect for the authorities. The Volunteers wish to be taken seriously. They are serious in their endeavours to learn their work, desirous to know their own failings, and anxious for real improvement. It is therefore merely an insult to reward their aspirations with the sugar-plums of oratory.

The fact is that recruits join the Volunteer force, not merely because they find in it pleasant companionship and a semi-athletic occupation suited to their taste, but also, strange as it may seem to a certain class of politicians, because they have a genuine feeling of patriotism. We are not supposed by our Continental neighbours to be a military nation; and yet it is doubtful if they could raise a force of any size on the voluntary system without pay. It is not often realized by outsiders that the sacrifices which a Volunteer has to make, simply in order to fulfil the regulations as to efficiency, are in many cases very considerable. The privates are seldom men of great wealth; usually men who by hard daily work succeed in earning a small salary. The spending of every sixpence must be a matter of thought. And yet they manage to afford considerable sums of money for Volunteering alone. In the majority of corps at the present time, it is true, the uniforms are provided out of the corps funds (an arrangement by which the capitation grant for each man for three years is completely absorbed), but he has to pay an annual subscription. In addition to this, he has to pay for any of the pleasanter parts of his work in which he may take part, such as marching and camping out, and reviews away from his headquarters. In addition to this, he has to travel backwards and forwards between his home or place of business and the rifle range or place of drill, often a considerable distance. In time the sacrifices are no less. All through the spring and summer months the one half-holiday of the week is absorbed, and at least one other evening is largely occupied. There are many men who belong to London corps who, living in the more distant suburbs, are unable on a drill night to reach their homes till a late hour at night. The sacrifices, both in time and money, made by officers are very much greater, although their backs are, no doubt, as a rule more able to bear them. Not only, however, in spite of all these things, do the men attend the number of drills and do the shooting necessary to fulfil the condition of efficiency laid down by Government; but the majority of them go far beyond this, some men doing three or four times what is required of them. Here, then, we have proof of a spirit in the force which implies that they for their part regard the matter in a serious light, and this they have proved by actually doing at considerable expense and inconvenience a good deal more than is required of them. They have then a right to be taken seriously by the War Office, and a right to demand that their labours should not end in futility owing either to the carelessness or penuriousness of the authorities.

Some indications that the military authorities intend to fulfil their duty in this matter more completely have lately shown themselves. The utter uselessness of the ordinary Easter Monday Review was this year recognized completely in theory and partially in practice. It is true that that which took place at Portsmouth was from many points of view a cumbersome failure, from which (if we are to judge by the official statement on the subject) the chief lesson to be learnt was that the generals in command were more in want of improvement than the armies they commanded. But blundered as this affair was, it taught both steadiness and coolness to the men; and there probably was not a Volunteer officer there who did not make mental notes of several matters in which he felt that he could improve himself and his men at the next opportunity which might present itself for practising the attack formations. But of far greater importance to those who took part in them were the various manœuvres on the Friday and Saturday before Easter. A portion of the force, for instance, which marched down to Portsmouth from Petersfield received a careful lesson in outpost duty on the Friday, and was engaged in an attack on a small force of regulars defending the Portsdown heights on the Saturday. The proper placing of outposts is not only most important and interesting in itself, but is capable of being very successfully taught in time of peace. We are glad, therefore, to see a serious effort made to instruct the Volunteers in this part of their duties. Mistakes were of course made by the officers commanding companies, as well as by the men. These, however, were carefully and clearly pointed out by the officer in command of the marching columns, who carefully inspected every sentry and piquet. It might have been better had he delayed his inspection for a short time, for several of the officers in command of the piquets had not had time to place their men entirely to their own satisfaction, or to give them complete instructions before he made his round. It is to be hoped that outpost duty will for the future form a portion of the regular annual training of every Volunteer. The sham fight on Saturday was also instructive; but here there were certainly some faults observable. A pretty fight was spoilt to a great extent by the far too rapid advance of the attacking force. One company of these, it is true, turned the enemy's flank with great success, upon which the umpire gave the order to the defending force to retreat; but there was both hurry and confusion amongst the companies engaged in the direct attack; and, although the general line was ultimately preserved, yet during the advance the men might have been seen crowded together in some places, while in others large gaps were observable. Often, too, the companies were overlapping each other on the flanks. This partial confusion was no doubt to some extent due to the fact that, beyond the simple words to extend and form supports, no instructions whatever were given to the officers commanding companies. The extended line was first considerably broken up by having to pass over ground covered in places with impenetrable gorse-bushes. The supports, seeing these gaps in the line in front, moved up before any reinforcement was intended, wedging themselves into the middle of divided companies in front. Much of this confusion would certainly have been avoided had fuller instructions been given. It is but fair to say, however, that a large part of the force was brought suddenly in contact with the enemy owing to the remissness of the cavalry scouts, who had touch of the enemy for half an hour before any message was sent back to the officers commanding the columns. With all this, however, the Saturday was a much more instructive day than the Monday. The very fact that the mistakes committed were clear proves that fights on a small scale can be better utilized for purposes of instruction than those where twenty thousand troops are engaged. And it is to be hoped that the system of subdivision in the Easter training started this year will be carried out to a much fuller extent in years to come.

CONCERTS AND ENTERTAINMENTS.

MISS AGNES MAITLAND'S first evening concert at the Prince's Hall on Tuesday presented an interesting and well-selected programme, including recitations by Miss Cowen and a number of modern songs which, though familiar enough, merit popularity, and were excellently rendered. Miss Maitland's finished style, pure intonation, and agreeable voice were effectively displayed in two of F. H. Cowen's most recent songs, "Because" and "Outcry," and in Smart's duet, "We Two," with Mr. Maybrick; the quality of her voice and the refinement and admirable finish of her delivery are well calculated to render full interpretation to such songs as "Because," the delicate nuances of which were given with rare feeling and expression. Mr. Henry Guy's fine voice and artistic instinct were notable in his rendering of a new descriptive song entitled "The Pilgrim," by Stephen Adams. Mr. Reakes gave ample justice to Sullivan's "Thou 'rt passing hence," and Miss Rosa Leo's singing of De Lara's "Where memory dwells" emphasized the morbid sentiment of that dreary reverie. Mr. Maybrick was heard to greater advantage in Smart's duet than in his first song, Oliver King's "For Me"; and he is invariably spirited and effective in compositions by Stephen Adams. The instrumentalists were Miss Gertrude Salmon and Miss Adelina Dinelli; the latter was recalled for her bright and facile execution of De Beriot's violin solo, "Le Tremolo."

At the second concert of Henry Leslie's Choir at St. James's Hall, on Saturday, the usual programme of madrigals and part-songs was varied by pianoforte solos by Mme. Essipoff and songs by Mrs. Hutchinson and Signor Foli. The choir, conducted by Mr. Randegger, gave a remarkably fine rendering of Morley's charming madrigal, "My bonny lass," the exquisite harmonies of which were produced with rich effect and admirable precision. The efficiency of the choir was also well exhibited in Henry Leslie's "Arise, sweet Love," in Mr. Calcott's arrangement of Kjerulf's picturesque "Norwegian Bridal Song," in Sterndale Bennett's curious setting of Marlowe's "Come live with me," so little suggestive of Arcadian quiet, and in other and more familiar compositions. Mme. Essipoff's performance of Beethoven's "Sonata pathétique" was remarkable for her independent, and in some respects novel, version of the adagio cantabile, which the great pianiste rendered with transcendent subtlety and intellectual power. In interpretation, in execution, in untrammelled judgment, Mme. Essipoff is an artist of notable individuality; her playing suggests no school, no mechanical acceptation of tradition, and no concession to whatsoever caprices of virtuosity may chance to be the mode. The brilliance and distinction of her execution, in addition to the rarer qualities of her interpretation, were vividly manifest in her performances of Moskowsky's "Sérénade" and in M. St.-Saëns's "Caprice," founded on an air of Gluck, the complex variations of which were given with faultless mastery.

Mr. Philip Beck's recitation of Coleridge's Remorse at the Prince's Hall on Saturday was a remarkable effort of memory on the part of the young actor, and an interesting, though scarcely a successful, attempt to resuscitate a play which is not likely to receive now more adequate interpretation than at Drury Lane in 1813, from Elliston and Mrs. Glover, or in 1817, from Mrs. Baxter and Wallack. Mr. Frank Thicke's adaptation, which Mr. Beck used, is good, but scarcely comprehensive enough in its work of condensation; there still remains much windy apostrophe and prolix description to be eliminated before the play's undoubted dramatic power may be temptingly displayed to modern managers. In spite of Leigh Hunt's singular criticism, the drama only achieved a succès d'estime, and the succinct judgment in the pages of Genest is, as is frequent in that compilation, not devoid of stern eloquence—"a tolerable Tragedy by Coleridge; some parts of it are beautifully written." The diction of the play is such as no modern audience would endure; "threaddy leaves," for instance, is as bad as Leigh Hunt's "farmy fields," and the drama abounds in passages of turgid and ponderous bombast that obscure the dramatic vitality. Even Mr. Beck's serious and excellent study scarcely succeeded in veiling the occasional absurdities, such as the inconsistency of Alvar's sentiment towards Ordonio, now invoking Heaven to assist his prayer for his "guilty brother," and anon gloating on the prospect of remorse that shall cling to him with "poisonous tooth," and be as "the lion's bite." The invocation in the third act, with much exquisite poetry, contains also such lines as these, descriptive of the drowned Lapland wizard:—

> Then round and round the whirlpool's marge ye dance,
> Till from the blue swoln corse the soul toils out
> And joins your mighty army.

With all its glowing imaginative force and powerful dramatic situations, it is to be feared Coleridge's Remorse contains too much "mere poetry," as Shelley says, to succeed in these days.

The diverting entertainment at St. James's Hall entitled "Odds and Ends," which has reached its 350th performance, is diversified by several new impersonations as rich in humour and as quaintly suggestive as any in Mr. Du Val's ropertory. The powers of mimicry and abundant resources of Mr. Du Val are surprisingly exemplified in the considerable range of characters he illustrates, and his histrionic talent is not less strikingly displayed in recitation. In the character of Terry O'Reilly, an Irish peasant, he recites Sheridan Le Fanu's "Shamus O'Brien," a ballad of '98, with extraordinary spirit and dramatic power; the transitions from the fire and enthusiasm that mark the stirring incidents of the poem to the quiet passages that are parenthetical and humorous, are distinguished by a truth and facility that are remarkable. In the exciting climax of O'Brien's escape, the speaker's exultation is not less vividly felt than the animated scene is perfectly realized, and the reassumption of the speaker's personality after this outburst of passion is effected with admirable art. The recitation is no eloquent declamation merely, but an excellent piece of acting, full of colour and vitality, and thoroughly well sustained.

SUGAR.

THE price of sugar is just now lower than it has ever been known to be before. Jaggery, a kind used for refining, is selling at nine shillings per hundredweight, or less than a penny a pound; German beet sugar is selling at fifteen shillings per hundredweight, or little more than three-halfpence per pound; and the prices of other kinds are proportionately low. Compared with this time last year, when prices were already considered extremely depressed, the fall ranges from 25 to 30 per cent. The result is great depression and embarrassment in Mincing Lane, the headquarters of the trade in sugar as in other colonial produce. It is said, for example, that one great house has lost lately three hundred thousand pounds through the depreciation in this commodity alone. Happily, the house is possessed of an immense capital, and can afford not only to bear the loss, but to lay in such quantities of the commodity at the present low prices as promise by-and-by to recoup it for its loss and leave a profit. But houses less fortunately circumstanced are in difficulties, and consequently failures and private compositions are numerous. The sugar-growing countries are likewise distressed. And yet, although, as we have said, prices are lower than they have ever been known to be before, the general expectation is that they will fall still further. Of course annuitants, Civil Servants, clergymen, and other persons possessed of fixed incomes, benefit by this state of things. Not only is sugar exceptionally cheap, but so are almost all the necessaries of life; and consequently fixed incomes go further than heretofore. Rent, no doubt, is higher, and so is meat; but bread, tea, coffee, clothing, and almost every commodity is exceptionally cheap. With regard to the working classes, the benefit is not quite unmixed. Those of them who are in good employment, of course, reap the advantage, like the possessors of fixed incomes. But the depression in trade caused by low prices renders many employers incapable of giving as much employment as formerly. There is, therefore, more idle labour than usual, and wages are tending downwards. The movement in favour of assisted emigration, and the meetings of unemployed that have been held lately in Manchester, go to show that in many quarters there is distress among the working classes. Yet the distress, happily, is not great. Partly the very low prices enable people to live on smaller incomes; and partly the great emigration of the past three or four years has taken away a considerable number of the redundant population. Still, though there is no great distress, there is no prosperity. Falling prices, in short, are not an advantage to any class of the community, except alone the possessors of fixed incomes.

The first cause of the extraordinary depreciation in sugar is the rapid growth of production. In old times sugar was grown from the cane alone, and to a large extent its production depended upon slave labour; but during the great war between this country and France at the beginning of the century, Napoleon adopted, in the hope of weakening our means of offence, a plan for encouraging beetroot cultivation in France. The political object he had in view failed, but the economic results have been marvellous. Beet cultivation has succeeded beyond all expectation in France, and has extended to nearly every Continental country. It has particularly assumed great proportions in Germany and Austria; and of late chemical discoveries and mechanical improvements have enabled the German and Austrian growers to increase their exports and to improve the quality of the sugar, so that they are largely driving cane-sugar out of the markets of Western Europe. A series of statistical tables laid before the Sugar Bounties Committee some years ago shows that the total production of sugar in 1852 was 1,476,000 tons; in 1878 it had risen to 3,120,000 tons. In twenty-six years, that is, the production had more than doubled; and since then it has gone on rapidly increasing. The chief growth has been in beetroot-sugar; but there has been also a very considerable extension of the cultivation of cane-sugar. The complete conquest and pacification of India, as well as the opening up of it by means of railways, has extended the cultivation in that country, and made the crop available for European consumption. The settlement of Australia has likewise led to the cultivation of sugar in that continent. Sugar cultivation has been also introduced into Egypt. And for several years the Brazilian Government have been encouraging by all means in its power sugar cultivation in Brazil. Altogether the increase in these ways is very large. At the same time the adaptation of steam to navigation and the extension of railways have made it possible to hurry each crop to market almost as soon as it is gathered. Formerly merchants had to invest very large sums in produce, which they had to keep in large warehouses, at heavy expense to themselves. Now they can do without this expense and work with very small capitals. For by telegraph they can order what supply they require, and the railway and the steamship will bring it to them in the course of a few weeks. The increased facilities of communication have perhaps contributed almost as much as the extension of production in cheapening the commodity. And in another way the extension of the telegraph has been no less effective. Formerly only experts who possessed great capitals which enabled them to employ correspondents throughout the world could learn what quantities of any commodity were held abroad. Now the information is collected by the press, and is published everywhere almost simultaneously. All the world, therefore, knows what supplies are ready for market, and the knowledge that immense quantities can be shipped at any moment has almost as much effect upon the London market as if the stocks were warehoused in London itself. The tendency, therefore, of late has been to cheapen all commodities. But special causes have aided this tendency within the last year or two. The long agricultural depression throughout Western Europe has plunged the agricultural classes in great distress. Corn-growing has been unprofitable for years; disease has made cattle-farming risky, if not unprofitable; and wet seasons have now and then swept away large portions of the sheep flocks of Western Europe; while abroad the phylloxera and other special diseases have inflicted much damage upon Continental farmers. The result is that the landed classes generally —owners, cultivators, and labourers—have all suffered more or less, and have less money to expend in their households, upon labour, and with the shopkeeper. All the classes who have lived by supplying these with necessaries and luxuries have suffered in consequence, and there has, therefore, been a check to consumption throughout Western Europe, which can be recovered from only by a succession of good seasons that will once more enrich the agricultural classes. And while the consumption has thus been decreasing, specially good harvests have augmented the sugar yield, and in the past couple of years, in Germany particularly, the yield has been exceptionally good. It is estimated by the best authorities that the yield of last year's beet crop in the German Empire amounts to about 940,000 tons of sugar, an increase of about 100,000 tons on the previous year, and an increase of as much as 350,000 tons on the year 1880-81. This great addition to the production of Germany is perhaps the main cause of the present fall. Germany gives a large bounty upon the export of sugar, and, at the same time, the cost of manufacturing sugar in that country is very low. The German exporters are, therefore, able to sell at an exceptionally low price this year. One other circumstance has contributed to lower prices. Proposals are made, both in France and in Holland, for altering the duties on sugar, and also the bounties on export. It is believed by the trade that if the proposals are carried into effect exporters will be benefited; that, consequently, both in France and in Holland the production will be increased, and the present excess of production over consumption thus be augmented. Lastly, as people in the wholesale and retail trade at home expect a further fall of prices, they have of late been diminishing their purchases.

As regards the future, it seems safe to say that the price must continue low. Of course cheapness will stimulate consumption. Sugar has now become a necessary of life in civilized countries, and it is used largely too in the manufacture of many articles, such as beer. The cheaper it becomes the larger will be its consumption amongst the poor and by brewers, and probably, too, it will be applied to other uses to which it was not turned when it was dear. Moreover, the long agricultural depression must sooner or later pass away. A run of good seasons will succeed to the series of bad ones, and with greater prosperity amongst the landed classes there will be a more liberal household expenditure generally. It is not probable, therefore, that the present extreme cheapness will continue. But, still, that sugar must remain permanently cheap seems reasonably certain. The capacity for production is so great that, with every demand, fresh areas will be applied to the cultivation of beet. It is said, for example, that the intensive cultivation necessary for growing beet so improves the soil in Germany that for four years afterwards all the crops raised are greatly improved. Consequently, the cultivation is much in favour with good farmers. And, besides, the pulp of the root, after the juice is expressed, is used in the feeding of cattle. For these reasons beet cultivation will probably continue to extend upon the Continent for some years yet, even if the price remains low, and will increase rapidly if the price rises; while here at home a movement is just now being set on foot to introduce the cultivation in England. Furthermore, improvements in the process of manufacturing sugar are constantly being introduced in Germany and Austria, and, of course, are imitated elsewhere. It is said that the yield of sugar from the root increases on an average about every five years in Germany in consequence of improvement in the processes of manufacturing. The further colonization of new countries, too, will tend to the extension of the cultivation abroad. As the population of Australia grows, for example, the cultivation of sugar there will increase also. For a long time to come, then, it seems probable that the price of sugar will remain very low. This will be an unmixed advantage to all parties. While prices are falling those engaged in the trade and in the production suffer, and therefore all employed by them suffer likewise; but once a stationary price is reached, provided that price leaves a reasonable profit, the lower it is the greater the consumption, and therefore the better for all parties concerned.

SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

WITH the death of Sir Michael Costa, which occurred at Brighton last Tuesday, a prominent figure in the world of music has disappeared. Fortunate in so many particulars during his long life, the great conductor was fortunate in the circumstances of his departure, for though he witnessed the inevitable advent of new men and new methods, he never suffered the bitterness of extinction, nor was threatened with rivalry in his own sphere; to the last the pre-eminence his tact and talent had attained was recognized, and the loss of his command a public lament. For more than half a century, since 1829 in fact, Sir Michael Costa was most intimately associated with the exposition and progress of music in this country; the history of the brilliant success of the Sacred Harmonic Society, of the Crystal Palace Handel celebrations, the Birmingham Festivals, the Philharmonic concerts, and the consolidation of the Italian Opera orchestra, are indissolubly connected with the story of his life. It is natural that a career so extended, so distinguished, and, in a certain sense, so versatile, should present diverse aspects according with the reminiscent powers of the observer. To many Sir Michael Costa will be remembered as the greatest of opera and oratorio conductors; others may not forget the composer of more than one opera that deserved, though they did not command, success; and a few there are doubtless of the mind of Thomas Love Peacock, who visit the opera only too vividly to regret the decay of ballet, and who will pleasurably recall the charming music he composed for the queens of that lost art—for Taglioni and Cerito and others. Whether his operas will bear revival—the Don Carlos, which failed on its production in 1848, or the more successful Malek Adhel, in which Rubini achieved memorable distinction—is extremely doubtful in the present critical condition of Italian opera. It is certain, however, that the enduring success of his two oratorios, Eli and Naaman, assure the composer of a firm place and indisputable in sacred composition.

Sir Michael Costa was born at Geneva on the 4th of February, 1810, his father, Pasquale Costa, being an Italian of Spanish extraction, and his mother a Swiss. His early musical training at the Naples Conservatorio doubtless gave rigidity to the well-marked limitations of his artistic faith. The star of Bellini was in the ascendant, and the art which Wagner despised was life for the time to young Costa, who ever remained an Italian at heart, in conviction, and prejudice. He was deficient in the reverential spirit which almost invariably possesses the creative artist who will lay no violent hands on the scores of the masters. His musical creed was inflexible, and was frequently expressed with a narrowness once common to Italian musicians. It brought on him the wrath and scorn of men like Berlioz; but at the same time it must be owned that the many curious anecdotes regarding him that would seem to illustrate a limited sympathy which approaches bigotry require authentication. At Naples the young composer was well drilled in the elements of his art, and worked unremittingly, composing at the age of fifteen a cantata, L'Immagine, which was performed in the theatre attached to the Conservatorio. This precocious feat was speedily followed by three operas, a Mass, three symphonies, and an oratorio which established his reputation sufficiently to procure him a commission from the director of the San Carlo Opera House, for whom he wrote his first work of pretension, the opera Malvina, in 1829. In the autumn of this year he severed his connexion with Italy, and set out for England, being deputed by Zingarelli, the director of the Naples Conservatorio to conduct the latter's setting of the psalm Super flumina Babylonis at a Birmingham concert, an undertaking he did not fulfil. During this visit, in Rossini's Donna del Lago, he made his first and only appearance on the stage in the tenor part of Uberto. While failure did not daunt him, fortune stood his friend, his capacity as a pianist was speedily recognized, and in 1830 he was appointed by Laporte to the then important position in the orchestra of maestro al piano at the Haymarket Italian opera, and two years subsequently was made musical conductor. Here he entered on a victorious career, beginning with innovation by substituting the conductor with his bâton for the leader with his bow, and gradually acquiring his supreme mastery of his orchestra. Although the credit of having introduced into England the office of "conductor" as now understood rests with Chelard, and was first practised in Germany, it is due to Costa that he was the first to effect the desired change in opera. It is strange that it was not until 1844 that the dual sway of leader and pianist was abolished at the Philharmonic Concerts by Mendelssohn. Costa's tenure of office at the opera comprehended the brightest period of Italian opera, a period of great singers and great dancers, of Pasta, Grisi, Sontag, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, Donzelli, and a host of stars who completed the epic of song, a great epoch when the opera was veritably Italian, and not the hybrid entertainment, shorn of ballet and cosmopolitan in character, we now so entitle.

The "origin" of those deep-set intrigues that ended in Mr. Lumley losing the advantage and prestige of Costa's conductorship has been conflictingly set forth, for the excellent reason that the few to whom the whole facts are known have not spoken fully. The result is familiar and an oft-told tale; in 1846 Costa undertook the direction of the new Italian opera at Covent Garden, and began the representation of the whole round of spectacular and romantic opera, then at the height of favour in Paris, the works of Meyerbeer, Rossini's William Tell, Auber's Masaniello, and fully sustained his brilliant and unrivalled reputation. The most inveterate lover of mystery need look for no recondite source or secret influence to account for the success and predominant skill of Sir Michael Costa as a conductor. He had tact, firmness, and discretion in no mean degree, and was a practical musician; beyond these gifts he possessed generalship, and so achieved command and awakened confidence. He early made himself master of the business details of his work and of all that is comprehended in the mechanism of his art; nature endowed him with the complement to that assiduous painstaking which is near allied to genius.

THE TWO THOUSAND GUINEAS.

THAT a leading favourite for the Two Thousand should be sold by auction a couple of days before the race was something now in the history of racing. Harvester, a brown colt by Sterling out of Wheatear, had been a fine but backward two-year-old, and his racing career had not consisted of a series of victories. He had won a couple of races in the autumn, and he had run within half a length of Superba in July; but the colt's favouritism was not entirely owing to his public form. Not that his form had been bad, for even on it alone he would have had claims to be supported for the Two Thousand; but most good judges of racing were agreed that the colt was not sufficiently "set" last season to do his best. Judging from the amount given for The Prince last summer, and the sums given for favourites for the Derby on several former occasions, from 6,000*l.* to 10,000*l.* seemed about the price likely to be given for Harvester. Considering his apparent prospects of winning either the Two Thousand or the Derby, or even both races, the 8,600 guineas paid for him by Sir John Willoughby was perhaps scarcely an extravagant price. The day after the sale a report was spread about that he had been beaten in a trial, and from 4 to 1 he eventually went down to 20 to 1.

At the Newmarket Craven Meeting there were two races which affected the prospects of the Two Thousand. The first of these was the Biennial, in which Royal Fern gave Wickham, who was the first favourite, 5 lbs., and beat him cleverly by three-quarters of a length; Zadig, who won the Great Metropolitan Stakes a week later, being a bad third. The last-named colt was receiving 10 lbs. from Royal Fern. Wickham, who has become a roarer, had only run once last season, and then he had won in a canter by four lengths from Condor and Loch Ranza, the winner of the late Northamptonshire Stakes. This was a fair promise for Royal Fern's three-year-old form, and he had also a capital record to show of his performances as a two-year-old. At York he had won the Prince of Wales's Stakes of 952*l.*, and he had only been beaten half a length by Busybody for the Middle Park Plate. He certainly had been badly beaten for the Criterion Nursery Stakes; but then he was carrying 4 lbs. extra, and the race was won by Archduc, who, although disqualified for most of the great three-year-old races, showed some of the best two-year-old form of last season, and won the French Two Thousand on Sunday last. Much as there was to be said in favour of Royal Fern, he had not made nearly so much improvement since last season as Harvester. The second race at the Craven Meeting, which had a special bearing on the Two Thousand, was the Craven Stakes, for which Loch Ranza started first favourite, but he was beaten in a canter by Scot Free, who was giving him 5 lbs. As a two-year-old, Scot Free, after running unplaced twice, had won the Great Sapling Plate at Sandown. In that race he had only beaten the Sister to Adelaide colt by a neck at even weights. This colt was also backed at comparatively short odds for the Two Thousand; and, on the strength of his running with Scot Free, he appeared to have a decided chance of victory.

On her two-year-old form Superba ought to have had a splendid chance of winning the Two Thousand. She had been beaten twice—in her first and her last races of the season—and on the latter occasion she had run nowhere in the Middle Park Plate, after starting first favourite; but she had won seven races worth 6,481*l.* She had not always had opponents of very high class to beat, but she had beaten Harvester twice, as well as the Adelaide filly, Camlet, and several other two-year-olds of considerable repute. If she had not run for the Middle Park Plate, she might have been considered the best two-year-old of her season, but it was said that she had wintered badly, and she was not fancied so much as her public form might have led one to expect. St. Medard, after losing four races, won two in October. We have already mentioned the Adelaide filly—who, by the way, was not entered for the Two Thousand—and the colt out of Sister to Adelaide. Now St. Medard's dam was out of Adelaide's dam; and as he, like the Adelaide filly and the Sister to Adelaide colt, is by Hermit, the trio, although of the same age, are considerably more than half-brothers and sister. Beauchamp, by Beauclerc, had failed to win a race as a two-year-old: he is a well-shaped colt, but he is rather wanting in length. The good-looking Hermitage, after an unsuccessful season, had beaten a field of nineteen two-year-olds in November, but he ran very badly in the Craven Stakes. Doncaster Cup's first performance had been in the Craven Stakes, and then he had only run third to Scot Free and Loch Ranza. Harvester, who is said to be a quiet horse in a general way, was very nervous and fretful before the start, and his change of stable and companionship may have had a very serious influence on his chance. There were only ten starters, and Harvester dashed off with the lead as soon as the flag fell. His jockey steadied him as quickly as he could, and then Hermitage made the running, with Scot Free but a short distance behind him. About three furlongs from the winning-post, Scot Free took the lead and held it to the end of the race, winning easily by five lengths. Harvester ran well from the Abingdon Bottom, but he did not quite catch St. Medard, who beat him by a head for second place. Royal Fern was beaten half-way down the Bushes Hill. Superba ran well as far as the Dip, and she was only three-quarters of a length behind Harvester at the finish.

Scot Free was much admired, as winners usually are—after the race; but some critics thought him low and short, while others considered his forelegs too upright. He is a thick and compact colt; but, on the whole, perhaps he scarcely shows so much quality as his sire, Macgregor. Such, at least, was the general opinion. St. Medard is a very smart colt; but he is small, with little bone or substance, and he has rather drooping quarters. Harvester was bathed in sweat when his clothing was taken off before the race, so his running in the Two Thousand cannot be looked upon as a trustworthy guide to the future; and, although he has failed to win the 4,150*l.* which the late Two Thousand was worth, it is still possible—we do not say probable—that he may repay his purchase-money.

THE CANTERBURY PILGRIMS—THE OPERAS.

IT has been the peculiarity of English operas that they have rarely been on English subjects. Balfe made the hero of his Bohemian Girl a Pole; Vincent Wallace went to Spain for Maritana, and to Germany for Lurline; Sir Julius Benedict came nearer home with The Lily of Killarney; but Mr. Goring Thomas has crossed the Channel for his Esmeralda. It is well that an English opera should be on an English theme; and in all respects Mr. Villiers Stanford, the composer of The Canterbury Pilgrims, is to be congratulated on his partnership with Mr. Gilbert à Beckett. The book of this opera is unique. An effective story has been chosen and treated by the poet—the word is not used without justification—with grace, humour, and much adroitness. From Chaucer Mr. à Beckett has borrowed only the notion of a pilgrimage to Canterbury. The language of the blank verse, in which most of the book is written, has been modelled rather on Shakspeare than on the historian of The Canterbury Tales. The lyrics, which occur when the action of the story demands, are always delicate, and often charming. It would not be easy to over-estimate the composer's debt to his companion; while, on the other hand, Mr. à Beckett, who is himself known as a musician, must often have been delighted with scenes in which the development of his legend has been musically realized. Well sustained as is the interest of the three acts, it is specially to be noted that there are only half a dozen personages in the plot, with, of course, a background of pilgrims, 'prentices, and townsfolk, or rather, for the most part, countryfolk. There is Cicely, daughter of Geoffrey Blount, host of the Tabard Inn; her lover, Hubert Lovel, a London 'prentice; Geoffrey himself; Sir Christopher Synge, a knight of the shire, who has conceived a passion for Cicely; his wife, Dame Margery; and his "creature," Hal-o'-the-Chepe. These characters are strongly marked and contrasted, and are therefore peculiarly well adapted for the purpose of the composer, whose primary object it is to give to each musical individuality. A vein of true comedy runs through the pleasant story. A band of pilgrims, like Chaucer's, very human devotees, in spite of their pious mission to the shrine of St. Thomas, are to assemble at the Tabard and start for Canterbury, resting the first night at Sidenbourne. To take her out of the way of her lover, Cicely is to be sent with them as far as the house of a "griffin aunt," who will guard her well; but danger lurks on the way, for Sir Christopher, attended by his rascal Hal, is of the company. Hubert is actually hired to go also, disguised as a friar, and assist in the abduction of Cicely; while Dame Margery, suspecting that all is not well, joins the band to watch her husband; and she charges herself with the care of Cicely. All this, it will be seen, is extremely neat, and the first act affords ample scope for the composer's fancy. The musical treatment may be described as symphonic. That Mr. Villiers Stanford has studied the Meistersinger with much diligence is not to be denied, but it must be admitted at the same time that he has studied it with keen appreciation and with excellent results. It is early morning when the curtain rises. The 'prentices, led by Hubert, arrive at the courtyard of the Tabard to serenade Cicely, and the composer has adapted to his own purposes the old English part song, the oldest known, in fact, "Sumer is icumen in." While Geoffrey scolds and Cicely finds occasion to exchange a few words with her lover, the Pilgrims' Chorus is heard outside, a solemn melodious chorale, in D minor three-four time, which derives a certain statelimess from the steady movement of the bass with a dotted crotchet and three quavers to every bar. Both these airs, the old English song which he has borrowed and the chorus he has written, the composer employs skilfully and suggestively throughout his work. The repetition of the chorus when the pilgrims have assembled, have broken into a quarrel on the question of male and female responsibility for mischief, and suddenly remember their mission, is particularly effective, and when they all enter the inn to breakfast to a variation of their strain the rare quality of musical humour is displayed. Orchestra and voices repeat that "Life is a weary pilgrimage," but at the same time the music seems to confess that the weariness is occasionally mitigated by a well-spread board and a cup of good wine. In the absence of the bulk of the pilgrims, Hal and Sir Christopher hatch their plot. The setting here is for the most part fully accompanied recitative with little in the way of developed melody, and it says much for the power of the composer that he can at this point so well maintain the musical interest. The score has always appropriateness. There is, perhaps, some little lack of gaiety in the orchestral treatment, but attention is enlisted by the cleverness of the composer's characterization. A number to be noted is a really beautiful sestett, "Why lingers in our ears that strange 'Beware'?" The pilgrims emerge from the inn, call somewhat noisily for their reckonings, and depart with a repetition of their chorus. Hubert and his fellow-'prentices, in the garb of friars, sing their madrigal and dance before Geoffrey, who has fallen asleep. Awakening, he notes the antics of the holy men, and, as they run out, at once makes up his mind to follow. The old system of a finale with every one on the stage is discarded; indeed, an effort to avoid conventionality is everywhere to be traced, except that Mr. Villiers Stanford wisely disdains to seek novelty at the expense of musical grace, and has no objection to closing a phrase or modulating into a new key. The curtain falls as Geoffrey trudges across the stage after the cavalcade.

The turmoil and excitement of the First Act make the change of scene and sentiment which opens the Second Act particularly grateful. It is evening. Inhabitants of the little village of Sidenbourne are waiting at the doors expecting the pilgrims, who are hospitably welcomed when presently the band enters. The ear needs repose after all the bustle of the Tabard scene, and Mr. à Beckett, perceiving this, has devoted much of the act to the love interest of the story. Hubert has a peaceful melody, "Sweet mother sleep, thy gentle hour is here!" and when Cicely joins him a rich opportunity is afforded to the composer. Of this it must regretfully be said he has failed to make the most. In the love music of this act there is a want of tenderness. Mr. Stanford is a master of the means of musical expression, but here it is all too evident that he has nothing to express—here, where it might have been supposed he would be at his best. There is ample suggestion in the scene, the situation, the words. Here are the lovers met by moonlight with nothing to come between themselves and their own sweet thoughts. What more could a composer desire? Yet Mr. Stanford seems to be gravelled for lack of matter: and he seeks vainly to atone for the absence of those phrases of pure melody which are before all essential by restless orchestration. The hearer is apt to let his thoughts wander from Sidenbourne, and to remember that the act seems very long. Cicely has one fervent burst of song; but inspiration departs with the crescendo which brings it to an end. We fully recognize the care that has been bestowed upon the work from first to last. Nevertheless, if The Canterbury Pilgrims is to be truly popular, Mr. Stanford must certainly curtail, and perhaps partially rewrite, the Second Act.

The last act affords a remarkable instance of the composer's ability. The story sets forth little more than the trial of Hubert for abducting Cicely, the Justice of the Peace being none other than Sir Christopher, with Hal-o'-the-Chepe as magistrate's clerk; yet in this scene there is nothing of monotony or tameness. On the contrary, tenderness, humour, and descriptive force distinguish it throughout. The great hall of an English country mansion—Sir Christopher's—is the picture. Dame Margery opens the act with a scena, the most notable part of which is a song full of mournful beauty, "Life and love are young in spring." In the second stanza the sentiment changes, and with it there is a deviation in the melody, reflected again in the orchestral score, which may be cited as an example of the sensibility with which the composer has entered into the spirit of the author. Cicely's description of her flight, and Geoffrey's story of how he tracked the fugitives down, are specimens of dramatic music—of music, that is to say, which interprets the action of the drama. Hubert is indicted, and at the same time recognized by Hal as one of the rascals who were employed to carry off Cicely. There is genuine comedy in the delivery of the sentences passed by the knight at the instance of his creature; and the chorus of rustics who come to see the trial adds variety and movement to the scene. Has Mr. Stanford fallen across "Rule Britannia" purposely, or are the remonstrances of the villagers as here arranged an unconsciously prophetic recognition of the sometime fact—things in this direction have strangely altered of late—that "Britons never will be slaves"? In two places the composer anticipates several bars of this anthem; we say "anticipates," for of course the air was not written till centuries later. Those auditors who desire to hear something that they can "carry away with them" may be commended to Hubert's sly defence as given in the ballad "A knight who is fitter for aches and pains," wherein he shows that he is aware that his judge is in truth the real criminal. It has been already pointed out that Mr. Villiers Stanford is a musical humorist, and the statement might be strengthened by recurring to the ditty of the "Winsome Daffodil" which Sir Christopher has sung to Cicely in the village of Sidenbourne. Dame Margery here repeats it, and so, by showing that she likewise knows the facts of the case, is enabled to make terms for the lovers. Care and intelligence mark the production of The Canterbury Pilgrims throughout. Much depends on the choristers, who have been drilled with a diligent regard for the business of the scene which is altogether new to opera in England, Italian or other, except of course as regards the exceptional performances at the Savoy, where equal care and peculiar cunning are bestowed on the productions. Miss Clara Perry as Cicely, and Mr. B. Davies as Hubert, make musically and dramatically an excellent pair of lovers. Mr. Ludwig adapts himself very cleverly to the part of Sir Christopher, and, except that Mr. Ludwig is better endowed as a vocalist than Mr. Snazelle, the Geoffrey of the latter is equally good. Mr. Barrington Foote has had experience of the Italian stage at home and abroad, and is among the leading basses of the day. The one thing he needed to make his presence in opera specially welcome was experience as an actor, and here he plays Hal-o'-the-Chepe with a comic power which he has not hitherto been suspected of possessing. The Dame Margery of Miss Marian Burton also merits praise. Mr. Villiers Stanford is of the advanced school. If he had not advanced so far he would have increased the number of his appreciative companions on the road. Some features of the journey might be made more light and agreeable, but we have accompanied the pilgrimage with pleasure and interest. The way from the Tabard Inn to Sidenbourne is one to be followed with delight, and we warmly recommend readers to take it.

A re-hearing of Carmen with its first cast—that is, with Mr. Barton McGuckin as Don José and Mr. Leslie Crotty as Escamillo—makes us think even more highly than before of the performance. New beauties of intention and execution in Mme. Marie Roze's Carmen reveal themselves. Mr. McGuckin seems to improve yet more in his acting, which is really striking at many points, and Mr. Leslie Crotty sings and acts Escamillo, especially in the "Toreador" song, better than we have ever seen the part acted and sung before. His performance is full of life and of art. The slight, but in no way meaningless, differences in the stage management for the two casts serve to instance the extraordinary care and invention which Mr. Harris bestows with such admirable results on such matters.

Another word of special praise for the taste and care with which operas are habitually put upon the stage at Drury Lane must not be omitted. The arrangement of the Garden Scene in Faust, the garden itself being at the bottom of a descent from the gate, is a ease in point. We do not care much for "real horses" on the boards; they are so very real that they seem to add unreality to their surroundings; but, when the soldiers return, the passage of horsemen, kept well at the back of the scene, is not ineffective. To make Mephistopheles stand without any screen in the Cathedral scene is less to the point. When he is partly hidden his music has an added mystery. Fine stage management is, however, so extraordinary in operatic representations that the efforts made here should on no account pass unrecognized.

A few words may here suffice to note the opening of the Royal Italian Opera. The season at Mr. Gye's handsome theatre began on Tuesday with Signor Ponchielli's La Gioconda, which made so favourable an impression on audiences last year. A new hearing shows that the impression is likely to be permanent. The score has the two great requisites of beauty and dramatic power. Signor Bevignani conducted an efficient performance with the same cast as that by which the opera was first presented—Mme. Durand, Mme. Tremelli, Signor Marconi, Signor de Reszké, and Signor Cotogni. Their efforts scarcely need new praise, though the praise must be modified by the expression of a regret that the tenor and baritone are slaves or victims of the tremolo, which is the bane of modern operatic singing. Mme. Lucca is already in London; Mme. Patti is to come next month. Those who are faithful to a love for Italian opera will be abundantly gratified. A stage manager, by the way, is mentioned in the list of officials, but experience scarcely justifies the hope that his influence will be more perceptible than in former years. At least singers might be prevented from returning to bow, often in answer to very faint applause, and so delaying the action and making the scene ridiculous.

TO write a book of which 106 pages are devoted to a general theological disquisition and 18 to the topography, not of the Holy Land in general, but of Jerusalem and its neighbourhood, and to entitle it Reflections in Palestine, may reasonably be looked on as one more proof of the originality (which it would not be uncharitable to call eccentricity) marking General Gordon's character. We do not, however, fancy that any title would affect the circulation; for the fact which is likely to stimulate the sale is pre-eminently the authorship, and not the choice of the subject.

The short topographical section may well stand over while we call attention to the peculiarities of the religious treatise, as indicating the intellectual standing-ground of General Gordon and the circumstances under which he writes. A more absolutely self-reliant proclamation of that which the prophet believes to be Divine truth we never came across. The writer, indeed, begins with a stern reprimand to his contemporaries for their neglect of the Scriptures in comparison with "man's words," and asks "May not the reason that there are such differences of opinion on religion be that commentaries and other writings of man are read and studied instead of the Scriptures searched"? In asking this question, the enthusiast seems to forget that the only difference after all may be as to the conditions under which the word of man is, in fact, invoked to illuminate the dark passages of Scripture. For instance, his book is silent on the consent of the innumerable host of learned and pious students of all ages; but this is no proof that the intervention of "man's words" is absent, though the interpreter may be that prominent individuality, the mystical, confident Charles George Gordon. We do not suppose that the author appreciated how near he approached to committing himself to the uncharitable and incredible charge that the too much studied commentators had not themselves searched the Scriptures. But certainly the General endeavours to act as he preaches; for the treatise is absolutely devoid of any of the helps which most writers on abstruse topics are glad to seek from the erudition of their predecessors. A word now and then betrays acquaintance with Hebrew and Greek; otherwise the exclusive appeal to the Bible in the Authorized Version is only diversified by one reference to Bishop Wordsworth's Commentary and one to the Athanasian Creed. Neither the Prayer-Book as such, nor the Articles, are once mentioned; while not the least recognition of the place which critical investigation justly claims in Biblical study seems ever to have crossed General Gordon's mind in his literal acceptance of the entire Old Testament narrative in its English dress. There would be nothing in the entire book to show to what denomination of Christians he belonged were it not for the naïve statement, "In our church we have the Ten Commandments beside the Lord's table, but the font and the table of the Lord are the two visible and constant articles of service in our Christian churches." It is peculiar that the General, while he warily avoids raising the pulpit to a third place of honour, should have dwelt upon the old-fashioned and much-disused tables of Commandments.

In fact, it is not too much to say that General Gordon starts on the expedition after the assimilation of Christian truth in much the same spirit and with about the same external help as he considered needful when his object was to make the Soudan his own. It is fair to add that, if the book were written, as it appears, in Palestine, access to books may not have been so easy. But it is abundantly clear that General Gordon never realized this difficulty as an inconvenience.

What, then, has been the result of this strange quest; in what shape does the Christianity evolved by the solitary broodings of the enthusiast soldier present itself to the readers of his book?

The answer to this question is the strangest part of the whole affair. Temperaments like General Gordon's when stirred by deep religious emotion are apt to take refuge in the grim intolerance of Calvinism and its delusive comforts of assurance and indefectibility. This was conspicuous in the idiosyncrasy of that great Christian hero who bore in some respects such a likeness to the English soldier, "Stonewall" Jackson. General Gordon, serene, it would seem, in the untroubled unconsciousness that any father, any doctor, any prelate or professor had anticipated what are to him no doubt discoveries, has strayed upon the broad highway of that presentment of Christianity which has emphatically been from the beginning the doctrine of the Church in contrast to that of the sects. The corner-stone of his system is the two great sacraments, and those sacraments he describes in language of which we can give the best idea by saying that it sounds like an expansion of the latter part of the Church Catechism. The connexion between the Creation and the new creation or new birth of Baptism, and the reciprocal relation of the tree of knowledge and of the Eucharist as type and as antitype, are the very commonplaces of that theology which is in different aspects known as the sacramental system and historical Christianity, and which is, we add, the only consistent key to the formularies of the Church of England. Yet our Baptismal and Eucharistic services, from which such pregnant illustrations of his assertions could be culled, are either forgotten or deliberately ignored by the General. He can say truly and well, "as the earth was once covered with water and dead, so Baptism covers a man figuratively with water, to denote his death, to state publicly that he acknowledges death as his due, and, as the earth emerges in its new creation, so man comes forth from Baptism a new creature, and he can then feed on the tree of life in the Holy Communion." Yet he seems unconscious that the Baptismal service long since invoked the Almighty, "Who of Thy great mercy didst save Noah and his family in the ark from perishing by water; and also didst safely lead the children of Israel Thy people through the Red Sea, figuring thereby Thy Holy Baptism, and by the Baptism of Thy well-beloved Son Jesus Christ in the river Jordan didst sanctify water to the mystical washing away of sin."

Such a phenomenon as General Gordon's book is gives rise to various reflections. It is a very distinct indication of how much the appreciation of historical and sacramental Christianity is "in the air." It is evidence of the hold which this Christianity has got even of those who may be most unconscious of its presence, or who believe themselves most inimical to its progress. Short of a miracle, no soldier, however pious and heroic, of the last or the last but one generation could have written the book. It is also, though we do not wish to dwell very heavily on this point, an argumentum ad hominem that the sacramental doctrine does stand confessed on the face of Scripture, to the extent of justifying us in refusing to accept the assertion of controversialists on the other side, who pretend that more seeking is needed to discover that theory within the sacred records than the solifidian one.

No doubt the value of the volume as a psychological curiosity turns much upon that which its writer takes care to veil in impenetrable obscurity—namely, the moral and intellectual training which has enabled him to reach his actual position. We should on this head be inclined to offer a commonplace suggestion, and ask whether the fact may not be that the early schooling of General Gordon was in the good old paths of the Church of England and its invaluable Catechism. The good seed may have lain dormant, and when it shot up the growth appeared to the man of exceptional confidence to be spontaneous. But, whatever may be the secret of its inception, the phenomenal value of the book is incontestable.

BINKO'S BLUES.*

TO consider the whole question of allegory à propos of Binko's Blues may look like considering too curiously. But it is really time to ask what are the conditions of an art, that of paradoxical and humorous allegory, which in our age has become undoubtedly popular. When Mr. Besant lectured last week on the art of fiction, he observed that the Muse of Story-telling had no place among the Nine, though Story-telling was decidedly older than the Nine Muses, who first appear in what many think an interpolated passage of the Odyssey. The reason is that the Greeks did not recognize the art of prose-romance at all; it was not an admitted genre, and only came to the surface after the Eastern and Western world had got thoroughly mixed up together. The same statement may be made about allegory. The genre has no very definite limits, whether in plastic art, poetry, or prose, because it was practically unknown to the legislators of the arts. Apologues they had; and fables, and personified abstract ideas, like Love and Death, hold a place in their literature and myths. But a long romance with an obvious second meaning pervading it throughout below the surface was quite alien to the genius of Greece. It is from the middle ages that we inherit Faux Semblant, and Bel Accueil, and all the typical beings of the Romance of the Rose and its descendants. Perhaps it is the result of this origin of modern allegory that no one can exactly define the province of the genre. Is an allegory successful when it entertains us in such a straightforward way that we quite forget its lesson, as in the case of the Pilgrim's Progress? Probably very few readers have ever got much profit or pleasure out of musing on the various typical meanings of Bunyan's famous book, and certainly we only enjoy the Faerie Queen when we forget that it has a second meaning altogether. That is the common modern way of looking at the matter. On the other hand, there have been times and peoples where nothing but the second meaning was thought of any merit, as when Porphyry set himself to extort the moral of the Cave of the Nymphs, or when Commentator made an allegory of the Empire and the Church out of the Vita Nuova.

These remarks are not so much "in the air" as they seem to be, for our estimate of the success of Binko's Blues depends on our theory of the limits of humorous writing. Mr. Merivale's purpose was probably to write a fairy tale for children, and a brief allegory of modern society, in somewhat a burlesque and punning vein, for men and women. Therefore the question arises, Will children take the story merely as a story, without being puzzled and "put off" by the sarcastic allusions to contemporary foibles and follies in literature, social affairs, politics, and so forth? We have very little doubt that children will pursue the tale of the Princess Floriline, of her lover and bridegroom, Baron Osy, of Binko, the depraved and hideous foe of domestic joy, the humpbacked but foiled Richard of Fairyland, with perfect zest and pleasure. Yet we can hardly doubt that some children, of a more inquiring nature, will be puzzled by the talk about the Rab*, about the trials which lasted so long, and were tried so often, about the land of Dollarosa, justly described as "quite the most remarkable of nations and quite the least particular." "He did not care what he pirated," says the author when drawing the unflattering portrait of Binko, "and he drove a great trade, among many other trades, in abducting the early manuscripts of Tadtite romances or Cimarosian plays from their unsuspecting authors, and exacting a large commission for them in the distant country with which he chiefly dealt, the Great Settlements of Dollarosa." Our impression is that a child in reading Binko's Blues will carry away from such passages as these a vague but deeply satisfying impression of the composite and mysterious villainy of that evil character. At the same time, it would be easy to argue, à priori, that Mr. Merivale's proper public will be repelled by what they certainly cannot be expected to understand. There are times when grown-up people almost wonder whether the Rose and the Ring is really a good present for a small boy or girl. Our eyes being purged with bitter euphrasy and rue, we see a great many things in the Rose and the Ring which it seems far from necessary that a child should notice. But, if any one will try to remember his own first acquaintance with that romance, he will probably admit that for him the worldly wisdom, the keen vision of snobbishness, did not exist. He was wrapped up in the story, trembled for Rosalba when the Princess was thrown to the lions, and thought it no more than proper and natural that Giglio should make that prodigiously long speech to the students.

If this "reading" of childish character and tastes be correct, then, no doubt, children will be immensely excited about the adventures of the fair Floriline. The Queen of Tadt, a land proved, in an amusing piece of pure nonsense-writing, to be outside of the map, Floriline suffers much from many physicians and many masters. The former condemn her to the regimen which, as the author says, "is nearly the same for all patients, whatever their sex, bulk, or occupation." One egg for breakfast (one slice of cold bacon is now more fashionable); one small slice of cold mutton, or one small mutton-chop, for luncheon; and fish, joint, and plain pudding for dinner—these were all the royal meats of the Princess Floriline. Happily, perhaps, for the sovereign lady, knowledge had become so enormous in Tadt that people, if they were ever to learn anything, had to reverse the common method, and go back from to-day. Thus Floriline, if she had been an English girl, would not have begun her studies of English history with primitive man and the mammoth, but with the facts of her own minority, as far as they had gone. Living in a domain where women had not been eligible as sovereigns, Floriline enjoyed the rivalry of a pretender, Binko, the piratical captain of the Tonic Bark. At a moment when the Thigs and Wories, the constitutional parties, had nearly teased each other into extinction, the Sentimentals, with their blue-ribboned leader, Phœbus Apollinaris, came in, and, of course, they had a leaning towards Binko. Their policy, we learn, was based upon a belief in the universal goodness of everybody, if you would only trust them (except with drink), and therefore they trusted Binko. But the conduct of this brutal and licentious prince, when asked to take the oath, was of a character which offended even his chief Sentimental supporters. Floriline was, therefore, accepted as future ruler, and her education was very carefully seen to:—

> Her reading upon general subjects was confined to the pages of the two great Sage-green magazines, the Present Sentry and the Nightlightly Review, whose titles showed how wide awake they were about everything. They were originally introduced into Tadt by Shpex and his friends, and their motto was a passage from an old Karamsinian comedy. It was that "Every kind of subject was permitted, as long as it was tedious." Anything at all entertaining was strictly excluded, because of its bad effects upon the mind; but partly also because so many people in Tadt lived by writing, and so few of them had the smallest power of entertaining anybody, that it would never do to set a bad example. Articles which nobody but their writers could understand were much in request, and those which the writers did not understand themselves were paid for extra.

But the fairies, described in a very charming passage, prevented Floriline from becoming a dreadful little intense female prig, and she was especially under the care of the fairy Robur. From what terrible dangers the fairy afterwards saved her on the Chloral Reef, it must be left to the reader to discover, as this is decidedly the most ingenious part of the plot. Floriline, rejecting all the photographs of more princely wooers, chose the gallant and beautiful Baron Osy. But scarcely had she been united to him, after ceremonies in which trumpets, butter-boats, and similar joyful instruments of music and mutual adulation were sonorous, than the pair were snatched away in beauty's bloom by Binko and his pirate minions. The relief and delight which came to Floriline on the pirate barque where, whatever dangers lowered, science and education, and the "Admiration Army" (copyright) were out of the way, are humorously described. The perils from cannibals and chloral reefs which the lovers encountered, and the happy manner of their release, must be perused by curious youth for itself. It is not our business to "come and spoil the fun" by an analysis of the plot or anticipation of the catastrophe. But we must be permitted to quote a passage concerning the anarchy and intellectual advertising systems which devastated Tadt during the absence of the legitimate ruler:—

> The Culturists, too, wrote chiefly about each other in a set of small journals of their own; and though none of them had ever done anything whatever, individual, or original, or worthy of note—they mentioned each other's names so constantly and so systematically as "that eminent thinker"—"that enlightened critic"—etc., etc., that the public began to hear of their names in spite of itself, and to suppose that these gentlemen really had done something, though when they were asked what, neither the public nor the gentlemen themselves could say.

Ridicule, alas! will not stop the advertisements of the "Culturists." We have ceased to be vexed much with paragraphs about professional beauties, but twitters of literary gossip about literary animalculæ are even more common than ever. One cannot take up certain journals without reading that Professor Nicks has finished punctuating his treatise on Amalekite Algebra, that Mr. Brown is editing the works of Scalion de Virbluneau, or that Jones has achieved his monody on some other unlucky culturist, snatched away at the early age of fourteen. This system of advertisement has reached such a pitch that even the advertised are beginning to blush like peonies at the mere sight of a column of "cultured" chatter. To return to Binko's Blues, we quote a passage in another key, descriptive of "The Master of Coldpore," a patriot who made patriotism pay:

> The Master was cool and impassible, scrupulously polite (where it might be injurious to be otherwise), and capable of assuming interest without enthusiasm. He was the most finished master of the use of the cat's-paw whom history has seen: and when murder and outrage followed with deadly persistency on the march of his passionless denunciation, he had but to wash his hands. Sometimes, after some outrage of special atrocity, he was perhaps not very visible for some days, and it was whispered that he went about armed. But personal courage was not a requisite for the paid school of patriotism. For every wretched life among the ill-starred colonists, which through some strange fatality had to be sacrificed in his cause, either at the murderous attack of some life only less wretched than the first, or by the bitter and miserable retaliation of the block, he only seemed to be followed the more—for what was that to him? He that struck no blow had nothing to fear, and the subscriptions of the grateful colonists made him a rich man for life, and set him upon his feet among the class of men who, for owning the land (as for that matter they did in Tadt too), were the especial objects of his patient tactics of attack.

The answer to this estimate has never been produced, and the character of the Master must be left to the judgment of a history more serious than that of Tadt.

Perhaps the best criticism and justification of Binko's Blues is contained in the preliminary sonnet, an admirable piece of verse, with which our notice may appropriately conclude.

> Tossing in broken slumber to and fro,
> By too much journal-reading half distraught,
> The latest miracles of modern thought
> To living form I saw before me grow!
> They came,—the monsters of advertisement,—
> From subterranean railways gambolling;
> Or springing like weird mushrooms in a night,
> On track of fire or house-demolishing,
> O'er giant-hoardings in a grisly row;
> Heads one half chestnut-brown, the other white,
> Strange drinks red-lettered over gaudy bars,
> Wild phantom ships and ghastly pickle-jars;
> Till as I wondered why such dreams were sent,
> A voice said, "We are fairies: rise and write."

FORTUNES MADE IN BUSINESS.*

SOME years ago the then President of the Board of Trade addressed a circular to all the Railway Companies, drawing attention to the frequency of preventible accidents, and suggesting more stringent rules and precautions. The general scope of the letter was excellent; but its effect was somewhat marred by the selection of examples and typical cases. For it then became easy for any one Company to show that no such irregularity or defect as that made the subject of severe comment in the tenth paragraph "of your letter under acknowledgment" had ever occurred for thirty years, say, on the whole of the long line between Shuntbury and Middleborough. Whatever might have happened elsewhere, owing to neglect or wilfulness, the Directors and servants of this exemplary and cautious Company were clear. The other galled jades might wince, and so on. Something of this security may be felt by each one of the "Various Writers" who, the preface tells us, in company with a nameless editor, have been engaged for years in collecting the scattered information now presented to the public in these two volumes. When the critic makes sharp remarks about exuberant style, the introduction of irrelevant matter, or errors of fact, each writer may console himself with the thought that his own particular contribution is not meant, or that the editor must be held responsible for the outturn of the whole. There is no reason whatever why the biographies of successful merchants and inventors should not be written as well as those of eminent lawyers or divines. Thackeray in one of his lighter pieces says, that next to eating good dinners, a person of a truly benevolent disposition would like to read about them. And, similarly, we may say that ordinary individuals who have just made a mere competence out of the struggle for existence, may like to hear of the lucky chances and the scientific inventions which have carried others more fortunate than the reader to the summit of fame and fortune in the mercantile and engineering world. It would be ungracious to sneer at several of the characters in this work because they do not bring us face to face with interesting political changes, or because they were more given to study the statistics of the Mining Journal or the Builder than the pages of Thucydides. There are men, says Dickens, in his account of the Brothers Cheeryble, who knowing all this, to wit, their charity and worth, would not dine with these men "because they eat with their knives and have never been to school." We have not read this work in any such spirit. But it is in places stamped with that social defect at which Thackeray was always shooting out his sharp quills. One writer seems to hold that one of the main objects of honours and decorations conferred by the Crown is that the wearer may display them at evening parties. Another is under the impression that the Order of St. Michael and St. George is usually the reward of service at Court. One gentleman still alive comes in for a high encomium because he has not spent a fortune made by alizarine and other dyes, in luxurious ease and vulgar ostentation; and, generally speaking, there is a smack of self-satisfaction in the enumeration of large figures and gigantic statistics of tonnage, hogsheads, miles of private railway, and workshops covering so many acres. Then there is often a resort to padding, or to illustrations which illustrate nothing of the matter in hand, be it wool or iron, light alpacas, or wholesome beer. One life is prefaced by a page or two about Don Quixote, Amadis de Gaul, the Seven Champions of Christendom, Robinson Crusoe, Giant Blunderbore, the Pilgrim's Progress, and Her Majesty's Fifth Fusiliers. Another is illustrated by two pages of an old Punch. But the most extraordinary episodes are those of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright. It will at once occur to every reader that both these names are known everywhere, simply because they belong to men who have sought distinction in politics, and not made fortunes in business. Seventy pages are devoted to the account of Mr. Gladstone's family. His father's friendship with Canning, his sort of apology for the slave trade in one of his earliest efforts, the character of his oratory, and the various offices he has filled in successive Administrations, take up a large space. And we have also notices of his literary activity, his praiseworthy habit of answering troublesome correspondents on post-cards, his fondness for china and bric-à-brac, his private life, and the kindliness of heart and activity of mind which make him ready "to speak or write on anything and everything at a moment's notice." Mr. Bright and his family occupy fifty pages more, but it is fair to state that here we have some interesting notices of cotton-spinning as well as of platform oratory. It would try Mr. Gladstone's marvellous powers of language to show by what process the reputation of either himself or his late colleague had either originated or been enhanced by business. Possibly some essayist of a future generation, if he lights on this book, may find a pleasing subject for speculation in tracing Mr. Gladstone's possible career had he followed his father's example and stuck to Liverpool and business. When we run over the list of men who have built magnificent fleets of steamers, extracted anthracene from pitch, perfected machines for combing wool, or forced iron out of ironstone, we may be inclined to think that the Prime Minister would have been quite equal to proving to the satisfaction of himself and all his partners that there were at least three ways of doing everything; three modes of brewing beer, three routes to cross the Atlantic, three courses open to those who spin flax and card wool. Less fertile minds may hold that, in commerce and in politics, there are only two ways of doing a thing—the right way and the wrong way.

Yet there are many narratives in this compilation which exhibit some of the best qualities of the self-taught Englishman. Patience, perseverance, contentment in poverty, generosity in affluence, kindness to friends and dependents, happy selection of chances, instruments, and agencies, discoveries amounting to inspiration, an infinite capacity for taking pains, are all well brought out. Some chances seem to come to the finder like an easy catch at mid-wicket. They could hardly be missed. Others, again, could only have occurred to an inventive faculty combined with an accurate knowledge of mechanical forces and the uses to which raw material and waste could be put. Here are a few instances in which splendid fortunes have been made in the last hundred years. A fortunate exhaustion of a certain lead mine in Cumberland sent the father of Mr. Holden to work in a coal mine near Glasgow. The son managed to acquire a very fair education in mathematics, Latin, Greek, and chemistry, and seemed destined to attain no higher position than classical master in some English academy. An accident enabled him to invent the useful lucifer match in 1829. Any chemist knew how to strike a light, but it occurred to Mr. Holden to put sulphur and not wood under the explosive material that gave out the light. A year or so after this he sold the goodwill of his school and entered the service of Messrs. Townend, where he was enabled to supplant the rude instruments used in wool-combing by delicate but practical machines fitted with teeth "finer than the finest sewing needle." In partnership with Mr. Lister he established mills in France, at Rheims, Croix near Roubaix, and St. Denis, and we can believe that at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, of all the samples of combed wools, those of Holden et Fils attracted not the least share of attention. The story of Mr. Holden's success, which is concisely told, is mixed up with that of Mr. Lister, his partner. This gentleman happened to see some rubbish in a London warehouse, pleasant neither to the eye, nor the nose, nor the touch. It was called "silk waste," being made of mulberry leaves and bits of stick. After many experiments he was enabled to convert this apparently worthless material into beautiful fabrics of velvet and plush. Mr. Holden sits in the present Parliament. Mr. Lister competed unsuccessfully against the late Lord F. Cavendish for the North Riding in 1880.

The Low Moor Company is simply the history of the transformation of a comparatively worthless estate of moor and bog into a splendid property of coal and iron mines, tramways, furnaces, and workshops. This tract, belonging to an indebted Yorkshire squire, was bought about a century ago for 34,000*l*. The purchasers have founded families and left fine fortunes. But we quote this rather as an instance of a legitimate speculation in land known to contain abundant mineral wealth and of the skilful development of its hidden resources, than as displaying mechanical and inventive genius. Again, hoop-rings, split pens, and electroplate are not amongst the discoveries which have materially altered or highly benefited society. But they are serviceable articles; and the share or credit to be claimed by each partner in these ventures is well told in the chapter on Sir Josiah Mason. It is satisfactory to learn that out of pen-making, rings of india-rubber, and nickel-smelting, have sprung almshouses and orphanages and the Scientific College at Birmingham, which alone cost 180,000*l*. The career of Sir Henry Bessemer, his projectiles, his disputes with the Government, and his steel works, is familiar enough. This chapter is by no means a favourable specimen of literary workmanship. The most important fact recorded—the key, it may be said, to the success of the steel works—is that Sir H. Bessemer, after a series of nearly ruinous experiments, found out the secret of producing "steel worth 50*l*. or 60*l*. a ton from charcoal iron which cost only 7*l*. per ton." The saving by the displacement of iron for steel in rails and tyres is, if we may trust the figures, enormous. Almost equally well known in the commercial world is the utilization of alpaca wool by Mr. Titus Salt. Either owing to prejudice or clumsiness, no one could make anything of this article till Mr. Salt tried "alpaca warp" and "alpaca weft," and turned a nondescript hair wool into an elegant dress. We cannot say that this chapter gains by the introduction of a fanciful description from Household Words of Mr. Salt entering the warehouse of C. W. and F. Foozle & Co. It is said to be in Dickens's "happiest vein." It is, in truth, characteristic of his oddities and inveterate love of exaggeration. The Peases of Darlington and the Fisons and Forsters of Burley-in-Wharfdale carry us to Yorkshire railways, waterworks at Middlesborough and other places, and Bradford politics, leading to a fair sketch of the public career of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. But, as we remarked before, the public estimation in which Mr. W. E. Forster is deservedly held by all parties is due to politics and not to cotton. In the account of the Fairbairns there is a good deal to interest; but it may be questioned whether Sir S. Cunard and Mr. Bass and his sons have not earned more gratitude from the average Englishman than others who have revolutionized the art of war or turned picturesque hillsides into reeking factories. It was urged with much extravagance in the discussions on the discredited scheme for the Channel Tunnel, that the enterprise was worth the money if only for the sake of preventing invalids and aldermen from passing an uncomfortable hour and a half in the passage from Dover to Calais. The founders of a Company which, with others, has reduced the passage of the stormy Atlantic to one week have surely achieved a substantial success without the least political danger. The Cunard Company has never lost a single vessel out of its magnificent fleet; and it may be rivalled but has not been surpassed, for the security and comfort of passengers, by any other Company. If Cunard is a powerful name in New York and Liverpool, all India has heard of the mighty name of Bass, the most respected brewer whereof has just in full years and general honour gone over to the majority. Since the time when the senior of that name improved on the Pale Ale of Hodgson, the Burton manufacture has been—we speak seriously—a valuable help to the good administration of the Indian Empire. Ale, bottled, pure, and sparkling, is recommended by the medical profession to be drunk in moderation by man, woman, and child all over the plains. It enables hard-worked officials to repair the ravages of the hot season, to defy the clamminess of the rains, and to shake off a fever. Many a man has dated his recovery from sickness from the hour when his doctor allowed him to return to his Bass. The liquid is consumed by Young India, not always in moderation, and has supplied him with the finest outbursts of his patriotism and the most splendid apologies for the Ilbert Bill. The thoughtful native, in fact, often imports his liquor and his patriotism. More than forty years ago the merits of Pale Ale were celebrated by the late Mr. H. M. Parker, B.C.S., in a lively poem, from which we have just room for the following stanzas. There are thirteen in all, every one ending with the same magic and household words:—

When o'er Bengal's storm-troubled bay
Lowers the dark monsoon;
And the wild tempest's iron sway
Shadows our dreary June;
The weary tar, who comes below
From striking mast or sail,
Feels home within his stout heart glow
At sight of thee, Pale Ale.

And the poem ends thus:—

Rich and capacious goblets bring,
And fresh, cool wreaths entwine,
Of verdant hops, dew glittering,
Old England's genuine vine;
Crown us, and as the beakers foam
Let's drink each glorious sail
That wafts from our own island home
Its richest gift, Pale Ale.

The editor, in any future edition of these Fortunes, might do worse than replace some of his padding by the short poem of which the above is an extract. It was published in a miscellaneous collection of prose and verse, as "Bole Poujis," in 1851.

FOUR NOVELS.*

THE scene of Miss Howard's new novel is laid at Plouvenec, a village on the Breton coast; the heroine, Guenn Rodellec, is a Breton fisher-girl; the heroes—there is more than one—are Thymert, rector of the Lannions, and Everett Hamor, the American painter. Hamor is a young man with plenty of talent, plenty of amiability, and plenty of will, but emotionally shallow, and an incarnation of artistic selfishness. He comes of Puritan stock; he has "taught school out West," hunted bison on their native runs, exchanged shots and fisticuffs with hardy miners, studied painting in Paris, dwelt in tents at Barbizon, and had experiences of every sort; he likes to like and be liked, but he cares for nothing but art; he is a kind of feeble, highly Americanized reflection of what is worst in Goethe. Thymert, on the other hand, is a valiant Breton, half priest and half sailor; he is amazingly strong and masterful; he has the single-heartedness of a child, and the passions of a true man; he is of the stuff of which martyrs are made, and heroic missionaries, and immortal partisan leaders. Between these two is the fisher-maiden Guenn Rodellec. Guenn is the bonniest, blithest, most delightful girl in Plouvenec. She is small and light; but she can row admirably, and lift a greater weight than almost any man in the village. She is loose-tongued and high-handed; but she is utterly pure and stainless, and she has the loveliest laugh ever heard. She is only seventeen; but she is already a regular buyer for M. Menier, the sardine merchant; she is the best runner in the village, and the best dancer in the department; she can hold her own with any scold in Plouvenec, and she is besides a mother to her hunchbacked brother Nannic, and as good a daughter as possible to her scoundrel old father, the fisherman Rodellec. Withal she is absolutely heart-free; her savage maidenhood is such as would have become the nymphs who followed Artemis through the forests—the tameless company who, "au crépuscule, à l'heure où les lionnes vont boire, lavent dans les sources froides leurs mains sanglantes et leurs bras poudreux." With Hamor's coming, however, all this is changed. She begins by hating and fearing him; she ends by falling devoutly in love with him. She has always been contemptuous of painters, and steadily refused to earn from them by sitting as a model. But, her father aiding, she sits to Hamor, and then, by swift degrees, identifies herself with him, his interests, and his work, till she becomes completely dependent on him, and, though he knows it not, has no existence save as his slave. He, for his part, cares nothing at all about her. He is too puritanical and too selfishly indifferent to make love to her; he contents himself with imposing his will upon her, with making her do exactly as he pleases, and with behaving to her as pleasantly and gracefully, neither more nor less, as his graceful and pleasant nature obliges him to behave to everybody. Guenn and her brother save his life more than once, and Guenn also saves his picture. But he either does not know, or does not care to recognize, the immense affection he has called into being; and, when the time comes, he leaves Plouvenec on a mere matter of business, without so much as waiting to say good-bye. Guenn, it should be noted, has gone over to Quimper, to buy fripperies for another picture. She returns, to find her hero gone; and that night, in a delirium of baffled love and wounded pride and torture of heart, she rows out through the storm towards the Lannions, to confess herself to Thymert, the valiant rector, and is drowned. Thymert, who is her cousin, has loved her all along, with the whole strength of his great, deep nature. In the morning he goes down to the beach, to see if the tempest has wrought much misery for his own flock; and there he finds Guenn's body. All that day he prays beside it, and with the night he vanishes from the Lannions. At Rome, ten years after, Hamor, by this time a successful man, meets a Carmelite monk, and recognizes him for the quondam rector of the Lannions. He has never heard of Guenn's death, has never troubled himself to inquire about her since the day he left Plouvenec; he had sent her a parcel of pretty things from Paris, it is true, but whether they reached her or not he had never once cared to ask; and he is really sorry—it gives him "quite a shock—after these years, too"—to have such uncomfortable news. Thymert does not tell him why she died, nor exactly when; and when the other, "with his fine musical intonation," begs the priest to come and talk over old times, and assures him that he "shall always retain the strongest and most grateful remembrances" of them, he simply bids his interlocutor good-bye and passes on his way. Beside him, bearing "on his face the majesty of unutterable pain," Hamor is contemptible enough. But Hamor is shallow as of yore, and withal self-satisfied as of yore, and he does not know it. He pities the priest, and is inclined to scold religion for spoiling him; but he altogether fails to perceive his own immense inferiority.

This is, of course, the briefest possible outline of Miss Howard's story. It is completed by a great deal of excellent material in the shape of character, and dialogue, and emotion. Guenn herself is, it may be, a thought idyllic and untrue to fact. But she is thoroughly consistent as a creation, and her figure, at once brilliant and pathetic, is of those that live long in the memory. This is hardly the case with Hamor. It is difficult indeed, if not impossible, to believe in Hamor. His selfishness is too obviously invented, his sexlessness too flagrant and unreal. We have called him a sort of faint and feeble reflection of a certain aspect of Goethe. But the parallel is unjust. Goethe was, before all, a man; Hamor, if he is anything at all, is only a literary Americanism. The priest is far better and stronger work. He has passion, he is natural, he is touched with the large simplicity of life. For the other characters of Miss Howard's novel—which contains plenty of good drawing and fine colour and true nature—our readers must seek for themselves. Some of them—as, for instance, Guenn's brother Nannic, the urchin wizard, and "Madame," mistress of the Hôtel des Voyageurs—have, in their several ways, uncommon merit.

Captain Hawley Smart's new book is a collection of short stories. Every one of them appears to have already done duty elsewhere; hardly one of them but is fit to do duty a second time, and reappear as part of a book. For Captain Smart knows all about the horsey world of which he has become the peculiar chronicler, and he sets down his knowledge with an ingenious vivacity, as it were a lingering flavour of Charles Lever, pleasing to the mind. His men are good, honest, companionable fellows, and if they teach you little or nothing, save that one natural heavy dragoon is better than a wilderness of unnatural philanthropical ideals, they amuse you in the process, and you part from them with regret, though you forget them five minutes after. His women, in the same way, are good, honest, companionable creatures, and though, to the stern philosopher, they are a little too fond of flirting and slang and a trifle too apt at giving and taking the odds, you have only to be with them to find life pass pleasantly enough. Then Captain Smart has the good fortune to possess, by appropriation it may be, a subject of inexhaustible interest and charm. Horses and races have been a universal passion since the beginning of time. To go to the Derby—in a four-in-hand or in a "Whitechapel brougham" it is all one—is to be purely and wholly human, and to draw the winner in a sweepstakes is to be a hero among men. And if this be so, what is it to be a hardened and consistent sportsman? What must be the glories of that state of life which confers upon its practitioners the privilege of sharing in such mysteries as "pulling" and "roping," "milking" and "bucketing," "squaring" and "selling," and "welshing"? of indulging in such fearless new fashions "as landing a raker" and "coming a cropper"? of expressing themselves in such noble and harmonious English as "it takes the pluck out of you, makes one a bit funky, and one never gets out of a mucker that way"? Of such desperate delights are Captain Smart's stories compacted. Without incurring the reproach of affectation, he may speak of a saddle as "the pigskin"; he may "bolt," he may "tip," he may "fluke," and none will say him nay; he may "take sixteen ponies on the winner," and do feats of that sort, in whose contemplation the unsportsmanlike writer bursts with envy. In his present volume he gives us a handful of stories, thrice welcome to those whose "horsiness" is excessive, acceptable—perhaps in a less degree, but still acceptable—to those in whom the quality is merely human and normal. The best is probably the first, which tells how, in spite of fateful dreams and tremendous presentiments, and the injunctions of a dying parent, a sporting man who ought to have known better did not win on Caractacus. But there is little to choose between this one and others; as, for instance, that which sets forth how a dark horse won over Ballycoree. Another good one has for its hero an American bewitched with Charles Lever, and tells how, after years of waiting, he was at last admitted to mess with a crack regiment, how he looked in vain for Monsoon and others, and how, by his own act and deed, and to his own immense disgust, he went home sober as a judge. To this we may add that "Jack Thistleton's Luck" is very readable and fresh, and that one or two of the ghosts in "The Spectre Signal" are quite good enough to remember.

In Dearforgil, "A Historical Romance of 1152-72," the author of The Last Earl of Desmond and other immortal works relates how Diarmaid of Leinster, after marrying with Una O'More, stole away Dearforgil, wife of Tiernan O'Rourke, and, being robbed of his prey, and also dispossessed of his kingdom, called in "the Saxon and Guilt," and with Strongbow's help, and Fitzstephen's, and Hugh de Lacy's, made "Virtue and Erin" eternal allies, and became, as it were, the Great First Cause of Mr. Healy. It is an amazing production. It breathes of Samuel Lover and The Four Masters, of Micky Free and Brian Boru, of the late Tom Moore and the Brehon Laws, of Malachi of the Collar of Gold and the lamented Harry Lorrequer. King Diarmaid scowls and poses valiantly—like Mr. Warner in The Bastile of Calvados; and his "Ollav," his Bard, says "Bathershin," and "Arrah," and "Faith," as though, even to his oaths, he were the direct ancestor of Handy Andy. Strongbow's nickname "De arcu forti" gets disguised as "Darky Forty," which obliges the fair Eva to inquire if her husband presumptive is not "a little black man, about forty years of age." Hugh de Lacy, the proud Norman, is presented as a kind of mediæval anticipation of a burlesque writer. "If I don't string him up," says he of O'Rourke, "my name is not De Lacy." This hero, moreover, is not only a punster himself, but the cause of punning in others. "A trunk, indeed," soliloquizes the author, in contemplation of the Norman's headless body, "a trunk indeed, for it was covered with hair." Strongbow, like the courtly creature he is, explains himself in the French of the period. "He gave me the lie," says he of somebody or other, "for which I returned him un coup au derrière." Diarmaid, all traitor as he is, is so true an Irishman that he achieves a monumental bull:—"'O God! I am blinded,' exclaimed the Princess, raising her hand to her eyes. 'Are you?' cried the King, trembling from head to foot. 'Can you see, Dearforgil?'" To complete her lover's achievement, the stricken lady answers "Yes," and the bull becomes representative and national. "How came he to win my virgin affections?" soliloquizes the wicked Una, referring to her partner in crime, Killpatrick, alias Father Peter, alias "The Connaughtman," alias Donnchadh, Lord of Osraighe; and when, a few pages further on, Father Peter is found poisoning the wrong person, out of sheer Irishness of temperament, the startled reader can but echo her Majesty's inquiry. "But then," the guilty Queen reflects, "then I was a young and inexperienced girl, without a noble passion in my soul"; a remark which, as Una's ambition is all in the way of poisoning, stabbing, and destruction generally, tells well for the "noble passion," the patriotic purity of motive, by which the bosoms are fired of Mr. Parnell and the vocal O'Donovan Rossa. Indeed, anything "more Irish and less nice" than Dearforgil has not often been seen. Everybody's hand is against everybody else; nobody understands anybody; the general confusion debauches the reader's mind. It is a sort of Donnybrook, where Giraldus Cambrensis takes hands with Shaun the Post, and Dr. O'Donovan measures shillelaghs with the Abbé MacGeohagan, and the author and St. Kevin's Kathleen and Thady O'Flinn and William of Malmesbury and the Colleen Bawn all shout and fight and hurroo and caper in concert, like the Home Rule party on a field-night at St. Stephen's. "Fiction," as the author remarks in his preface, "is wild and frolicsome, and apt to curvet in harness." That is true enough; but if Fiction is always as wild and frolicsome as in Dearforgil, and curvets in harness in no other wise than here, then, in the language of Mr. Bumble, Fiction "is a hase," and the less we see or hear of Fiction the better.

Miss Lever is a novelist by inheritance. In Years Ago she breaks ground with such briskness and assurance as augur well of her future. Her story is trite and slight to a degree. The scene of it is laid at Fiume, and the flavour—half English, half Roumanian, with a dash of Greek and Italian—is cosmopolitan and mixed enough to remind us of the late Lever himself. To Fiume the heroine, Margaret Seymour, comes down, for a change of air, from Pesth, with her sister, her brother-in-law, and her little niece and nephew. There she encounters a certain Mirko Stevanovič, a wonderful Montenegrin, blessed with all manner of accomplishments, rich in all manner of experience, and possessed of the fatal gift of beauty. She and Mirko fall in love and determine to marry. At Fiume, however, there abides a certain Perdicaris, a wily and dubious Greek, who has a wicked wife and a fair and gracious daughter. Perdicaris is heavily in debt to Mirko. Years before he has accepted a sum in trust from the Montenegrin's mother; that sum he has taken to himself, and, after making his fortune with it, he has got to the point of denying the deposit and his liability. Mirko goes off to search for documentary evidence in support of his claim; and when Margaret sees him again, he is standing before the altar with Merika Perdicaris. Of course, they have been betrayed. Mirko has been told that Margaret is false; and, to square matters with Perdicaris, he has accepted Merika and Merika's fortune. When he learns how he has been tricked, which he does half an hour after the wedding, he has a tremendous scene with Margaret, departs from Fiume and his spouse, and, aweary of his life, "flings it away in battle with the Turk," like the bridegroom of Rogers's "Ginevra"; while Margaret and Merika, after nursing each other dutifully through a long illness apiece, are left to amuse themselves as best they can ever afterwards. Obviously an intrigue of this type has little or nothing in itself to recommend it. In Miss Lever's hands, however, it assumes a certain freshness, and proves very far from ineffective. Its lines are cast in unfamiliar places, and among manners which are strange and remote from our own. It is supported by a set of characters which are slightly but firmly drawn, and which are at once novel and natural. A great deal more pains and a little more ambition, and Miss Lever should make us a really good novel.

COLONEL LUMSDEN'S BEOWULF.*

THAT in the short space of two years a second edition of Colonel Lumsden's translation of Beowulf should have been called for must be a source of legitimate satisfaction to the translator. But if, as we doubt not is the case, Colonel Lumsden is really anxious for the progress of the subject to which he has devoted so much of his leisure time, he would be the first to agree with us that this fact is even more satisfactory as evidence of the increased interest which the English people are beginning to take in what it is the fashion to call the origins of their national literature and language, after being long content to leave them to be studied almost exclusively by foreigners—Danes and Germans. How greatly this has been the case with our great national epic of Beowulf, a short review of the bibliography of the subject will conclusively show. The Editio Princeps of Beowulf was published by the Dane Thorkelin in 1815; but Kemble, the leader of the Renaissance of Anglo-Saxon studies in England, was the first who laboured critically on the text, of which he published editions in 1833 and 1835, while his prose translation appeared in 1837. Then Ettmüller in 1840 published his translation of the poem in German alliterative verse with a critical introduction. Of the special feature of Ettmüller's translation we shall have occasion to speak later. As a critic he was the first to apply what may be called the Wolffian theory to Beowulf. He belonged, in fact, to that school of German criticism which treats literary productions as Goethe, according to Mr. Matthew Arnold, treated "the suffering human race"—

> He read each wound, each weakness clear;
> And struck his finger on the place,
> And said, Thou ailest here, and here!

And this purely subjective criticism he proceeded to impress on his readers by printing in a different manner all those passages which he considered to be later interpolations. In fact, Ettmüller dealt with Beowulf very much as Ewald dealt with Genesis. In this style of criticism he has been followed by Simrock and Müllenhoff, of whom the latter has written what he is pleased to call "the inner history of the Beowulf," in which he not only points out the later additions, but assigns them to their respective authors. Of him we are likely to hear again, as he is announced to contribute to the second volume of the autotype edition of Beowulf. In 1847 and 1851 appeared editions with translation by the Dane Schaldemose, who quietly ignored Kemble's labours, while largely appropriating their results. One original contribution, however, he must be allowed to have made; for he discovered that the Cottonian Library was in Oxford. In 1849 was published a curious work by A. Diedrich Wackerbarth, A.B., Professor of Anglo-Saxon at the College of our Ladye (sic) of Oscott, with a dedication to the Right Reverend Nicolas Wiseman, D.D., Lord Bishop of Melipotamus; a designation which takes us back to the days before the agitation which gave rise to the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill of 1850; for this was the title under which Cardinal Wiseman was originally appointed coadjutor-bishop to the central district of England as Episcopus in partibus infidelium. This work was a translation of Beowulf into the ballad metre of Scott, of which we shall have more to say presently. Thorpe's edition with translation appeared in 1855. Simrock, who both as critic and translator followed Ettmüller (though he sniffs at him in his preface), published his alliterative translation in 1859. In 1861 Grundtvig, a Dane, who forty years previously (1820) had issued a translation (reprinted in 1865), came out with an edition. Grein's labours in this field—which ended only with his life—began in 1857; in which year appeared the first volumes both of the "Library of Anglo-Saxon Poetry" and also of the "Translations of the Poems of the Anglo-Saxons." A separate edition of the text of Beowulf came out in 1867, and of the translation in 1883, the latter edited by Professor Wülcker, who is also editing with the most laborious conscientiousness the new edition of Grein's "Bibliothek." As a translator Grein followed the alliterative system of Ettmüller and Simrock; but he kept clear of their critical absurdities, declaring that "the poem generally, as it lies before us, is the connected work of a single poet." The four editions of the text by Moritz Heyne have extended over the years 1863-1879. In the former of these years he also published a translation into German blank verse. A German edition by Holder, and a German translation by Wolzogen, are undated; though of the former a second edition has been issued with the date 1882. In 1877 variety was given to the scene by the appearance of a French translation by M. Botkine—the first, and, as far as we know, the only existing work of the kind. But before this last date the English interest in Beowulf had begun to revive. Mr. T. Arnold's useful edition appeared in 1876, Colonel Lumsden's first version in 1881. And now the study seems to have taken firm root on the other side of the Atlantic. An American edition by Harrison began to appear in 1882, followed or accompanied the same year by a translation from the hand of Mr. Garnett.

* Beowulf: an Old English Poem. Translated into Modern Rhymes by Lieut.-Col. Lumsden, late Royal Artillery. Second Edition, revised and corrected. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.

Thus from the above review it will be seen that for nearly forty years, from 1837 to 1876—in other words, from Kemble to Arnold—the study of our earliest national epic was nearly abandoned to foreigners—almost the only exception, though it is an admirable one, being Thorpe's edition of 1855. We say "almost the only exception," because we are doubtful in which class to place the work of Mr. Wackerbarth, already alluded to. The translation, it is true, is in English; but the Christian name and surname of the author alike seem to indicate a Germanic origin, as does also his extraordinary fondness for capital letters. We give, in his own manner, the list of qualities which Mr. Wackerbarth thinks necessary for a translator:—

> The Qualifications necessary for a Translator into the Vernacular are but of a humble character; a fair Knowledge of his Original's and his Country's Languages, sufficient common Sense to understand his Author, sufficient Taste to choose his Expressions wisely, and a conscientious Regard to Faithfulness from the Consideration that with the Many he is the Trustee of his Author's reputation, are all that is required of him.

Where the work to be translated is a poem, we should be inclined to add to this list of requirements some sense of humour and a certain amount of poetical feeling. These we are afraid Mr. Wackerbarth did not possess in any high degree, as the following short extract will show:—

> The Chieftain of the Geáts, tho' there > Were many Treasures rich and fair,
> From out the salvage Monster's Hoarde
> Nought save the Helmet bare away.
> And Pommel of the mighty Sword,
> Bedecked with Gems and Treasures gay:
> The Blade, of twisted Iron good,
> Already had liquified;
> So hot the poisonous Demon's Blood
> That 'neath its Edge had died.

A similar doubt affects us with reference to the classification of the autotype edition of Beowulf now in course of publication by the Early English Text Society; for, though issued under the auspices of an English Society, it has a German editor; and though no one will dream of questioning Professor Zupitza's competence for the post, we cannot help sympathizing in the regrets that have been expressed that an Englishman was not found to take it. For our right to the possession of our own literature really needs asserting; and while we heartily welcome co-operation from all quarters, and admit, not without shame, how much more indefatigably the Germans have laboured at our older literature than we have done ourselves, we must a little protest when critics like Simrock claim Beowulf as a German poem; though for that matter we have seen Shakspeare himself claimed as a German before now. To all such assertions the best answer is contained in the note which Swift wrote against a certain passage in Burnet's History of his own Times, in which that worthy Scot hazarded the remark that Paradise Lost is the finest poem in our language. "A mistake," averred Swift, "for it is writ in English."

We have, however, wandered far away from Colonel Lumsden, and to him we must now return. The first question which confronts the translator of any poem is, of course, the question what metre to adopt. Colonel Lumsden has chosen that long-lined ballad metre into which Chapman translated Homer, or, to quote more homely instances, the metre of "John Gilpin" and "Madame Blaize." We cannot say we think the choice a happy one. The aim of the translator, it has been said, should be to produce on the ordinary reader as much as possible the effect that the original produces on the scholar. Now nothing, we think, could be further than this long trailing metre from giving the effect of the movement of the original, in which the alliterated half lines succeed one another with a lilt and a swing which cannot fail to seize the ear and inspirit the soul of the least accustomed reader. Take any instance, the simpler the better:—

> þær át hýðe stód hringed stefna
> ísig and út fús, æþelinges fær.
> Aléddon þá leofne þéoden. . . .

Any one will feel at once that this is different in kind from the following:—

> Ready at hithe the ringed-stem lay—meet for a prince's bier—
> Like ice it shone—and to her lap they bore their chieftain dear.

For this reason we hold that the German translators Ettmüller, Simrock, and Grein were quite right in their resolve to preserve the alliteration of the original; and their versions, of which the first strikes us as the most forcible and poetic, reproduce to our ear far more the effect of the original than do Heyne's Schilleresque iambics, which, smooth and pleasant as they are, "are not Beowulf," just as Pope's polished couplets "are not Homer." We need, in truth, some poet of eminence to restore to us our old alliterative measures. There is nothing in them which is really alien to the genius of the modern language. Many of the lines in Piers the Plowman are as modern as if they had been written yesterday; such, with the exception of a single word, are the following lines from the prologue:—

> I was weary, for wandered, and went me to rest,
> Under a broad bank, by a burn's side,
> And as I lay and leaned, and looked in the waters,
> I slumbered in a sleeping, it sweyved so merry.

And what can be done by a real poet in the way of rendering Anglo-Saxon poetry into modern measures of the same kind has, of course, been shown by the Laureate in his translation of the Ballad on the Battle of Brunanburh. That in a humbler sphere the same sort of thing might be attempted by those who do not claim to be in any sense the Laureate's peers, we will strive to show by ourselves rendering a short passage into alliterative lines. The passage is that in which Beowulf consoles Hrothgar for the death of Æschere, slain by Grendel's mother. We claim no merit for our version, beyond that of faithfulness to the movement of the original.

> Spake then Beowulf, born of Ecgtheow;
> "Weep not, thou wise one, worthier is it
> Friends to avenge than fruitlessly mourn them:
> Each one the end and evening awaiteth
> Of this world's life-day. Work we, who may, ere > Death deeds undying, deeds to the hero,
> When life is past, proving worthiest portion."

This passage is thus rendered by Colonel Lumsden:—

> Then spake Beowulf, Eegtheow's son: "O wise man, sorrow not!
> 'Tis better to avenge a friend than too much mourn his lot.
> Each one of us must bide the end of life, and what he may
> Of glory win ere death, for so, when life is past away
> That to the warrior will be best."

The most spirited piece of Colonel Lumsden's work that we have come across occurs, not in the Beowulf, but in a passage which he has translated in a note from the Fight at Finnsburg:—

> 'Tis not the daybreak in the east, nor hither dragon flies, > Nor burn this wall's high pinnacles, but on us foemen rise!
> The grey wolf howls; the ravens cry; the battle-wood clangs loud, > Shield answering to shaft; the moon shines full beneath the cloud.
> Now to fulfil this people's hate are coming deeds of woe.
> But wake ye now my warriors all! Awake! Your valour show!
> Lift up your hands, fight in the front, and think of glory won!

That is distinctly good. The third line has quite a ring of Byron about it, reminding us of Childe Harold's song:—

> The night-winds sigh, the breakers roar,
> And shrieks the wild sea-mew.

But, as a rule, the translation of Beowulf remains at a certain dead level of mediocrity. If it never falls into bathos, it never rises into real eloquence or poetry—a result for which, we are willing to believe, the metre chosen is partly responsible. And there is a certain indistinctness of effect about the whole; it does not make the impression which it ought upon the reader. This is no doubt partly owing to the frequent obscurity of the original, an obscurity arising largely from the fact that the poet assumed in his hearers a whole cycle of knowledge, of which fragments only have come down to us. Nevertheless we cannot help wondering whether Colonel Lumsden, to adapt a phrase of the immortal Mr. Brooke in Middlemarch, "couldn't put it clearer, couldn't put it clearer, you know." Still Colonel Lumsden has certainly the merit of having produced the best metrical version of Beowulf which has yet appeared in English; though he has not thrown as a translator any new light on the difficulties of the original.

We have left ourselves little space to speak of the many points of interest touched on by Colonel Lumsden in his introduction. With his view of the substantial unity of the poem, we have expressed by anticipation our hearty concurrence. This view, based on general literary considerations, has recently been supported on purely philological grounds in an "Inaugural Dissertation" by Dr. Karl Schemann, who by an elaborate analysis of the vocabulary of Beowulf has sought to show that the diction of the passages alleged to be interpolated is practically the same with that of the rest of the poem. The synonyms are classified under certain headings which have rather a quaint look in the summary of contents, such as Supernatural Beings (übernatürliche Wesen); Beowulf's Physical Characteristics (körperliche Eigenschaften); Hrothgar's External Relations (äussere Verhältnisse). From the short autobiography which the rules of many German Universities oblige incipient Doctors to append to their dissertations, we are charmed to hear that Dr. Schemann's father and mother (geboren Butz), enjoy excellent health (sich des besten Wohlseins erfreuen).

Colonel Lumsden's views as to the date of the poem seem to us less solid. Granting that the identification of the Hygelac of the poem with the Chochilaicus, whose death in battle is placed by Gregory of Tours under the year 511, affords us a safe terminus a quo, his argument that the mention of the Merovingians in the Messenger's speech affords a certain terminus ad quem—namely, the fall of that dynasty in 752—seems to us extremely hazardous. The Merovingians may easily have become part of the poet's ordinary stock-in-trade before their fall, and remained so long after it.

Then there is the question as to how a poem of which the characters are all Danes and Goths (Goths, that is, of Gothland in Scandinavia), and of which the geography is consistently continental, became the literary property of our ancestors. Colonel Lumsden maintains that the materials of it were brought by them from their continental homes; but if the story had remained for three centuries, at least, on English soil, can we believe that in all that time it would have taken no local English colour? Against Thorpe's view that it was composed under the Danish dynasty of the eleventh century out of materials brought by the Danes to England, Colonel Lumsden repeats Mr. Arnold's argument that the English could not have borrowed from a nation whom they hated so much as the Danes. Thorpe, no doubt, placed the date of the poem too low; we would rather put its composition after the Peace of Wedmore in 878. But, even granting the feelings of the English towards the Danes to have been what Colonel Lumsden describes, we do not think that that would have prevented them from borrowing a good story if they had the opportunity, just as the Norsemen themselves borrowed many a tale from peoples whom they slaughtered and plundered.

So, again, in relation to the mythological elements in the poem Colonel Lumsden's attitude seems to us inconsequent. "The poet," he says, "would have opened the eyes of astonishment if he had been told that he only meant night and darkness, hurricanes, inundations," &c. No one doubts that to the poet the events and characters which he describes were real; that is not the point, but whether there are not in these events and characters traditional elements which have a mythic origin. This Colonel Lumsden would probably admit. We will mention here a single instance only of this mythic element. In the pedigree of the Scyldings, Scyld is the Son of Scef; in other words, the Shield is the Son of the Sheaf. There is a curious parallel to this in the Irish tales in which Eochaid Airemon is a character of frequent occurrence. His name literally translated means "the Horseman, son of the Ploughman." In both cases the rise of a warrior class out of or over an agricultural one seems to be indicated. Nor, if Hygelac is an historical character, does it follow that his nephew Beowulf is not a mythical one. The Nibelungen Lied has made familiar to us the juxtaposition or characters undoubtedly historical with other characters no less undoubtedly mythical.

Of the literary aspects of the original poem we cannot now speak. One point only will we mention, and that is the way in which, in the midst of all the fighting and the feasting, we have every now and then a touch of the truest pathos. We have one instance of this in Beowulf's speech to Hrothgar already quoted; which recalls the Homeric

> νῦν δ'—ἔμπης γὰρ Κῆρες ἐφεστᾶσιν θανάτοιο
> μυρίαι, ἃς οὐκ ἔστι φυγεῖν βροτὸν οὐδ' ὑπαλύξαι—> ἴομεν. . . .

But there are many others scattered up and down the poem which every one may find for themselves. In the literature of our ancestors, as in the voice of the ocean which girdled their shores, there is audible "the eternal note of sadness." Scott in this, as in so much besides, was a true child of the North. In the midst of the gayest hunting-song he pauses to reflect that Time is a huntsman whom no skill can baulk; and the lullaby which tells of the wealth and power of the infant chief ends, as we all remember, thus:—

> Then hush thee, my darling, take rest while you may,
> For strife comes with manhood, and waking with day.

PORTRAITS OF PLACES AND OTHER BOOKS OF TRAVEL.*

THERE is no surer way of getting to know a man thoroughly than to travel with him, and perhaps next after travelling with him comes reading what he has to say about the places he has visited. For this reason, if for no other, Mr. Henry James's Portraits of Places will be heartily welcomed in England. The book will be taken up with the hope of learning how the writer was impressed by the different scenes he saw rather than of merely being informed about the scenes themselves or reminded of what the reader has seen with his own eyes. Nor will this hope be disappointed; for Mr. James describes the places he has visited not as they have seemed to other people, not even as they are in mere outward form, but as they are to himself. Besides those, and they are many, who look at every place simply through the glasses of their guide-books, we each take our own peculiar glasses with us on our travels. No two men of education, for instance, look on a famous city in more wholly different lights than Mr. James and Mr. Freeman. Outward aspects and historical associations are everything to the historian; while human characteristics and bits of local colouring are most quickly caught and best remembered by the novelist. The writings of travellers of either kind could ill be spared. Mr. James, indeed, goes somewhat far in his disregard of the history of the places he visits, and even of those things which bring their past before us. A "portrait" of Florence with the Palazzo Vecchio left out is unsatisfactory, however good the rest of the picture may be; and talk about Laon leaves something to be desired when it contains no hint of why it is a city set on a hill, and when the traveller going thither from Paris fails to recognize that he has gone from the newer to the older capital, and fills his space with a comparison between the white cap and apron of his landlord and the old dress-coats and white ties of English waiters. While, too, Mr. James has an artist's eye for other objects, he looks on buildings without discrimination, and describes them in a spirit of vapid enthusiasm. "Any feudal ruin is a charming affair" sounds prettily enough when spoken by one of his charming fellow-countrywomen on the deck of a Rhine steamer, but is a sentence scarcely worthy of a man who can write well and wisely on other matters. These portraits were, it is true, drawn for the readers of "various American magazines and journals," and therefore long didactic descriptions would certainly have been out of place. It would, however, be doing them gross injustice to imagine that Americans do not care to know all they can about the buildings of the Old World. In the "portrait" of Rochester, where, by the way, Dickens is made the prominent figure instead of Gundulf, we are told that if Americans were so happy as to possess the cathedral church, "inferior edifice" as it is, they would "go barefoot to see it." The remark is true, and so much the more pity that the writer did not give them a description of the noble specimen of Norman work he has made light of. If, however, Mr. James has not always written about those things which seem to us most noteworthy in the places he professes to portray, he has done what in his case is better, for he has written of places as he saw them, and he has the power of seeing with the artistic perception of the few, and of writing about what he has seen so that the many can understand and feel with him. His quick instinct as to colour is shown by his declaring pink to be the prevalent tint of Venice—"a faint, shimmering, airy, watery pink"—for if there is little absolute pink colour to be seen at Venice, all things seem receptive of the tint. Not less happy is his description of "that indefinably charming colour which Florence always seems to wear as you look up and down at it from the bridges and quays" (p. 58). The harmony of high tints, "the grave brilliancy" of the colour, at once various and in perfect concord, is painted with a truth that brings before us the city itself as it stretches along the yellow Arno. Such descriptions are worth so much more than the author's comments on paintings that we grudge the space devoted to them and to Mr. Ruskin. At Florence, indeed, Mr. James and his friend revolted against the dogmatism of the art teacher. They carried this revolt to the full, deciding that art means an escape from rules and regulations—"a place where we may take our life easily." Did they regret that they could not gaze on the picture of the Pitti palace with absolutely untaught delight? Yet, extravagant as their revolt was, we can well believe that if any one chooses to read Mr. Ruskin's little books in the cloisters of Sta. Maria Novella, he will understand the temptation to which they were exposed. And even without so severe a test, there are certainly some who will sympathize in the laugh at > the familiar asperity of the author's style and the pedagogic fashion in which he pushes and pulls his unhappy pupils about, jerking their heads towards this, rapping their knuckles for that, sending them to stand in corners, and giving them Scripture texts to copy.

After the portraits of Italian places come papers on Paris, Laon, Rouen, and other French towns and villages. Then follow several articles on English life and English towns, and, lastly, some three or four on places in America, written as long ago as 1870, and representing, as we are warned in the preface, a state of society now, to some extent at least, belonging to the past. All alike are as full of subtle appreciation of character and of warm human sympathy as they are of expressions of material beauty. Mr. James shows how, in the eye of the artist in fiction, every human figure is invested with an embryo romance; and as we read his sketches, it is easy to see how the stories we have enjoyed naturally formed themselves in his mind. At the same time, he never neglects the true food of his art. He is not content with imagination. A Genoese landscape gained just the addition he felt it lacked when a peasant came in sight, "with his coat on his shoulder and his hat upon his ear," singing as he went. He saw at once a picture of "sensuous optimism" and of Italian knowledge of life. But Mr. James never wrote, as he has written, on the strength of superficial observation; and accordingly he tells us how he got this contented-looking peasant to talk freely to him—few men, probably, can withstand his sympathetic power—and found him "an unhappy, underfed, and unemployed young man." Some of the papers, such as one on "Occasional Paris" (a phrase not understanded of us), are rather studies of character than of places. The personified "Administration," the Paris ouvrier—we see no objection to workman, but Mr. James is fond of foreign words—the average Frenchman, and, above all, "the well-to-do Frenchwoman of the lower orders," hackneyed subjects as they are, are described so cleverly that they still interest us. A fresher and more delicately-painted picture presents the peasants of the little village near Gy-les-Nonnaines and their simple-hearted curé. Condemning the morals of his flock and deprecating an unchristian construction of his words, building with his own hands the niche in his garden-wall destined for his treasured image, equally at home with his fellow-peasants and as the guest at the château, quiet and gentle, yet dwelling with delight on the great event of his life, when he told the German officers who invaded his dwelling how he wished it was allowed him to meet them musket in hand, the village curé was well worth a careful study, and Mr. James has drawn his portrait with a kindly hand and with gentle humour. The English sketches, though written some seventeen years ago, naturally have a special interest for us; and it is pleasant to find

Mr. James speaking of us and of our land with generous warmth. In his eyes the English of all classes are by far the handsomest people in Europe, handsomer even than our kinsmen in America, though at the same time we are much uglier than they are, for our ugliness "comes from the facial eccentricities which flourish among older civilizations." Very eloquently does Mr. James descant on the beauty of English girls, the perfection of their features and colour, "the depth of tenderness in their faces, and their freedom from any signs of morbid strain, of irritability or of selfishness." A little scene in "an old oaken parlour" in Warwickshire, where a young man and a girl, each a type of the looks and manners of well-bred English youth, stand talking about a yacht, is drawn with exquisite grace. No less pleasant is it to see Mr. James's pride in England's greatness, and his jealousy for her honour, which so well becomes a citizen of the mighty nation sprung from her. Strolling about Woolwich Common he pondered on the history of England, "the sacred source of his own national affections," and wondered, as many another stranger has wondered, at some specimen of Mr. Gladstone's way of treating questions which concern our prestige. "Of course Mr. Gladstone was probably right, but Mr. Gladstone was not a sympathetic stranger." In a paper headed "Two Excursions" are described the Derby Day and the Commemoration at Oxford in 1877, and Mr. James notes the same "enjoyment of chartered license" in the Sheldonian Theatre and on the Epsom road. Pleasanter impressions, however, than those made by noisy undergraduates were left by the luncheon at All Souls and other Commemoration episodes. Like all Americans, Mr. James visited the Shakspeare country and writes some picturesque notes on the houses of the Midland counties. Amidst much that is graceful in these "portraits" we come here and there upon bits that we wish had been left out. Chief amongst these is the notice of the general mourning on the death of the Princess Alice. Mr. James fails to understand the causes or the nature of the feelings with which Englishmen regard the members of their Royal Family, and though we might have found no fault with his article had it remained in the American journal for which it was written, it was surely a mistake to republish in England the comments on the impression made by the death of the Princess, and the feeble sneer at the speech in which Lord Beaconsfield announced the event in the House of Lords. Still, with so much to praise and so many generous expressions to acknowledge, it is not worth while to dwell on one flaw. Mr. James tells us that "he could not to-day have the temerity to write letters on England." As far as we can judge from his letters of seventeen years ago we cannot ask for a keener or kindlier observer to write of us and of our land.

A Roundabout Journey records the travels of another American. Mr. Warner, however, has nothing in common with Mr. James except his nationality. He took a most delightful tour in 1881, visiting various places in Southern France, Sicily, and Spain, and has managed to write 317 pages about his journey of less interest than we should have thought possible. Yet he saw some places in a new light; for he found Catania commonplace, and only stayed there long enough to visit the convent of "Saint Benedetto" and to go up Ætna. We certainly have some remembrance of theatres and amphitheatres, and of a city rich in Roman antiquities. He evidently wishes us to believe that he knew something of the history of the places he visited, and does not forget to talk of the defeat of the Athenian fleet at Syracuse. As, however, he is silent as to the Carthaginian siege a few years after—certainly a more important event as far as Syracusan history is concerned—we deemed that he had copied this as well as much else from his guide-books. Against such a suspicion he endeavours to provide by bidding future travellers study, as he would have us believe he studied, the scene of the Athenian defeat, sitting on the height of Epipolai, "Herodotus in hand," and "by the aid of the historian follow the famous campaign" (p. 111). Will Mr. Warner kindly refer us to the book of Herodotus in which he read the history of this "famous campaign"? Some distinctly original information we certainly have in connexion with Mr. Warner's visit to Syracuse on the subject of some muddy coffee and the difficulty of finding a spoon. And whatever guide-books he may have used in compiling his Roundabout Journey, he has put their language into his own, which somewhat resembles in its suddenness the conversation of the fierce Mr. Dowler at Bath. For example, speaking of the mixed population of Cette, he says:—"The result is favourable. One sees many pretty, handsome faces of young girls. Until you get south the Frenchwoman is celebrated for anything but her beauty. In Paris a handsome woman is as rare as a good one in some places," &c. (p. 36).

The two volumes which Mr. Buckland calls by the affected title of The World beyond the Esterelles contain travel in the South of France and Italy. They also contain a great deal about eating. At Cannes, for example, we are told that "Huntley & Palmer's lunch-biscuits sold in England for 4*d.* cost 1 fr. 20 c." At Rome the writer went to Mass on Christmas morning, and then went to sleep, "in order to wake up ready to take in more novelties later in the day. The next thing to be tried is a Christmas dinner so far from England. What will it be like?" What it was like we are told in detail even to the bread-sauce which the turkey lacked. But these volumes treat of some less material subjects. Mr. Buckland found, evidently to his surprise, that there was something connected with "a theological school" on the Iles Lérins, and has "gleaned a few particulars" for us concerning the cradle of Western monasticism from the Dictionnaire Universelle. This is kind, for he is an earnest Protestant. "O ye shades of Peter and Paul," he cries at Rome, "what must be your feelings!" But his spirit is often moved to ejaculation. He enters Venice with "O ye shades of Shakspeare and Byron!" For obvious reasons he quickly changes his exclamation for "Oh ye Sanitary Commissioners!" In historical matters he refers to Mr. Hare as a final authority. Yet surely Mr. Hare did not teach him that Dante may have wandered in the Boboli Gardens (ii. p. 183), or that Savonarola, also spelt Savanarola, was "the Martin Luther of Italy" (195), or that the fortifications of Michael Angelo on San Miniato were raised on an occasion which can be fitly described as "one of the numerous outbreaks of those troublous times" (193). As regards architecture, it may be remarked that Mr. Buckland believes that the church of S. Ambrogio at Milan was built by St. Ambrose (ii. 223). It is, however, needless to multiply proofs of the extreme silliness of these volumes.

Rambling Sketches in the Far North are descriptions of the Orkney and neighbour islands, contributed to the Fifeshire Journal. Unpretending as this little volume is, it contains much interesting matter. Mr. Fergusson gives us notes on the ancient buildings of the islands, many of them already in ruins, and others falling into decay. Most of them, as the palace on Birsay and the chapel on Eynhallow (Holy Isle), were built by the Northmen. Even more interesting than these is the little church of Egilshay, with its single circular tower, for the ordinary Scandinavian church has two square towers. Munch, in a passage quoted by Mr. Fergusson, considers that it has so many points of likeness to the old churches of Ireland that it may be held to be the work of Irish priests. Sad to say, this remarkable building has for the last sixty years been allowed to stand roofless, exposed to wind and weather. The notices of the ancient system of agriculture, of the cultivation of the common-field, and the process of "planking" by which it was taken into severalty, are so interesting that we could wish them longer. The most valuable part of the book, however, consists of the many records of folk-lore and local customs, collected partly, indeed, from books, but largely also at first-hand. We are told, for example, how, at Hallowe'en, the Orcadian maid finds out her lover by dropping down her "clew" of worsted into the old farm-kiln, and crying, "Wha hads on to my clew's end?" In describing the visits of the minstrels on Hogmanay night, Mr. Fergusson has preserved the rimes in which they used to ask for a gift, and invoke the blessing of the Virgin on the houses where they were well received. One of the verses may be taken as a specimen of the rest, the refrain of the second and fourth lines running through all:—

May a' your ewes be weel to lamb,
We're a' Queen Mary's men;
And every ane a ewe and a ram,
And that's before our Lady.

Many good tales are told of old women who raised and laid the winds, of trows and of changelings. Most important of all as regards early beliefs are the stories of sea-trows and of man-seals. One of these is recorded in a curious ballad called "The Grey Selchie of Shool Skerry." The last pages of the book are filled with certain "Orcadian Musings" in verse. We have derived so much pleasure from Mr. Fergusson's "Sketches" that we refrain from quoting from his "Musings." He warns the reader in his preface that "they do not aspire to the higher walks of poetry," and the warning is as just as it is modest. If he will stick to observing and collecting things ready to perish, he will do—and indeed he has already done—good work.

all the outward phenomena of life with philosophic impartiality and the happy serenity of a follower of Epicurus. He has the temperament, and many of the gifts, of a poet, and he presents the various sorts and conditions of humanity that comprise the round of life in Bengal in a series of vivid vignettes. Purists may object to these little portraits that in employing the sonnet to set forth their lineaments the author degrades a form of verse consecrated to some of the noblest themes of poetry. Mr. Webb has, however, one qualification which it were well if all sonneteers possessed; he writes with scholarly directness and finish. The Ryot, the Zemindar, the Babu, and other figures familiar to the Anglo-Indian are delineated with graphic skill; and the remonstrance addressed to the editors of the native press in the sonnet on "Modern Bengal" has a Miltonic tone appropriately humorous. One of Mr. Webb's favourites is the Punkah-wallah, who is celebrated in a neat triolet and a touching ballad. The following stanzas from "Punkah-beats" show the author's dignity in treating a familiar subject:—

What rhythmic sense, what flow
Of pendulous motion and harmonious pace
Must in thy soul have place,
To set thy engine pulsing to and fro
With such symmetric grace!
Say, doth some Indian ditty, rude and sweet,
With phantom tuneful beat,
Sing in thine ears and prompt thy punctual arm?

Anon, thy labours done,
Thou wilt return to thine own meadows sweet
And watch the shadows fleet
Athwart the waving grain, and how the sun
Hath daily death and birth;—
Wilt mark the throbbing of the midnight star,
Sphere-music hushed and far,
And all the metric motions of the earth.

Poetry in our colonies, as in the United States, is less a productive and spontaneous growth than the object of almost universal study and sincere adoration. The enthusiasm for the art everywhere displayed is very striking when the thin imitative quality of the native product is considered. Seduced by its Swinburnian title, we looked for something in Mr. Bracken's volume racy of the New Zealand soil, fresh and stimulating, and have experienced little but disillusion. His poetry, however, is better than the injudicious preface of an admirer would lead the reader to expect. It is a singular anticipation of criticism to select for special laudation the weakest poems in the book, yet the writer of the preface speaks of the following sonnet as "not unworthy the master-hand of Rossetti":—

A simple lark—this is a fable new—
That perched each morn upon a golden ray,
Up where the lashes of the eye of day
Sweep all night's lesser jewels out of view;
Beheld a lovely idol's shrine, and flew
Down earthwards, to that form of painted clay,
And warbled there his sweetest, purest lay,
Thinking his song might it with life imbue.
He sang to it God's royal anthem—Love;
At Eden's windows he had caught the strain—
His lay the soulless image could not move—
His melodies were warbled all in vain;
He turned away and tried to soar above,
But never reached his morning perch again.

The conception of the sonnet cannot atone for its poverty of expression; such inelegances as "up where" and "down earthwards" are scarcely characteristic of Rossetti's splendid and imposing diction. Mr. Bracken's true powers are exemplified more fully in "Waipounamutu" and "M'Gillivray's Dream"—poems not commended by his advocate.

The poetical and literary remains of Rowland Davies are the fugitive impressions of a mind susceptible to the beauties of nature, and receptive of their influences. They express those influences, however, in a transient and incomplete fashion, and do not attain to any literary accomplishment, neither can it be said that these poems possess any distinct poetical fervour or notable promise. The varied charms of the Tasmanian landscape are occasionally indicated with power and feeling; there are some bright sketches in prose of life among gold-diggers and camp experiences, but the poems generally suffer from the fragmentary condition in which the author left them, and which the editor very properly has not attempted to amend.

There is much pleasing and natural sentiment in Mr. Piatt's lyrics. Some of the shorter poems, such as "Transfiguration" and "The Three Work-days," suggest Longfellow in their graceful expression and delicate fancy, and the retrospective feeling of others is often very tender and true. Some poems that refer to the War of Secession, and are cast in an idyllic form, are among the freshest and most inspired; one of these, "The Mower in Ohio," presents the soliloquy of an old man, who, in the midst of the summer grass, recalls his three sons to his dreamful mind as they once reaped together before they were called to fight. Two of them have been killed, and it is with sad presage that the old man sees all three, as if their fates were indissolubly connected, in this blending of past and future, of the living and the dead. "The Old Man and the Spring Leaves" illustrates very prettily the rejuvenescent power of spring in the heart of age.

Not content merely to sing his love, Mr. James Hinton dazzles our sight with the portrait of her who is the theme and inspiration of his song, and thus reconciles poetry and photography. It is to be hoped that similar appeals to the gallantry of critics will not become general; it is a pretty device, but its repetition would be sternly reprehended. It suggests, when considered with the verse it has inspired, Hamlet's comparison, and "this picture" gives more satisfaction than that. Mr. Hinton's poetry is full of vague, high-sounding phrase and excessive volubility; its passion has an unpleasant and suspicious air of simulation; it is fluent and facile enough in expression, but is deficient in depth, and fire, and conviction. The rhetorical figures of hyperbole that ornament these poems are extravagant and inflated; not because their degree of daring is at all uncommon, but because they are not artistically introduced. The power to express the heroic mood with simplicity is among the rarest attributes of the poet.

Mr. Stoddart, in his Seven Sagas of Pre-historic Man, presents with considerable effect the early developments of man. The most successful of these poems give graphic pictures of the Aryan migration, the Cave-man, the Neolithic farmer, and the Early Man of Africa, and abound in vivid description and animated incident. There is much of the merit of suggestion in all these poems; they are well calculated to impel the reader to study the subject by awakening the spirit of inquiry, and stimulating the fancy and imagination. They are distinguished by the charm of the remote and unfamiliar; the mystery of man's origin and the romance of his progress, from the earliest dim light that science affords to the first historic migration, are indicated with some poetic power.

Both the publisher and author of the Twelve Sonnets in commemoration of Izaak Walton's bi-centenary honour that charming writer in worthy fashion. Mr. Westwood's sonnets celebrate many places and things associated with the father of angling—Broxbourne and the Lea, Charles Cotton and the Dove, Herbert's "Lives," the gentle Elia—besides that treasury of quaint thought and divine fancy, The Compleat Angler. They are appropriately subdued in style, and frequently felicitous in language. The reverential sentiment of all book-lovers and good anglers—so curiously opposed to Byron's pettish allusion to "the quaint old cruel coxcomb"—is excellently expressed in Mr. Westwood's Epilogue:—

What, not a word for thee, O little tome,
Brown-jerkined, friendly-faced, of all my books
The one that wears the quaintest, kindliest looks,
Seems most completely, cosily at home
Amongst its fellows. Ah! if thou couldst tell Thy story—how, in sixteen fifty-three,
Good master Marriott, standing at his door,
Saw anglers hurrying, fifty—nay, three score,
To buy thee, ere noon pealed from Dunstan's bell:—
And how he stared, and shook his sides with glee.
One story, this, which fact or fiction weaves.
Meanwhile, adorn my shelf, beloved of all—
Old book! with lavender between thy leaves,
And twenty ballads round thee on the wall.

The author of Charlotte Corday: and other Poems has not succeeded in endowing the figure of Marat's assassin with fresh force and distinction; the abundance of historical material seems to have hindered rather than aided her realization. The narrative is too dry and literal for verse, and there is nothing of vital power or dramatic value in her sketch of the heroic girl. Another historical poem, "The Outcasts of England," is more successful, and depicts the landing in America of the crew of the Mayflower.

The three sheiks who, in Mr. Rose's poem, while away an evening in the desert by relating their experiences have one characteristic in common: they delight in glowing description and narrate the past in smooth and monotonous blank verse. As if conscious that this entertainment needed a diversion, the author has provided some hexameters, which fill the pauses in the story-telling.

Mr. Dziewicki's translation of Mickiewicz's Conrad Wallenrod would have proved more readable if he had not attempted to render the hexameters of the original into the same metre. It is singular that he should elsewhere allow himself greater metrical license, and accept blank verse as his medium, and yet be undismayed by a more formidable obstacle. The poem is preceded by an interesting sketch of the Polish poet by Dr. Belcikowski, and Mr. Dziewicki's translation, in spite of much inevitable loss of spirit and a little obscurity, is worth perusal.

The naïveté of Mr. McDowall's preface and the candour of his annotations seem designed only for the friendly eyes of a select circle; he admits that he cannot help writing verses, that print gives more pleasure than manuscript, and that friends ask for copies, which are ingenious pleas, though familiar. Lady Margaret's Sorrows is a gloomy story told in indifferent verse and devoid of any charm or power to justify the author's publication; and some of the other poems with more character possess also a vein of morbid and sickly sentiment.

On the title-page of Leo's Poetical Works is imprinted the ancient immutable truth "Poeta nascitur, non fit"; and never did volume more thoroughly, and on every page, testify to it. Beyond a garrulous sing-song power of rhyming, and the glib repetition of all the commonplaces of poetical phraseology, "Leo's" poems have not even the thinnest guise of poetry. They illustrate a strain of trite, and often silly, reflection, and a sentiment of "goodiness" that is nauseating. "Good Jove!" as some one says in The Poetaster, "what a pretty foolish thing it is to be a poet!"

The author of Cyril and Lionel considers his effusions entitled to the dignified designation "studies"; except, however, that they are so unintelligible that they demand the most assiduous application on the reader's part, it is hard to say why his poems should be "studies." We cannot recommend that they should be studied. Erotic poetry should, above all things, be lucid, and never the apparent work of a constructor of prize enigmas.

Poems, by Patty Honeywood, is a little volume of lyrics of no lofty aim or excessive pretence, inoffensive in style, and of average execution. "Two Flowers" is a pretty little poem of a quality and expression that musicians approve.

WESTCOTT'S EPISTLES OF ST. JOHN.*

CANON WESTCOTT always progresses on lines of his own marking out, and if he appear at times a little fanciful or obscure, we may not unreasonably impute the presumed defect to our own dulness of apprehension rather than to our teacher's over-strained subtilty. His later works indeed, the fruits of long and varied literary experience, have been in large measure free from the dreaminess and uncertainty of view which his best admirers could not fail to discern in those earlier publications that first arrested the public interest; and in his almost life-long study of the Gospel and Epistles of St. John he was of necessity brought face to face with an inspired penman, whose outward form of expression is simplicity itself. Our author's labours ungrudgingly spent on the Gospel of St. John form a volume of The Speaker's Commentary, and, together with the "Apocalypse" by the late learned Archdeacon Lee yet in merit much surpassing it, comprises the only portion of that very unequal compilation which will be remembered twenty years hence. Since in The Speaker's Commentary the Epistles of St. John had been consigned to another hand, our author has published them separately (thus realizing, as he tells us, the accomplishment of a dream of early youth), following the plan which he sketched in the notes on the Gospel. This plan it is as well to state in his own language, that the reader may look for nothing which the author has not endeavoured to supply. We quote from the opening of the preface:—

> It formed no part of my design to collect and discuss the conflicting opinions which have been held on the structure of the writings or on the interpretation of separate passages. Such a labour is indeed of the deepest interest and utility; but it appeared to me that I might help the student more by giving the results at which I had arrived, and by indicating the lines of inquiry by which they have been reached. In pursuing this end it has been my main desire to call attention to the minutest points of language, construction, order, as serving to illustrate the meaning of St. John. I do not venture to pronounce that any variation is trivial or unimportant. The exact words are for us the decisive expression of the Apostle's thoughts. . . . I do not venture to set aside the letter of a document till it has been found to be untenable.

The truth and safety of this method Canon Westcott maintains to be evident in its result. Every day's study, he assures us, only brings home to him the more forcibly that "in no other way can we hope to gain the living truths of apostolic teaching." He appeals to his readers to test his method by personal labour. "A few hours spent in tracing out the use of a word or form, in comparing phrases often held to be synonymous, in estimating the force of different tenses of the same verb in regard to the contexts in which they are found, will bring assurance which no acceptance of another's work can give." This is a fair and specious promise, and those that follow our author's guidance will not be disappointed of their hope. We would allege as a single example of this close verbal analysis one out of many which abound in the present volume, the investigation, in the note on 1 John ii. 5, of the phrase "the love of God," whether in the more familiar and subjective sense of "the love which God shows," or in the less usual and objective sense "the love of which God is the object," or, more generally than either, "the love which is characteristic of God, whether it is regarded as shown by God, or by man through his help"—the usage of St. Paul being compared or contrasted throughout with that of the writer of this epistle. Notes like this occur on almost every page, each one of them containing a small body of divinity, and they manifest an independence of research almost unexampled in this branch of literature. We doubt whether any authority more recent than Bede and Thomas Aquinas is cited in Dr. Westcott's expository notes. No one can help seeing that he is well acquainted with the labours of his predecessors and is imbued with much of the spirit of the best of them; but he gathers his materials for himself, he arranges them in his own way, he pronounces his decisions with a quiet confidence which nothing less than conscious originality could justify or render tolerable to the student. It is scarcely to be regretted that Dr. Westcott, who was a diligent and influential member of the Company of New Testament Revisers, has not given us a continuous English version of these Epistles. The Greek text he has paid close attention to, and we believe it to be nearly identical with that of his own and Dr. Hort's edition published in 1881. In his introduction to the first Epistle he has inserted eleven pages of critical matter, which, taken with the notes set immediately under the Greek throughout the volume, will amply suffice for most purposes. Indeed, he reckons that the text does not present many difficult problems, the chief being 1 John ii. 20; iv. 3; v. 10. The interpolated gloss of the Three Heavenly Witnesses (1 John v. 7, 8), necessarily discarded from the body of the Epistle, is very adequately discussed in an "additional note." For the rest, "the text," he tells us, "was exposed to far fewer disturbing influences than that of the Gospels. There were no parallel texts or parallel traditions at hand . . . to supply additions to the original words or modifications of their form. The utmost amount of variation likely to find favour with critics of the most opposite schools is practically of very small extent, and, though no variation is without real significance, of comparatively small moment." His own prepossessions in favour of the Codex Vaticanus (B) are strong, as from his literary partnership with Dr. Hort we should expect, yet not so as to blind him to such errors as τὸ (for τὸν) ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ch. ii. 14, and χάρισμα (for χρίσμα), ii. 17. "Its text is, as elsewhere, of paramount excellence," while that of the Sinaitic copy (ℵ) "contains many errors, some of which remain uncorrected [that is, by later scribes], and not a few peculiar false readings." The text of A [Codex Alexandrinus], "which represents a far more ancient type in this Epistle than in the Gospels, contains many peculiar readings in which it has often the support of the [Latin] Vulgate." Of the fourth of the chief Greek manuscripts (the Paris fragment C) he has no high opinion. "Its peculiar readings have no appearance of genuineness." "Though caution is necessary in constructing the Greek text which the Vulgate Latin version represents, it is for the most part very close to the Greek text." We enter into these minutiæ in deference to the judgment of a great scholar, who always thinks for himself. However closely his main views assimilate to those of his bolder colleague, he not unseldom departs in detail from conclusions of the latter. In using the Westcott-Hort Greek Testament it will mostly be found that the textual reading is Dr. Hort's, the marginal (where there is a margin) Canon Westcott's. Thus in ch. ii. 20, instead of καὶ οἴδατε πάντα "and ye know all things," which has a real sense though a hard one, the two editors put in their text the feeble expletives οἴδατε πάντες "ye all know," their margin exhibiting the true reading, while Dr. Westcott here pronounces the masculine "doubtful." We only wish he had rejected it at once.

The rich stores of material collected and arranged in this volume will not permit us to linger on textual points, and we are called away from them to give some slight notion of the mode in which Dr. Westcott grapples with difficulties of interpretation, or proposes novel views for our mature consideration. One of the most perplexing constructions in the first Epistle occurs in ch. iii. 20, ὅτι ἐὰν καταγινώσκῃ ἡμῶν ἡ καρδία, ὅτι μείζων κ.τ.λ. Is the second ὅτι part of the true text, or are the two ὅτι's particles in parallel construction, or are they different words bearing but an accidental resemblance? There is some evidence, including Cod. A., for omitting the second ὅτι, but it is chiefly that of the Old Latin and Egyptian versions, which can hardly be trusted in this instance, inasmuch as they, like our Authorized Bible, failed to translate what they did not quite understand. The parallelism of the two particles only obscures a sentence otherwise very clear. Hence it seems best with the Revised Version and Dr. Westcott to take the first ὅ τι as the neuter of ὅστις, and thus to render, joining on the last clause of the preceding verse. "We shall assure our heart, whereinsoever our heart condemns us; because God is greater than our heart"—greater, as able to sway and to control it. Two more specimens of our author's power as an interpreter is all that our space will allow. They are both taken from the fifth chapter of the first Epistle. Reserving, after his custom, for an additional note on ver. 16 a careful discussion of the phrase "sin unto death," which he regards as one which was familiar to the first readers of the Epistle, and as evidently borrowed from current language and the Rabbinical writers, he handles in his foot-notes, in the body of his work, the difficult construction δώσει αὐτῷ ζωήν, τοῖς ἁμαρτάνουσιν μὴ πρὸς θάνατον. What is the nominative to δώσει? Is it the interceding brother, or God, whose sole prerogative it is to "give life" (ver. 11; John vi. 33; x. 28; xvii. 2)? But although, in the latter alternative, δώσει has a different subject from the verbs immediately preceding, and granting that "there is nothing unscriptural in the thought that the believer does that which God does through him (James v. 20); still on the whole it seems more natural to see here a reference direct to the action of God": αὐτῷ in either case is the sinning brother, τοῖς ἁμαρτάνουσιν, "even to them that," standing in apposition to αὐτῷ, the single case (ἁμαρτάνοντα) being thus generalized by the change of number. In the next text that we purpose to look to (ch. v. 18), we are by no means so sure that Dr. Westcott's view is a sound one, and Dean Burgon's objections to it, as it is represented in the Revised Version, are formidable enough. In the Vatican (B) and Alexandrian (A) manuscripts, in one cursive copy, and the Latin Vulgate (conservat eum), for ἑαυτὸν of the common text we read αὐτὸν, which in the Alexandrian is again corrected into ἑαυτὸν, apparently by the first hand, the original scribe having faithfully followed his exemplar, and then on second thoughts supposing he had gone wrong. The united testimony of A, B, and the Vulgate is strong in this part of the New Testament, where our copies are comparatively few, but the Sinaitic (ℵ), the great majority of the cursives, with the Old or Peshito-Syriac (very expressly) uphold ἑαυτὸν of the received text. Conceding, however, to Canon Westcott, for argument's sake, his variation αὐτὸν, it is curious to note the use he makes of it. "The phrase ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ," he says, "is unique. Standing as it does in close juxtaposition with ὁ γεγεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ it is impossible to regard it as identical in reference, and the mention of the great adversary naturally suggests the thought of the Son of God. The peculiar expression is probably used to emphasize the connexion of the Son with those whom he 'is not ashamed to call brethren' (Hebr. ii. 11, ἐξ ἑνὸς πάντες); while the difference of γεννηθεὶς from γεγεννημένος suggests the difference of the sonship of the Son from the sonship of men which is marked in John v. 26." By a plea thus refined he persuaded his fellow-revisers, as we intimated above, thus to translate the verse, "Whosoever is begotten of God sinneth not; but he that was begotten of God keepeth him and the evil one toucheth him not" (John xvii. 12).

The more we examine this precious volume the more its exceeding richness in spiritual as well as in literary material grows upon the mind. There is all the difference in the world between the somewhat hasty commentaries put forth in such abundance within the last few years, even by eminent and accomplished theologians, to serve some immediate purpose or to supply some seeming want, and a great work such as Canon Westcott when at his best is sure to present to us—its main outlines traced years ago; its details gradually filling up those outlines, as patient and reverential study suggests them to the author's mind; the whole performance touched and retouched as time goes on, publication always being contemplated as the final destination, but never regarded as pressing or near. It is only in this way that the Fathers of the ancient Church wrote for immortality; to be the instructors of generations of which we know or wish to know nothing but what may serve to illustrate the teaching they have bequeathed to us. As in the introduction to St. John's Gospel our author had vindicated its genuineness and apostolic origin to the satisfaction of all who desired to learn the truth respecting it, he has little more to do here than to prove the identity of authorship between the Gospel and the three Epistles—an easy task indeed compared with what he had accomplished before. As regards the first and principal Epistle, we would commend to the young student's special attention his author's analysis of the plan and scope of what is rather, perhaps, a treatise than a letter. It is, as Dr. Westcott admits, no easy task to determine its structure. "No single arrangement is able to take account of the complex development of thought which it offers, and of the many connexions which exist between its different parts." Yet, starting with the conviction that the idea of fellowship between God and man, made possible and in part realized in the Christian Church, runs through the whole from the beginning (ch. i. 3) to the end (ch. v. 20), he displays rare discernment in tracing the main thought through many digressions, all helping onward to the general conclusion. For the brief Epistles which are the second and third in order he has done little, nor indeed was there much to be done. He does not question that they are both from the Apostle's pen, and attributes their pretermission by the Syrian Church to their "very limited circulation from their personal (or narrow) destination." Then, again, the internal evidence in their favour is simply irresistible. "The second Epistle bears the closest resemblance, in language and thought, to the first. The third Epistle has the closest affinity to the second, though from its subject it is less like the first in general form." Coming to details, he does not doubt that "the Elder" of both Epistles describes "not age simply but official position"; that the tenor of 2 John favours the opinion that it was sent to a community and not to one believer; and as regards the anarthrous ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ, "it is best to recognize that the problem of the address is insoluble with our present knowledge." In 2 John 9 he reads, almost necessarily (א A, B, the Vulgate, and the Egyptian versions), προάγων for παραβαίνων of the common text ("Whosoever goeth forward," Revised Version), with the pithy comment, "Every one that advances in bold confidence beyond the limits set to the Christian faith. True progress includes the past." It is a thousand pities that a book like this should be destitute even of the most meagre index.

At the end of this volume are printed, on 126 closely-printed pages, three essays which have not any very special connexion with St. John's Epistles that we can trace, and which look as if they had lain in Dr. Westcott's desk, awaiting some opportunity for publication. They would tell us, if we had need of being told, the many-sidedness of his ingenious and fertile mind. The first essay, on "The Two Empires: the Church and the World," with a copious array of facts hitherto unnoted, is not very novel in sentiment. Most of us knew long since how mighty an obstacle to the reception of Christ as king was the inveterate custom of making deceased or living Emperors the objects of divine worship. The third essay has for its subject, "The Relation of Christianity to Art." The second essay, on "The Gospel of Creation," exhibits to us an example of that tendency to mysticism which we spoke of in the opening of this paper as a marked characteristic of the earlier stages of Canon Westcott's literary career. It is a discussion, familiar to the mediæval schoolmen, and congenial to their habits of thought, of one of the least practical inquiries (if we may venture to say so) which ever engaged the meditations of a studious recluse—namely, Whether, if man had not sinned, the Lord Christ would have taken upon Him our flesh? Nothing that our author could write would be uninteresting or unprofitable to a reader worthy of him; but on this matter we are more than willing to acquiesce in the decision of the Angelic Doctor, Thomas Aquinas, who declares that "He alone can know the truth of this question who was born and offered because He willed."

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

THE large class of mankind whose favourite study is man will find a mass of instructive and interesting matter in the work of Dr. Tuke which heads this list. Though it is addressed to the medical man as well as to the general reader, the author steers clear of all pedantry and undue technicality, and recommends himself by the clearness and scholarship of his style no less than by the richness of his illustrative quotations. The important design of the book is to elucidate the action of the "imagination," and to show how large a part in the production of changes in bodily function may be played by causes which for the sake of convenience at least all will agree to call mental. An ample demonstration of this by an unbiassed and careful selection of cases lends great value to Dr. Tuke's work; and one at least of its objects will have been well fulfilled if some who peruse it should be disposed, as the author hopes, to regard in a different light from heretofore the success of some of the fashionable modes of treatment current at the present day.

Were we criticizing this book from the point of view of scientific psychology, we should have to find some fault with Dr. Tuke from time to time for a somewhat shifting use of philosophical terms. But in view of the real object of the book, which is not a treatise on psychology, this is but a small fault compared with the virtues of absolute fairness and freedom from bias which strike us on nearly every page. Thus, when quoting very telling cases of complete mystification of the senses by tricks of sleight of hand, he takes care to say that these experiments are not given for the purpose of exposing "Spiritualism," and that, even if Spiritualism were true, their force would remain precisely the same. Sometimes he is almost too fair, as, when explaining with obvious correctness the process by which the ordinary experiments in so-called thought-reading are accomplished, he runs a little risk of spoiling the good effect of his teaching on the uninstructed reader by admitting into his text without comment the letter of some "thought-reading" gentleman, who, assuming the whole point at issue, is "really unable to say how it is one which sometimes succeeds with persons who do not give any muscular indication." But even when Dr. Tuke, in his most interesting exposition of hypnotism, which implicitly excludes the popular notion of any special or "mesmeric" faculty in the operator, goes, more suo, out of his way to write such a parenthesis as, "even should it be eventually shown that a power emanates from some persons as alleged," we feel we cannot quarrel with him. At this time, when some pliant and impressionable minds are being affected by the pretensions of the Psychical Research Society, the reappearance of Dr. Tuke's book is very opportune; for, by laboriously showing that other and admitted explanations have already been given for much or all that is alleged to be due to some unrecognized force, the ground is completely cut away from beneath the feet of the cultivators of marvels. We cannot think that Dr. Tuke, though he might at first seem to roar as gently as any sucking dove, would be any more acceptable as an observer at the séances of the Psychical Research Society than were one or two other members of his craft of whom we have heard, who on more than one occasion effectually put a stop to the clairvoyance of the mesmerized or thought-reading subjects by stopping their eyes or their ears with cotton-wool.

It is impossible to do justice to this author's exhaustive treatment, by an array of proof surprising to the general reader, of the influence of the mind upon the body for good and for evil; his book should be read, and is readable, from cover to cover. Not the least interesting part is the consideration of the subject of some modern miracles; where it is shown that many of the statements of cure may be accepted as they stand without any charge of falsification, and that these cases, from their close alliance with others well known to physicians, most vividly illustrate the influence of the mind, especially on the course of many nervous affections.

Finally, Dr. Tuke considers the subject of the application of the principles he has elucidated to medical practice, and most properly urges physicians not to ignore the necessary mental ingredient in the successful treatment of many complaints. Anent the part played by faith in the cure of disease, the following wise remark is met with:—"Scepticism in the physician is the best means of arriving at the truth; faith in the patient the best means of arriving at health. Doubt is the key by which to open the treasure-box of medical knowledge; belief is the lock which the patient must not break if he wish to procure the blessings of health." Respecting many kinds of maladies this statement is undoubtedly true; yet it may be said all the same that, in the case of many trivial and fanciful complaints, the breaking of the lock of belief will have the salutary effect of preventing the pocket of the patient from being emptied into that of the fashionable charlatan.

The little brochure on Medical Fashions, by Dr. Tibbits, of Bradford, though inadequate as a serious criticism of the subject, serves nevertheless to point a useful moral both for the public and its doctors. It cannot be called wholly scientific in purpose, nor is it free from suspicion of prejudice and cavilling for cavilling's sake. In a department of knowledge like medicine, where fresh facts are frequently being revealed, the theory and treatment of many diseases must be expected to show rapid changes or even revolution; and nothing is easier than to flippantly put down these changes to arbitrary medical fashion. In the present search by medical men after the living causes of disease called "germs," there is plenty of material ready to hand for the self-appointed or irresponsible critic to scoff at; but in scoffing he should remember that the quest is at least a worthy one, whether it end in success or in disappointment. There is no doubt that the general reader has been already treated to much ill-digested matter in the form of lectures and articles, not only in the medical, but in the public papers, on the subject of the germ-origin of consumption, and the possibly contagious character of this disease; and when we remember how prematurely and unscientifically the theory is advocated and acted on by some medical men we can almost sympathize for a moment with Dr. Tibbits's reactionary advice to ignore every new theory until it has been abundantly proved to be correct. But by this method advance would take place but very tardily, if at all; and scientific men must make up their minds to encounter some ridicule on their toilsome line of march.

In his glance at many "medical fashions," however, Dr. Tibbits has certainly often hit the mark. Of course he quotes the extinction of bleeding and the languor of mercurial treatment, once so flourishing, and emphasizes the fashionable aspect of homœopathy and other fads. Mesmerism, too, he quotes as a fashion; but, though it was once a kind of nine days' wonder in the profession, it was never publicly discussed in a sufficiently scientific manner in times gone by to extract, on the one hand, any possible benefit it might involve as regards the treatment of disease, or to prevent, on the other, the genuine phenomena displayed from becoming, as it were, the private property of designing charlatans and their dupes. The fashionable "massage," or "rubbing," of the present day Dr. Tibbits somewhat amusingly compares to "mesmerism," and very pointedly calls attention to the fact that it is said to be most useful in patients not suffering from organic disease. There are certain cases of "hysteria" which are said to be cured by isolation from their friends and by "massage" (which is another word for shampooing); but the isolation is generally recognized by practical doctors as the main element in the success of the treatment, though the "quasi-mysterious sound of 'massage' is well calculated to prove attractive to the searcher after novelties," and to bring fees to medical men. To isolate a patient, indeed, without some "active" treatment, would, it seems, be too much like an order to wash in Jordan to redound much to the doctor's credit.

Very sensible remarks are made by Dr. Tibbits on the changing fashion regarding alcohol in disease; and the absurdity of extreme views is well brought out. The reader of this little book will do well also to lay to heart the comments made on the use of anæsthetics, and the frequently disastrous results of the random administration of narcotics—especially chloral, which is so easily procured in poisonous doses by any one who may ask for it, and so often facilitates suicide and other domestic tragedies. We must also mention with approbation the common-sense teaching of this author on the subject of the much-advertised mineral waters which, each in their short turn, are vaunted as the best, not only by their proprietors, but unfortunately also by many medical men; and his valuable remarks on the ever-fascinating but mysteriously difficult topic of "Health Resorts," which perhaps is the most striking and saddening example of medical fashion in its worst and most discreditable aspect.

Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson's lectures on the Pedigree of Disease seem so full of the results of rich medical experience and philosophical thought as to deserve a careful study at the hands of the medical profession. Though certainly not intended for the general reader, much that they contain will be found of interest, especially the earlier part of the book, which deals with the vexed question of "temperament," and with idiosyncrasy. The older notions regarding the temperaments are discussed and analysed in a masterly and scientific manner, and it is urged with great force that for all practical purposes in medicine the term "temperament" is of no importance and has no definite value. Mr. Hutchinson's great knowledge and well-known power of observation give especial weight to his interesting remarks on idiosyncrasy with regard to diet and drugs. And here the smoker may derive some consolation from the opinion given that the harmful effects which tobacco may sometimes have are, as a rule, not permanent; while the total abstainer from alcoholic beverages is warned that he is in more danger of chronic tobacco-poisoning than he who drinks them, if he freely indulges in the weed.

The last book on our list is a short but suggestive essay on a purely physiological subject. Dr. Latham suggests a new theory as to the manner of formation of uric acid in the system, and applies his theory to the explanation of the action of accredited remedies in the treatment of gout and allied disorders. This little book, giving fresh reasons for treatment which is not novel, would doubtless please the conservative mind of Dr. Tibbits, who tells us that it is far better to use the drugs we have than fly to others that we know not of.

RECENT MUSIC.

MESSRS. Moody and Sankey's method of adapting sacred words to secular and taking tunes, which has been advanced by the Salvation Army to a stage calculated to shock the susceptibilities of reverent worshippers, appears to have attracted the attentions of the Rev. S. Baring-Gould and the Rev. H. Fleetwood-Sheppard for Church of England purposes. "The tendency of these songs," says Mr. Baring-Gould in his preface to Church Songs (W. Skeffington & Sons), "is not only to irreverence and profanity, but also to encourage heretical views of the scheme of Salvation"; and, with a view to counteract such evil influences, these gentlemen have made a collection of "Church songs to supplement the Hymn Book." Whether the end they have in view will be attained, it is hardly our business to speculate on; but it seems evident that the success of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's method is complete enough to warrant something almost amounting to an imitation of it by the authors of this publication. We cannot help thinking, however, that it is just because the Moody and Sankey tunes are secular and popular that they succeed so well, and that the further they are removed from the hymn form the better they are liked by that very large class of people who prefer pretty melodies and spirited choruses to the more formal but classic chant. The favourite tunes in all revivalist collections are generally those which can boast a marked and sometimes jovial refrain which is treated as a chorus, to us painfully suggestive of more convivial meetings than those for which they are used, but it is idle to deny that with nine-tenths of the congregations who delight in these musical demonstrations this element of vulgarity is the chief attraction. The authors of Church Songs evidently acknowledge this fact, for eleven out of the twenty-two songs in the work are supplied with such choruses, although the songs themselves are kept pretty strictly in hymn form. We regret it, but it is nevertheless the fact, that the tune of "Champagne Charlie," for instance, adapted to sacred words, is more likely to be successful with such congregations as those of the Salvation Army than the most beautiful hymn, ancient or modern, ever penned. But this is chiefly because there is no attempt to adhere to the hymn form; and, in keeping to that form, our authors, we think, will find that they do not compete successfully with the revivalists. The musical part of the Church Songs has been very skilfully managed by the Rev. H. Fleetwood-Sheppard, who shows himself a musician of considerable ability and originality, especially in those tunes which are not adaptations from other sources. The words of the Rev. S. Baring-Gould are such as might be expected from the pen of so practised a writer; though, as a matter of taste, we think that the song with the chorus "The religion of 'Won't' and the creed of 'Don't' is not the religion for me" is rather too much in the spirit of the ungrammatical Salvationist utterance of "The Devil and me, we can't agree," to be pleasing to more cultured ears. If it is absolutely necessary to adopt the musical method of the Salvation Army in the Church, these songs will doubtless be found to serve the purpose to a great extent.

Messrs. Wood & Co. have sent us Frank Perceval's Rudiments of Music, a little shilling book, in which, in the form of question and answer, a full explanation is given of the elementary theory of music for beginners in the study of pianoforte-playing. The subject is very clearly and intelligently handled, and the book can be recommended as a safe and convenient guide for students. There is at the end of the work a very complete and useful list of exercises and pieces arranged in progressive order, with the price of each piece named, forming a valuable pianoforte school. The first book of The Vesper Voluntaries, by Herr Nicholas Heins (Osborn & Tuckwood) contains sixteen short melodies for the organ, harmonium, or American organ, which by their variety will be useful for church purposes as offertory music, interludes, or voluntaries, and will certainly be welcome for their effective grace and simplicity, demanding no special executive skill in their performance. Mr. Michael Watson's songs are always well written and pleasing specimens of a musician's work, and the two songs before us, from the same publisher, named respectively "Queenie" and "The Silent March," are no exceptions to the rule. The first is a graceful ballad on a pathetic incident in a girl's life, and the second is a spirited dramatic song on the advance of the British troops on Tel-el-Kebir. The words of both songs are by the composer, and stand well above the average of those which do duty for nine-tenths of the drawing-room songs published nowadays. "My Queen of Hearts," by Mr. Edward Harper, is another effective piece of work which will doubtless become popular, while Signor Ciro Pinsuti's "Beyond the Gates" sustains his deservedly high reputation as a song-writer of great originality, and the "March of the Minstrels," by Mr. Frederic A. Dunster, is a telling pianoforte piece, easily within the powers of all amateurs, and likely to become a favourite morceau de salon.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

MONSEIGNEUR RICARD (1) is quite justified in the modest satisfaction with which he speaks of the reception of the three former parts (on Lamennais, Gerbet, and Lacordaire) of his series of studies on L'Ecole Menaisienne. At a time when literary opinion in France is, as a whole, by no means amicably disposed towards clericalism, the charity, judgment, and good taste of these little books has for the most part met with the recognition it deserved, even in the country of M. Paul Bert. We have ourselves had great pleasure in bearing testimony to their merits—merits which, on the whole, reappear in this concluding volume of the series. It has been probably not the most easy for Mgr. Ricard to write. Lamennais, Gerbet, and Lacordaire were all clerics—indeed the clerical ethos of the first named displayed itself long after his nominal severance from the Church; and, though Lamennais and Lacordaire were politicians as well, it was but in an episodic and amateurish fashion, needing comparatively little notice in a brief memoir. With the author of Les moines d'Occident the case is different; for he was not only a layman by status, but, despite his fervent and pervading piety, quite as much of a politician and of a man of letters as of a Churchman. Perhaps Mgr. Ricard, as was natural, has been a little tempted to subordinate the two former characteristics. However, his book, which is, as far as our memory serves us, something bulkier than the other members of the series of which it forms a part, is an interesting and valuable one, displaying once more its author's singular freedom from intolerance and narrowness of view. He could hardly be expected to dwell very much on the faults of Montalembert's literary work; its fatal fluency, its tendency to "gush," the absence of pith and backbone, which mar its many agreeable qualities; and it was hardly within his obligatory range to criticize a political creed, in which some people, at any rate, have found it extremely difficult to discover any substantive conception of politics. We are glad to see that this capital little series on the Neo-Catholic school of the second quarter of the century is to be followed by another dealing with their forerunners, Maury, Chateaubriand, the Vicomte de Bonald, and the greatest of all orthodox apologists in French for two centuries, the greatest master of religious polemics that Europe has seen during the last hundred years—Joseph de Maistre.

(1) Montalembert. Par Mgr. Ricard. Paris: Plon.

The author who calls himself "Sylvanecte" (2) (from the Gallo-Roman name of the district of Compiègne) has a very pretty sentiment in his preface to the effect that "ceux qui ont combattu l'empire triomphant dédaignent d'insulter l'empire vaincu." If he had written "doivent dédaigner," this sentiment would meet with nothing but approval. Unluckily, the ignoble mania for lavishing insult during fourteen years on the Government which they tolerated for eighteen has infected more Frenchmen than those on whom "Sylvanecte" apparently reflects. He himself is tolerably free from blame. He enforces unsparingly enough the singularly and indefinably canaille character of too many of the ways and customs of Napoleon III. and his Court, and he is not altogether tender of the early reputation of some persons whose misfortunes and whose long and blameless period of expiation might perhaps have seemed to call for more lenient treatment. But he is not spiteful, and if he is scandalous, it is chiefly about Prince Napoleon—a personage who does not by any means come within the benefit of the foregoing sentence, and whom we, for our part, abandon to him with perfect equanimity. The chief fault of his book is that there is too little about the real subject (though there are some interesting details of the true and veritable chasse française, which, we learn, the Emperor corrupted, as he did other things), and too much about well-known and chiefly political matters which have little more to do with Compiègne than the Egyptian affairs of to-day have to do with Windsor. Apparently other volumes of souvenirs are to follow from the same hand, and we can only hope that the author will pursue a different plan in writing them.

Not merely a second edition (in which guise it appears before us), but a twenty-second and more, ought to be the lot of the treatise on monologizing which MM. Coquelin have published, with counterfeit presentment of their agreeable selves on the cover (3). Here we have all about it. Each distinguished artist not merely gives his general impressions of his art, but follows these up with specimen monologues "analysed" carefully, with the most minute directions accounted for on æsthetic and philosophic principles. "Here you will speak with the paternal gravity of a moralist." "Here you will make the gesture of a man who rubs himself hard with a towel," &c. &c. After reading which, no doubt, aspirants to the honours of the monologue will be able to deliver themselves with quite as much success as M. Coquelin aîné and M. Coquelin cadet, or with not quite so much success, as the case may be.

A third edition is of itself a recommendation when the book is not of a nature to appeal to the general reader. M. Zeller's discourses on mediæval history are in this case, and have been, the author tells us, in great part rewritten for the occasion. The present volume (4) is in a manner introductory to the history of the middle ages proper, for it stops short of the Carlovingian period.

We do not think that an essay in three hundred pages on genius in art (5) is wanted, or likely to be useful, or indeed possible in the sense of being capable of being made a satisfactory literary work. "Ayez du génie" is what it must come to. But, if any one thinks differently, he may see what M. Séailles has got to say on the subject.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THERE is only one excuse for a book of travels. It must justify its existence by being interesting, or it should not exist at all. If this proposition, which we are prepared to post up on the door of any University in either world, and maintain against all comers, is accepted, then Mr. Cope-Devereux's Fair Italy (1) has no chance of justifying itself. It is not interesting. The author himself thinks an apology necessary. He points out that Italy has become a kingdom in these days, and that Monte Carlo is an abuse, and advances these facts as reasons why he was justified in writing his book. We accept the premisses, but not the conclusion. Mr. Cope-Devereux and his wife travelled over much of Italy in a hurried way, and went to all the places indicated to them by their guide-books. After reading what he has to say about them we arrive at this result—that the tourists had a very pleasant journey, but neither saw, nor heard, nor thought anything new. The author is very indignant about the gambling in the Principality of Monaco. He thinks that Europe ought to interfere to put a stop to a practice which leads to so many suicides. These sentiments are admirable, but not novel.

Mr. C. E. Hirsch's tiny biography tells all the little that is known of William Tyndale (2) in a readable way. His booklet is written in the usual spirit of Broad Church or Low Church writers about the Reformation. The black and the white are distributed wholesale, and it is taken for granted that denouncing the vices of the clergy was heresy.

Mr. Howells's farce, The Register (3), is an example of the more delicate kind of story-writing which America, according to native critics, is to show the world. Two young persons, male and female, have philandered after their kind, and then quarrelled because their vanity was hurt. Then they both come to Boston, and happen to be in adjoining rooms served by the same register-stove. By the help of this machine each contrives to do a good deal of eavesdropping on the other. Then they kiss and make it up.

The neat little book which Dr. Mary J. Salford and Mrs. (or Miss) Mary E. Allen (4) have written on the subject of physical exercise for girls contains so much sense that it deserves to be composed with more skill. A great deal of it consists of descriptions of a little girl whom Dr. Mary J. Salford set on her legs again after she had nearly been made an invalid for life by thin high-heeled shoes, tight stays, scanty petticoats, and want of exercise. That is a way of teaching by example which is terribly apt to be tiresome. Then, too, there is a superfluity of instructive conversation of the Mr. Barlow kind. By skipping a good deal of this tedium it is possible to find a remainder which is good sense. The descriptions of muscular little girls doing breakneck feats on the parallel bars are rather terrible, but after all there is no great fear that any considerable portion of the sex will become female acrobats. From what the authors say, the tendency in America seems to be to err in the other way.

Our Business Boys (5) is another pretty little book of the same didactic kind. This time it is the boys who are shown the way they should go. The Rev. F. E. Clark tells them how to get on in life. Put briefly his advice amounts to this, that they must do good work and plenty of it. He also warns them, as many reverend gentlemen have done before, against the seductions of stories, the theatre, and the pipe.

Mr. Allen's History Topics (6) is apparently meant as a guide for schoolmasters who have to set history lessons to their classes. A glance at his list of subjects leads to the conviction that boys brought up on that system will either be wells of historical learning, or will have a fine superficial smattering of a host of things.

Dr. Tracy's Handbook of Sanitary Information (7) is an American version of a kind of book which is common enough here. His rules seem sound.

Now, when Florida (8) is fast becoming the only hope of "our boys" who cannot pass examinations and who want to make money in a pleasant way, Mr. Upham should find a sale on this side of the water. Nobody need trouble about his little outbursts of Federal partisanship or linger over his spiteful remarks about Jefferson Davis and Mr. Benjamin. When he sticks to his text he is instructive. He gives information about the price of land and labour, and the proper management of an orange-farm. The get-up of his handbook does not say much for the publishing enterprise of Jacksonville, Fla.

All the wisdom about things in general which was poured forth at Huddersfield at the last Social Science Congress is now collected in the usual volume of Transactions (9).

The last three additions to Morley's Universal Library (10)—Dryden's Virgil, Butler's Analogy, and Sir Walter's Demonology and Witchcraft—seem to be better printed than the earlier volumes of the series.

We have received a second edition, "new and cheaper," of Science in the Nursery: or, Children's Toys (11).

We have also to notice The Shilling Peerage (12) and The Shilling Baronetage (13), published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus. They are compact but legible.

ARCHBISHOP PECKHAM'S LETTERS.
Vol. II. in royal 8vo. pp. 878, price 10s. half bound.

REGISTRUM EPISTOLARUM FRATRIS JOHANNIS PECKHAM, ARCHIEPISCOPI CANTUARIENSIS. Edited by CHARLES TRICE MARTIN, B.A. F.S.A. and published by the Authority of the Lords Commissioners of H.M. Treasury, under the Direction of the Master of the Rolls.

Archbishop Peckham's Letters are esteemed of great value for the illustration of English ecclesiastical history. The Second Volume extends over a period of nearly two years, from August 1282 to June 1284. During this period the Archbishop travelled over a great part of his province, visiting the dioceses through which he passed and correcting abuses both among the secular clergy and in the religious houses. The most important events recorded are his two visits to Wales, undertaken to assist in pacifying that country. The Third Volume of Peckham's Letters is in progress.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION,

AT EVERY LIBRARY.

THE DAILYS of SODDEN FEN. By the Author of "Four Crotchets to a Bar." 3 vols.

ATHENÆUM.

In virtue of its subject, of its boldly-drawn characters, of its descriptions and manner of treatment, it is pre-eminently readable. The characters of the whole family of the Dailys are English to the backbone. Few more weird figures will be found in contemporary fiction than that of James Daily as he sat night after night crouched on the thatch of his cottage, brooding over the dim prospect of Sodden Fen, which he has sworn never to enter except as the recognized owner. The keeping of his vow, the manner of his release, the long nursing of his insane greed and envy and fancied wrongs, are told with masculine power—which is by no means the same thing as saying by a male writer.....If this novel is not one of the most vigorous which have appeared within the last year or two, it has elements of vigour in conception and execution which entitle it to much consideration, and the discerning reader will not fail to observe many indications of the best qualities that a novel can possess.

IN LONDON TOWN. By KATHARINE LEE, Author of "A Western Wildflower." 3 vols.

ACADEMY.

A good, sound, interesting, and healthy novel, and one that it is impossible to read without feeling the better for it. There is a refreshingly quiet humour in some of the characters. The figure of the old man Thorold, a descendant of an ancient family, who believes he has been defrauded of his rights, is a very striking and even pathetic one.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

This is a fresh, original, wholesome, clever, humorous, and yet serious story. The heroine is an excellent conception. Another very well conceived and well-drawn character is the hero's mother, and another is her most worthy and amiable brother. It is highly creditable to the writer to have accomplished three such admirable sketches.

TORWOOD'S TRUST. By EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

THE VALLEY OF SOREK:

A Novel.

By GERTRUDE M. GEORGE.

"Henry Westgate, the hero, is a study of no slight psychological interest.....It is the development of this character for good and for evil, through the diverse influences of friends and circumstances,.....that Miss George has portrayed with singular vigour and skilful analysis.....It is impossible to read this novel without a wonderment at the maturity and self-restraint of its style, and at the rare beauty and pathos, mingled with strength, which mark every page."—Literary World.

"Henry Westgate, the hero,.....is drawn with skill and power. His lapses from the right path, his weakness when he allows himself to be drawn down by the wife whom he loves, instead of raising her to his own spiritual level, are portrayed in a forcible and natural manner. Grisham is also a clever, if unpleasing, character study.....The author.....possesses no inconsiderable talent."—Morning Post.

"The characters are clearly defined, the situations are strong, and the interest evoked by them is considerable. The women, in particular, are admirably drawn.....Miss George..... may be recommended to a perusal."—Athenæum.

"Miss George possesses in no slight degree the power of investing her characters with life, and many of the strong situations are worked out well. Westgate, for instance, is very well drawn .....Considerable insight into human nature is shown in the subtle analysis of the phases through which his mind passes during his courtship of Hebe.....The story is well and powerfully written."—Globe.

"Her power in depicting the fluctuations of character between good and evil influences ('betwixt Ormuzd and Ahriman,' to follow her Orientalism) is by no means small, nor does her choice of Samson and Delilah, as implied types of her hero and heroine.....impair the natural character-painting of these personages.....The work is praiseworthy and promising, and if the author should advance as happily as she has begun, her name may yet be famous."—Daily Telegraph.

"A book which has engaged our vivid interest and painful concern from beginning to end. .....It is, indeed, a striking book, more particularly so for a first novel. The life-history of Henry Westgate is depicted with a fidelity to the early indications of character which is remarkable.....Miss George works up her story step by step, till it reaches a climax of tragedy such as only true genius can safely attempt, and we may add that she does so with absolute success."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"No fault can be found with the tone or teaching of the book, if sometimes a little severe. .....In style there is much to approve."—Academy.

"The author's aspirations are good and noble; her views of life are just, her enthusiasm is chastened by good taste."—Standard.

"An original—indeed, perhaps it is not too much to say a unique—story.....powerful, eloquent, and only too true.....marked by strong individuality."—Society.

"The story of Westgate's infatuation for the impetuous, beautiful, and pleasure-loving Hebe Manfield is well told.....In fact....Miss George can write very well."—Morning Advertiser.

"The writer shows throughout power in the drawing of character."—Manchester Examiner.

"Like many merit has and the average.....A young man arrested in a career of carelessness and extravagance by a reverse of fortune, reforms his life, and becomes the subject of strong religious convictions. How these convictions are assailed, and how they are shaken, almost to overthrowing, is told in this story.....There is ability in the book, and promise for the future."—Spectator.

A HISTORY OF LONDON.

By W. J. LOFTIE, B.A., F.S.A.
Author of "Round about London," "Through London," &c.

"A book which cannot be neglected by any student of London history."
Academy (Henry B. Wheatley).

"A thorough and scholarly piece of work. Mr. Loftie has carefully brought together all that is known of the history of London, and has set it before the reader in a clear and attractive form."—Contemporary Review.

"The most complete and masterly book of the kind that has recently come before us."
British Quarterly Review.

"Extensive erudition and sound judgment are found in combination with a most attractive and entertaining style."—Illustrated London News (G. A. S.).

"Mr. W. J. Loftie's 'History of London' will take rank as a classic. No one who is competent to judge will lay down the book without a feeling of admiration for the fulness and thoroughness of its author. Mr. Loftie has read widely and assimilated closely."—World.

THE ORKNEYS AND SHETLAND:

Their Past and Present State.

By JOHN R. TUDOR ("Old Wick" of the Field).

With Chapters on the Geology, by BENJAMIN N. PEACH, F.R.S.E., F.G.S., and JOHN HORNE, F.R.S.E., F.G.S.; Notes on the Flora of the Orkneys, by WILLIAM IRVINE FORTESCUE; and Notes on the Flora of Shetland, by PETER WHITE, L.R.C.S.E.

"With its maps and illustrations it is probably the best book on the subject to be had."
Times.

"It would be difficult to find another section of the British Isles to which greater justice has been done than is done to Orkney and Shetland in this solid and handsome volume.....It is a work of great and enduring value to the student of archæology, ethnology, and social development."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Tudor has taken much trouble both to be accurate and to present his facts in a clear and attractive manner. He has been particularly successful in his chapters on history, for which he has gone to the original sources and to the most authoritative writers by whom they have been discussed.....Notes on the geology and flora of Orkney and Shetland are contributed to the volume by competent writers, and Mr. Tudor himself has much to say about the physical features of the islands, and the character and pursuits of the islanders."

NEW "STANDARD" EDITION OF THE COMPLETE WORKS OF W. M. THACKERAY.

In Twenty-six Volumes, large 8vo. each 10s. 6d.

This Edition is being printed from New Type, on fine paper; it will include some of Mr. Thackeray's Writings which have not before been collected, with many additional Illustrations; and, with the exception of the EDITION DE LUXE, it will be the largest and handsomest Edition that has been published.

THE FOLLOWING VOLUMES HAVE BEEN PUBLISHED:

VANITY FAIR, 2 vols. | PENDENNIS, 2 vols. | THE NEWCOMES, 2 vols. | ESMOND. THE VIRGINIANS, Vol. I.

And a New Volume will be issued on the 1st of each succeeding Month until the conclusion of the Series.

EXTRACTS FROM NOTICES BY THE PRESS.

The STANDARD.

It is now thirty-five years since "Vanity Fair" was written, and if we allow twenty years for the novel-reading period of each generation, Thackeray's popularity has stood the test of two generations, and barely a year passes without some fresh edition of his works being called for. To use the common phrase, no library is considered complete without him; and no one who buys his works is content with anything short of a library edition. For this reason, we may safely predict a ready welcome and a rapid sale for the present issue, which, in respect of paper, typography, and binding, is altogether satisfactory.

The DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A new edition of Thackeray's works is now to be published called the "Standard" Edition (twenty-six volumes), and the first of these is very naturally the first volume of the immortal and indestructible "Vanity Fair." Very little is left to be desired in the exterior appearance of these books, and the interior is embellished—as his works ought always to be—with the "Author's own candles," to wit, his original illustrations to his own letterpress.....It is pleasant to have an English classic presented to us in the guise in which "Mr. Titmarsh" appears in the "Standard Vanity Fair."

EGYPT.

"THE Egyptian papers," according to a statement made by the London Correspondent of one of the chief country papers that support the Government, "have caused "a very painful impression." That is not altogether surprising. The hides of Englishmen would have been as tough as that useful and locally appropriate material of which the best courbashes are made if it had been otherwise. The series of Blue and White Books, ranging from "Egypt 12" to "Egypt 15," do something more than justify the Vote of Censure which Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH brings on the day after to-morrow, and which Mr. GLADSTONE, to judge from a published letter of his secretary's, is going to meet by "free comment" on votes of censure in general. This information again is not astonishing, for the damning inference to be drawn from the papers can be met in no other way than by an attempt to bluster the matter out as on a former occasion. Every defence of the Government is gone and ruined beforehand. At the time when they sheltered themselves in Parliament behind the plenipotential mission of General GORDON they were, as it was pretty well known weeks ago and is now proved to demonstration, refusing permission to every step which General GORDON wished to take. The paltry plea that he was sent out on a pacific mission and has changed it for a warlike one is met by equally irrefragable proof that his efforts to accomplish his mission by pacific means were deliberately frustrated. He wished to meet the MAHDI face to face and arrange matters; the Government forbade it. He wished to employ the unquestioned influence of ZOBEIR; the Government forbade it. Neither by negotiation nor by influence, the two only means of pacific arrangement, was he allowed to act. He wished to leave Khartoum for the south; the Government forbade that. He wished for a demonstration from Suakim; the Government refused it. He wished for a demonstration to Berber; the Government refused it. Every avenue of escape, except the disgraceful one which necessitated his abandonment of the agents he had with full approval engaged, was cut off. Every plan, peaceful and hostile, by way of negotiation and by way of demonstration, which he proposed for accomplishing his mission of extricating the garrisons, was negatived. There is no need here to reproduce the indignant words which have long before this time stung every Englishman who has a sense of honour. They were practically anticipated by every one who is likely to feel the sting. Whether the Government accept Sir WILFRID LAWSON'S, or Mr. HENEAGE'S, or Sir A. HOLROYD'S back door of escape, or whether, with the calm complacence of Mr. WOOLCOMB, they trust to "having "all the votes beforehand," their plight is equally hopeless in argument as in honour. Possibly, by a repetition of the dose of the Suakim expedition, they will announce some intellectual contempt for public feeling sufficient to salve the remorselessness of the less hardened of their supporters. Some of these supporters have been obliging enough to prepare a way for them in this direction also. There is no need to explore the Paradise of Dirty Devices open to British faith in denying and fingers that are not afraid of the contact of dirt. But the Opposition must be in very sore [illegible] if the result of the debate—not to speak of the division—is [illegible] than decisive in favour of Sir H. HICKS-BEACH'S motion.

The first paragraph began with a quotation from a supporter of the Government; the second is quite good enough to be followed in the second. "In military circles," says the Alexandria Correspondent of the Daily News, "it "is thought that an extensive Soudan campaign is inevitable "in the autumn." Even the intelligence of Radicals will hardly set this anticipation down to the incurable bloodthirstiness and greed of professional advancement which distinguish the British army. Soudan campaigns are not very attractive at present to military men, and are likely to be still less so when the Government decision, that they are wars where no triumphs on the victors wait, and where, after the toughest fight for years, those victors are not worth a vote of thanks, is generally known in the army. That the anticipation, though, like other anticipations, depending on probabilities, is a very reasonable one there is no doubt. That rebellious and victorious savages, especially after such a success as the capture or slaughter of General GORDON would be, are not sensible of the ingenuity or the impregnableness of fancy barriers, may be safely laid down; and the distinction which Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government has drawn between Egypt proper and Egypt improper is a purely fancy line. Exactly as the mismanagement of the spring and early summer of 1882 brought about the expedition of Sir GARNET WOLSELEY, exactly as the mismanagement and irresolution of the end of last year brought about the expedition of General GRAHAM, so may the mismanagement and irresolution of the last three months be expected to lead to a third expedition, far more difficult and costly, at some time or other. It is rather to be hoped than expected that the parallel will not be completed by the addition of a massacre of Khartoum to the massacre of Alexandria and the massacre of Sinkat. Of course things may fall out differently; but if they do so it will not be due to HER MAJESTY'S Government. In November last they could with a minimum of difficulty, and by adopting the course then urged on them (of letting Kordofan and Darfur alone if they liked for the present, but occupying at once the course of the Nile and the coast of the Red Sea) have settled the question. Now time and the chapter of accidents—their only gods, it would seem—can alone save them from doing the same thing in an infinitely more difficult and expensive fashion. They have followed the celebrated opinion of their latest recruit, who joined them under such happy auspices, and have decided that war to-morrow is always better than war to-day. As was naturally to be expected, they have got both. But they will undertake their war to-morrow, in all probability, not with the prestige of Tel-el-Kebir or of Tamasi behind them, but with the accomplished disgrace of Berber and the threatened and indelible disgrace of the loss of the other places mentioned by General GORDON. ROBESPIERRE had at least the grace to be choked by the blood of DANTON. But there is little chance of any parallel accident on Monday. Mr. GLADSTONE is not easily choked, and, if a telegram announcing General GORDON'S death were to arrive at four o'clock, it would doubtless find him as certainly, if not as serenely, conscious of his own infallibility as a telegram announcing the submission of all the Soudan to the KHEDIVE.

The history of the Conference preliminaries follows the course of nature and of former history as certainly as the history of the GORDON mission. In France, at least, they take by no means such a rosy view of French adhesion to the English proposals as Mr. GLADSTONE takes, and the preliminary communications which Mr. GLADSTONE half thought might be over on Thursday week are not over now. Only ignorance and impudence has brother will to the announced annexation of Sarakhs a [illegible] commentary on the very aged and excellent pro[illegible] beggars cannot be choosers. Only the same [illegible] qualities or personifications would be surprised [illegible] truth of the rumour that other Continental nations will take advantage of the meeting to press points—such as quarantine—which are pregnant with trouble for England. The reported answer of Turkey to the invitation indicates new rocks ahead, and it is impossible to discover in Mr. GLADSTONE's replies any sign of a determination to avoid these rocks. He will not say positively that subjects irrelevant to the invitation are to be excluded from discussion; he will not even say that, if they are included, Great Britain will refuse to discuss them. He is in so cloudy a mind as to the whole matter that he only "conceives" the Powers to have accepted, and says they must construe their own acceptances. All wise statesmen shun Conferences and Congresses for exactly this reason—that they are the opportunity of every Power except that Power whose difficulty makes them necessary. That in France itself abuse has for the moment given way to a kind of plaintive expostulation is not in the least reassuring. For the chiefs of the present English Ministry are men as susceptible to cajolery as they are apparently impervious to reason. The activity of France for the last few months elsewhere has probably been at least as much prompted by the hope that she may have something to offer when a chance comes of regaining the ground lost in Egypt as by anything else. Into her hands, into the hands of Russia, into the hands of every Power which feels either real ill-will and rivalry or a desire to get its own way on points on which English and Continental opinion differs, this ill-omened Conference directly plays.

MORNING SITTINGS.

MINISTERIAL interference with the rights of private members is a grievance which almost exclusively affects the immediate sufferers. It is true that useful measures are sometimes proposed, and on rare occasions carried, by non-official supporters and even by opponents of the Government; but the whole mass of independent legislation is comparatively unimportant. During the present Session the House has repeatedly been counted out on Tuesdays, and Bills and Resolutions introduced on Wednesdays are habitually talked out. The early introduction of morning sittings to be devoted entirely to Government business is nevertheless unpopular in the House. Mr. LOWE, whose instinctive antipathy to pleasant illusions was never repressed through fear of giving offence, sometimes caused irritation by the blunt assertion that time occupied by private members was wholly wasted. Conventional fictions are tenacious of life, and Mr. GLADSTONE's latest proposal is not unnaturally resented; but even the most inveterate antagonists of the Ministers admit that it is right to dispose of the Franchise Bill since it has been introduced. There is still less difference of opinion as to the necessity of proceeding with the indispensable business of Supply. The London Municipal Bill is less urgent; but, if urban revolution is inevitable, it matters little whether it is effected this year or next. It will scarcely be possible to carry the more ambitious measure for handing over the administration of rural districts to the nominees of household suffrage. The scheme will necessarily be complicated, and it is idle to pretend that it is demanded by any portion of the community. When no more pressing enterprise stands in the way, the Caucuses will undertake the manipulation of public opinion, as they now agitate in favour of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's Bill.

Mr. TREVELYAN's promise of a scheme to facilitate the sale of Irish lands will be almost immediately redeemed. If it proves to be judicious and equitable, both political parties will be disposed to facilitate its progress; but, unless it involves further spoliation, it will almost certainly be obstructed by the followers of Mr. PARNELL. Mr. GLADSTONE lately reminded the House that a Government nearly the same as the present Administration passed three important measures of primary importance in 1870. Irish Disestablishment, the Ballot, and the existing system of Education all date from that fertile Session; but at that time the Irish conspiracies against freedom of debate had not been organized, and the temper of the House has since changed for the worse. It may be added that the Conservative leader then exercised undisputed authority over the Opposition, and Mr. DISRAELI was never anxious to prolong a losing game. The Ballot Bill and the Irish Church Bill only involved issues which were simple, though of vital importance, and the Education Bill could scarcely be regarded as a party measure. There were no foreign difficulties to divert attention from domestic affairs. It is not necessary to inquire whether the rapid and easy introduction of great organic changes is in itself desirable. The lists of impending innovations which are from time to time published by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and his followers suggest the inexpediency of removing all impediments to revolutionary and socialistic legislation. Mr. GLADSTONE is at present taking only a preparatory step.

One possible result of the demand for morning sittings in the early part of the Session may be the collapse of another favourite project of Mr. GLADSTONE. It will be difficult to transact important business in the House, if seventy or eighty of the most capable members are at the same time engaged in Standing Committees. Select Committees on private Bills, absorbing another considerable section of the House, are frequently obliged to suspend their proceedings at great inconvenience for the purpose of taking part in divisions; but in their case the only innovation consists in the early introduction of morning sittings. To the device of Grand Committees Mr. GLADSTONE, according to his custom, attached exaggerated importance. It was for the purpose of trying the experiment, and of silencing the Opposition by the votes of the majority, that he held the almost abortive autumnal Session of 1882. The contrivance for closing debate has never yet been applied in practice, though the supporters of the Government constantly assert that the obstruction which it was intended to prevent is more rampant than at any former time. Of two Grand Committees which sat last year, one accomplished its task to the general satisfaction. The Committee on Law found itself unable to produce any result, because its members were not agreed as to the principle of the measures under discussion. All parties asserted or admitted the propriety of repeating the experiment during the present Session; but the conditions of success are narrow, and the popularity of the scheme is already impaired. A devolution of inquiry into the details of a Bill can only be useful if the decision of the Committee is at once accepted by the House. All questions which involve party divisions are therefore unfit for reference to Grand Committees. The opinion of such bodies on the extension of the franchise, on the municipal government of London, or on other political issues, would have no practical value.

If legislation in the absence of large detachments from the main body of the House proves to be seriously inconvenient, members will begin to doubt whether any advance has been made on the old system of Select Committees. Universal experience shows that business is more efficiently transacted by small Boards or Committees than by larger assemblies. A Grand Committee is better qualified to discuss clauses and provisos than the House of Commons; but a competent Select Committee would do the work still more satisfactorily. It may be confidently asserted that the Report of a Grand Committee on Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's Merchant Shipping Bill will fail to supersede angry debates in the House, unless the Board of Trade and the shipowners previously arrive at some compromise by means of private discussion. The embarrassment which may result from the coincidence of morning sittings with the appointment of Grand Committees might be more readily endured if it were likely to be temporary and exceptional; but the pressure on the House of Commons, and its consequent inability to deal with large measures, have constantly increased since the accession of the present Ministry to office, and are not likely to diminish. Private members have little hope of hereafter recovering the opportunities of which they are now to be deprived. With all its efforts, the Government has carried but a small fraction of the thirty measures which Mr. GLADSTONE denounced his predecessors for postponing. In the next Session Parliament will probably be relieved of the Franchise Bill, and perhaps of the London Government Bill; but redistribution will, as the Ministers themselves contend, be more complicated than the mere extension of household suffrage; and the creation of municipal institutions in all parts of the kingdom will be a less simple task than the abolition of the City Corporation. On the whole, it seems probable that the system of Standing Committees will be abandoned almost before it has been fully tried. No [illegible] of Parliamentary procedure might effect their object, if the impediments which they purport to remove were not the result of permanent causes. Almost any provisions which could be suggested would be liable to abuse. The rules which render it possible to block Bills, or to talk them out, were designed for the purpose of correcting anomalies which previously existed. It seems to outside observers that it might not be impossible to restrain the license of asking questions for the mere gratification of curiosity, or by way of appeal from some local authority on trivial matters of administration. It is scarcely necessary that the business of the nation should be kept waiting while a Secretary of State explains why a boy was sent to a reformatory for stealing an apple; but the House of Commons has assumed supreme executive powers without providing itself with instruments by which it could exercise its functions. Parliamentary government is more really on its trial than when Prince ALBERT doubted its competence in the conduct of a war.

Comparatively little instruction can be derived from the study of the foreign representative systems which were, without exception, founded on English models. Neither on the Continent nor in America are Parliaments largely occupied with legislation, for occasional constitutional changes are generally intrusted to Assemblies specially elected for the purpose. In Germany Prince BISMARCK has lately found great difficulty in passing economical measures. The French Chamber has within a few years passed some important Bills relating to education and military service; but it is far from sharing the restless appetite of the majority of the House of Commons for innovation. In one main point there is a strong resemblance between the English and French Constitutions. In both countries supreme power, both administrative and legislative, is vested in an elected Assembly; but in England alone among civilized nations can the class which lives on weekly wages be supreme over all other sections of the community. Artisans are more anarchical in their doctrines in France than in England; but in France the owners of land, with their families, form more than half of the whole population. The Constitution which was eventually imitated by almost all the nations of the world contained a large aristocratic element. The Constitution which may be introduced this year or next is totally dissociated from rank, from property, and from education. The Parliamentary difficulties which, among other shapes, take the form of a necessity for morning sittings are perhaps not unmixed evils.

OUR OLD FRIEND CHAUVIN.

FOR some considerable time past the French have been supplying some of us with a tolerably steady source of amusement. The pleasure of being hated and feared is, unhappily, not so keenly felt by Englishmen as it used to be. Some persons of delicate sensibility even think that condition painful; but there is a considerable leaven of the old ADAM left, and, with due encouragement, it may yet again become too strong for the new philanthropic man. If it does not, the fault will not lie with our friends at Paris. Ever since they fell out of the race in Egypt, by trying to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, they have been favouring us with steady showers of abuse. It ranges all the way from grave rebuke of a statesmanlike kind down to imitations of the silly rubbish written in the days of the First Empire. There has been one short pause. Prince BISMARCK, to gain his mysterious private ends, suddenly growled, and then there was peace for a time. The isolated position of France and the value of the English alliance became favourite texts for leading articles, and Mr. SHAW was hurriedly indemnified. But the sound of Prince BISMARCK's growl died away and nothing came of it. It need not be supposed that all this means very much. Our friends over the water have always imitated and abused us, an apparent contradiction which is exercising the minds of some ingenious gentlemen among them a good deal at present. Still the spectacle is curious and full of instruction from whichever side it is looked at.

A tout seigneur tout honneur; let us take the grave and statesmanlike side first, and let the République Française, which is supposed to speak the mind of the French Government on matters of foreign policy, have the word. This journal has lately made the Saturday Review a peg whereon to hang a lecture on the folly of our Government in neglecting the friendship of France and destroying the Dual Control of futile memory. We are not concerned to defend Mr. GLADSTONE's Government from the charge of folly. The task is beyond the power of man; but it is well to ask once in a way, and in plain words, What is meant by the friendship of France? When the French talk about it, they are accustomed to teach by example and point to the Crimea. They are so far right that it was indeed a very striking instance of what a French alliance is in practice. The two countries went through the war in defence of their several interests. Before the struggle was over the Government of NAPOLEON III. began to draw back, and in the Conference at Paris his representatives showed themselves the steady allies of Russia. Passing over the speeches of the Colonels as a mere ebullition of folly, we may ask whether we ought to feel gratitude for being nearly led into the insane Mexican adventure, and for being deserted at the crisis of the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty. The Republicans who are in the saddle to-day are fond of insisting that the Empire did not represent France, and so they may wish for more modern instances. Their attitude is not particularly logical in this matter, for if the Second Empire was the ignoble adventure they are fond of calling it, we fail to see why they should take up its quarrels. That, however, is a very subordinate affair. Since the Empire disappeared between a foreign enemy and a native mob there has been no change in the methods of French diplomacy. In Egypt and in the Far East it has shown no disposition to consider our interests. From the moment that anything could be got for France its agents have thrown the phantom alliance aside, and avowed open hostility. The will to hurt has been better than the deed, but we know what we have to thank for that. Now of all the floods of nonsense talked in our time, perhaps the most absurd is the gabble about the natural sympathy and kindly feelings which peoples have, or ought to have, or might have for one another. There is no such thing as gratitude or any other amorous affection between nations. They must regulate their conduct by an intelligent regard for their interests, and the nation which is influenced by sudden emotions cannot be relied on from one day to another. Therefore nobody need work himself into a state of moral sublime over the selfishness of France. There are, however, ways and ways of pursuing our interests. Some nations can see that standing steadily to an alliance is one of the best of them all; they can recognize the necessity of compromise; can give up the immediate for the future, and the less for the greater, with good humour. If we do not greatly value the alliance of France, it is because it can never do as they do. For ages past its policy has been directed by personal considerations peculiar to its ruler, or by the blind desire to secure all at any cost. Whoever acts with a French Government must do so with the knowledge that his ally may start from his side at any moment, and will league himself with the enemy of yesterday as soon as he is asked to moderate his claims. Morally that may be neither better nor worse than the conduct of more phlegmatic nations; but it gives a good business reason why the friendship of France is so unstable as to be nearly worthless. Moreover, changes of government make no difference. As it was with LOUIS XV., so it was with the two Empires, and so it is with the Republic.

The world has made many mistakes about the political character of the French. They have been called cynical, cruel, fickle, greedy, and a great number of other bad names; but they have generally been credited with a species of demoniacal cleverness. It would be nearer the truth to say that their sins are the result of sheer childish innocence. It is not the innocence of a very nice kind of child, but rather the natural selfishness of the naughty boy who cannot realize the fact that anybody in the world is entitled to consideration except himself till the fact is borne in upon his mind by stripes. They have an innate incapacity to see that other nations have rights or interests, and therefore they try to ride roughshod over everybody with a quiet conscience. When they cannot they scold, and are unaffectedly amazed at the callous brutality of the self-seeking foreigner. At this moment the very papers which complain of our disregard for the friendship of France with gravity on their outside sheet, publish highly diverting abuse of us inside. The abuse is not diverting because it is funny in itself, for it is the common fate of Frenchmen to become dull as soon as they take to scolding England, but because it is so obviously sincere and so delightfully destitute of any sense of humour or dignity. These gentlemen, journalists and novelists, are apparently furious at the insolent prosperity of this country, and so unpack their hearts with words and fall a cursing. The diplomatic République Française takes its cue from M. CAMILLE

DEBANS, who used to be amusing till he took to inarticulate raving against England. It wants to know why France, in spite of centuries of ill-usage, is still afflicted with a persistent Anglomania. This diseased taste for imitating the foreigner is an old French malady, according to the République. After Rossbach the Prussian hat was worn at Paris—a sign of the amiable weakness of France for being kind to such as use her ill. The Prussian hat disappeared, but Anglomania remained and remains. These curious patriots are not very consistent. After complaining of the enduring hatred of England, and comparing it unfavourably with the kindly affection of France, they suddenly discover that Anglomania is a disease of the idle classes. It has never been shared by the mass of the nation. The nouvelles couches retain their healthy sentiments and hate the secular enemy. As for the mystery that puzzles these gentlemen we think we can explain it. We will answer them according to their folly at the risk of being like unto them. The explanation is to be found in that little sentence about the result of Rossbach. When France has been well beaten by somebody it copies his hat, and when the operation has been repeated it copies his coat too. Now there have been a good many battles of Rossbach by land and sea between us and our thinskinned friends. The moral is obvious. If you want to go your way in this world untroubled by France, do not make alliances with it; they will assuredly put you shortly in the dilemma of quarrelling or yielding up your interests under stress of bullying. Make your mind up clearly as to what it is you are aiming at, take all the forces at work into consideration, trust in GOD, and keep your powder dry. So shall you be free from a very harassing partner; and journalists may lecture and novelists may rave, but it will not avail. At the end of it all, too, France will imitate you from hat to boot, and respect you infinitely.

THE PEERS ON THE LUNACY LAWS.

AMID the storm and stress of party politics a very interesting and important little debate took place on Monday night in the House of Lords. The discussion was a model one in its way. Those who engaged in it were few, but they almost all spoke with authority, and thoroughly understood the subject with which they had to deal. Lord SHAFTESBURY, as the head of the Lunacy Commission, presented the official view of the conditions under which people may be confined as insane. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, who is known to be personally much interested in the question, and has had judicial experience of the manner in which the Lunacy Acts work, contributed some valuable reminiscences and weighty suggestions. The LORD CHANCELLOR, whose acquaintance with all branches of English law is intimate, and who is the official guardian of lunatics, spoke for the Government, and promised rather vaguely that something should be done. But the speech of the evening was undoubtedly Lord SALISBURY'S. The leader of the Opposition pointed out with admirable lucidity exactly what were the faults of the present system, and laid down with perfect accuracy the principles on which reform should be carried out. The significance of the debate, or rather conversation, cannot be estimated solely by the practical result to which it led. When the present or some future Administration comes to frame a comprehensive measure, it will, no doubt, find that a resolve to "do something" is a very adequate guide to the determination of what ought to be done. But it is well worth while to have shown beyond the possibility of contradiction that the existing system is both theoretically indefensible and practically mischievous. Whatever else may be said of Mrs. WELDON and her proceedings, it must be admitted that the action which she brought against Dr. FORBES WINSLOW has been of immense benefit to the public. Baron HUDDLESTON, in the course of the trial, made remarks which excited general attention; and, whether he was right or wrong in his law, talked a good deal of sound sense. Mr. Justice MANISTY, in giving judgment for a re-hearing of the case, spoke still more strongly, and attracted even greater notice. Lord MILLTOWN, who introduced the subject in the House of Lords, avowedly based his motion upon the facts brought out in WELDON v. WINSLOW. That motion, having served its purpose by the debate which it raised, was eventually withdrawn; but most people will agree with Lord MILLTOWN in thinking that "the existing state of the "Lunacy laws is eminently unsatisfactory, and constitutes "a serious danger to the liberty of the subject." The latter phrase is one very apt to be abused. But, if it has any meaning at all, it is surely applicable to the risk which we all run of being put into asylums by relatives or friends to whom our freedom or presence is inconvenient.

Those who wish to reform the Lunacy laws have one great advantage. The law is not in this instance, as in so many others, a mass of involution, cross-reference, and complexity. It is substantially contained in two Acts of Parliament passed respectively in 1845 and 1853. Lunatics are by those statutes treated differently, according as they are or are not paupers. As nobody not responsible for his maintenance is likely to care much about getting a pauper shut up, the Legislature has provided that in his case, and in his case only, the assent of two magistrates must be obtained. The relatives of a wealthy man, who may perhaps think that they can manage his property much better than he can himself, have only to procure the certificate of two doctors, and when once consigned to an asylum, the lunatic cannot be released without the sanction of those who sent him there or the Lunacy Commissioners. This is really monstrous. Lord SHAFTESBURY, who speaks with all the combined force of personal character and official position, seems to us to have misconceived the nature of the arguments which he had to meet. His speech was, if we may say so without disrespect, an illustration of the fallacy known as ignoratio elenchi. Lord MILLTOWN contended that the law afforded no guarantee against the confinement of sane persons. Lord SHAFTESBURY replied that the inmates of asylums were no longer starved, beaten, or put in irons. This is most satisfactory. But it is not the point. Probably most of those who would set the law in motion on insufficient grounds have no desire to inflict unnecessary cruelty. Their object being served by the incarceration of the objectionable relative, they might be perfectly willing that he should have every indulgence short of the liberty to which he has a right. Lord COLERIDGE described the manner in which the law, lax as it is, is often evaded, and referred to the case of NOWELL v. WILLIAMS, which he tried himself. There the lunatic, about whose insanity there really was very little doubt, was at first arrested on the certificates of doctors who were interested in the asylum where he was to be confined. This proving to be illegal, he was formally discharged from custody, and rearrested ten minutes afterwards on a fresh order. Even more scandalous subterfuges have been exposed. The Act says that a separate examination must be made by each of two medical men. But two doctors have been known to visit the house together at the instance of the same person, and to examine the alleged lunatic "sepa-"rately" in the sense that one waited outside the room, and went in when the other came out.

Lord SALISBURY justly observed that Lord COLERIDGE'S remarks should of themselves be fatal to the existing Lunacy laws. The two great dangers of the system arise, as Lord SALISBURY says, from the cupidity of relations and from the rapacity of mad-doctors. With the former point we have already dealt. The latter ought not, of course, to be exaggerated. We have not the slightest doubt that most owners of private asylums are highly honourable men. But laws are, or ought to be, made on the assumption that every man is not always perfectly honest and upright. Otherwise they would not be required. The temptation to retard the recovery of rich, and therefore lucrative, patients cannot be overlooked, especially since, as Lord COLERIDGE observed, cures of lunatics do not, for obvious reasons, become notorious, and act as an advertisement. "Any "person," said Lord SALISBURY, in words which deserve to be remembered, "any person, no matter how deep an "interest he may have in shutting you up, has a right to "take any two doctors he can find, no matter how obscure, "and get an order to shut you up." Nor will the language in which Lord SALISBURY referred to the so-called security of inspection by the Lunacy Commissioners meet with less acceptance. "The older guardians of English "liberty," he said, "would have been startled had they been "told that a man's liberty was entirely dependent on the "vigilance of a department." Publicity is the great safeguard and the real remedy. The sort of investigation which was held in Mr. SCOTT'S case would probably satisfy every one. At present there is a vast deal too much of what may be called the hole-and-corner element. It may be very painful for the rest of the family that the insanity of one of its members should be generally known. But that is an infinitely smaller evil than the serious risk which certainly exists now of shutting up sane people in madhouses. A more ghastly fate can scarcely be imagined, nor could any more efficacious mode of making a man that which he is declared to have become be devised. Recent examples seem to show that escape from lunatic asylums is tolerably easy. But two wrongs do not make a right. The improper confinement of the sane is scarcely redeemed by the improper escape of the mad.

THE ANNEXATION OF SARAKHS.

LORD GRANVILLE and Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE are concerned but ignorant about Sarakhs. Their concern does them credit, but will, it is to be hoped, be converted into something more active. Their ignorance does not do them credit; but it would, perhaps, be over-sanguine to hope that the blind eye which has so long been turned in this particular direction will suddenly become a seeing one. The reported annexation of the place will surprise no one who has understood the history of the subject, or who apprehends the advantages which the deplorable mismanagement of Egypt by the present English Government has given to the enemies of England. But at the same time the report, and still more the fact if correctly reported, gives Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues yet another of the chances of which they have enjoyed so many, and thrown away all but one. It is pretty certain that Russia, on the eve of negotiating a great loan and especially desirous of quiet, is not at this moment inclined for war, and the annexation of Sarakhs, if not directly made a casus belli, would, in the hands of any capable Minister at the Foreign Office, be made, as probably nothing hereafter can be made, the occasion of a definite understanding as to the Southern frontier of Russia in Central Asia. It has been acknowledged by politicians of all shades in England, except the mere fanatics of non-intervention, that the question of delimitation between Asiatic Russia and Khorassan, no less than the question of delimitation between Asiatic Russia and Afghanistan, is one in which England must have a voice. And in both those questions (for it affects them both) there is no point of greater importance than the possession of Sarakhs. This has been admitted by the Duke of ARGYLL, who used to laugh Mervousness to scorn; it has been admitted over and over again by those who excused inaction in the matter of Russian advances through the desert; it is corroborated by the unanimous opinion of every military traveller, of every authority in military geography, who has visited or studied the region for years past.

The peculiar importance of Sarakhs does not lie in the fact of its being a very strong place, or being rich and populous, or being the headquarters of warlike tribes, for it is none of the three. It lies in the fact that whosoever possesses it, so to speak, gathers up in his hand all the routes to India from the North-West. With the preceding occupation of the Akhal Tekke country, the rectifications of the Persian frontier which have already been made, and the occupation of Merv, the annexation of Sarakhs makes Russia independent altogether of even the connivance of Persia at an Indian campaign, and enables her to extend the line of railway which already pierces the country east of the Caspian to the actual frontier of Afghanistan, from which Sarakhs itself is but a few miles distant and which its district touches. As arranged two or three years ago, the Russo-Persian frontier left a solid block of Persian territory more than a hundred miles long in the way of this communication; the Russian occupation of Sarakhs would do away partially, if not entirely, with that block, and give a straight road, all Russian, all passable easily, and the greater part of it well supplied, from the Caspian to the Afghan frontier. Not only this, but Sarakhs would give Russia a new and firmer hold on the most populous and fertile part of Khorassan, and would more than ever make Persia her vassal. The apologists of inaction in respect of Russian advance would find their last rugged mountain, their last thirsty desert, vanished. From Sarakhs to Herat is two days' journey for a not very expert tricyclist; five or six days' walk for a moderately well-girt man. There are no difficulties in the way whatever. At the same time, except as a basis for aggressive movements, the place is of no value to Russia, and there is no conceivable reason why she should occupy it except as such a basis. All beyond and round is Afghan or Persian, and the excuse of masterless tribes who molest Russian territory becomes inapplicable. If Russia is molested she can appeal to Teheran or to London; whereas, according to her own account, if she was molested from Akhal or from Merv she could appeal to nobody. For every reason, therefore, an English Ministry is entitled to have a voice in this alleged reconstruction of frontier, and if the present Ministry fails to make its voice heard, it can only be either that it has gagged itself by the exigencies of the Egyptian Conference, or that it is too half-hearted and too indifferent to care to speak at the proper pitch. Unfortunately the conduct of Ministers in the matter of Merv does not inspire very great confidence as to their conduct in this very much more important matter. Regrets, expressions of concern, hints that it is really too bad of Russia, hopes that there is more than one Sarakhs and that Russia may have taken the right one, and the like will do no good whatever. A distinct thus far and no further, with a clear intimation of the alternative, is the only course that can possibly be satisfactory in the end.

POLITICAL ORGANIZATION.

A SHORT time ago a question was raised in the House of Commons as to a circular sent round by the Chelsea Liberal Association to many voters in that borough suggesting that the expenses of the next election should not be borne by the candidates, but by the voluntary contributions of their supporters. This circular we herewith publish. It is marked, somewhat absurdly, "Private and confidential." Communications which are intended to be private and confidential are not lithographed and widely disseminated, nor are they sent to persons, as has happened in this case, whose political opinions, if known at all to the Chelsea Liberal Association, must be known to be those of sturdy Conservatives. The matter, too, has been already made public in Parliament. The proposal itself can only be regarded, as said in the circular, to be equally honourable to the members in question and to their constituents. It is a good and a pleasant thing to see even Radical brethren working together in unity, when the objects of their united action happen not to be mischievous to the country. The good understanding between givers and receivers in this case, and others like it, shown to exist is one which we should be glad to see commoner than it is. It is a plain proof that a candidate has the confidence of his supporters when they spontaneously offer to pay his expenses. We here publish the circular:—

Private and Confidential.

Offices of the Borough of Chelsea Liberal Association, 84 Gloucester Road, S W:
March 21st, 1884.

Dear Sir,—Immediately after the re-election of Sir Charles Dilke in January 1883, a proposal was made by one of the speakers at the great meeting in Kensington Town Hall, that at the next General Election the Liberals of Chelsea should return the Right Hon. Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Firth free of expense.

It was felt that such a recognition of their services would be as much an honour to the borough as a compliment to our representatives. Several gentlemen have already expressed their willingness to subscribe to a fund for this purpose.

Under the Corrupt Practices Act the election expenses for the two candidates would amount to about 2,700*l.*, and as it is quite possible that a General Election may take place at any time during the current year, preparations should be made without delay to establish the proposed fund.

This circular is therefore sent to secure your active support for the success of the project, and we trust you will kindly co-operate by allowing us to use your name as one of the Committee for the fund, and by filling up the enclosed form, and returning the same to the treasurers, so that your name may appear in the first list of subscriptions.

We are, dear sir,
Yours faithfully.

This communication is followed by the signatures of some forty persons more or less known in the borough of Chelsea. Now there are two things which we desire, when the next General Election comes, to see happen in that borough. First, that the gentlemen whose names are appended to the circular will pay the expenses of the candidates; because it is always pleasant to see such kindly things done. And, next, that the candidates themselves will be rejected. Of the two members for Chelsea, Sir CHARLES DILKE has made himself a name, notwithstanding youthful political indiscretions for which he was severely punished in the House of Commons by Mr. GLADSTONE, and to which we need not further refer, as an able and careful administrator; and has also won favour among many of all parties, who think the British Empire a matter of some importance (at least to Englishmen), by the suspicion which is held in some quarters that he is a Jingo in disguise. The other member, Mr. FIRTH, enjoys the advantage of being Sir CHARLES DILKE's colleague, and has the use of his influence. The Chelsea election, like the Birmingham election, is for these reasons so important that even an honourable defeat, even a considerably increased minority, would be almost equivalent in public opinion to a victory. Birmingham is under the charge of a Conservative candidate (also, like Sir CHARLES DILKE, not free from youthful indiscretions) who has gone a good way in winning over the "fierce democracy" to his side. The opponents of Radicalism in the birthplace of the Caucus are now alert and alive; but are they so, or are they so to anything like the same extent, in other parts of the country? Are they sufficiently appealing to, and using, the Conservative feeling which is rooted among the masses of the English people?

Let us, having taken Chelsea as our text, make one or two remarks, founded on inquiries which we have made on this subject. The Conservatives in that borough, the importance of which just now in electoral strategy is great, constantly receive notices to join Liberal Associations, to take part in Liberal gatherings, and not a few of them are honoured by lithographed invitations, in the handwriting of the leading member for the borough, to become a member of his Committee. We have nothing whatever to say against these measures, which in fact are as blameless as they are politic. No doubt some foolish Conservative fish have been caught in this net. No doubt many of the large class who are nothing in particular, as far as politics go, till they are urged and solicited and flattered, are led to give a vote where, if they thought twice, or had the opposite view fairly laid before them, they would have voted on the other side. But the fault in such cases lies with those who do not give them the opportunity of hearing more than one side to the question. Now it is believed that there are many persons in Chelsea of a Conservative frame of mind who suffer from chronic circularization at the hands of the Liberal Committee, but who never find out, except by accident, that there exists a corresponding organization among their own party. This is the more severely to be blamed because the Conservative party is responsible for our present enlarged constituencies. It is worse than folly first to enfranchise a large class only imperfectly informed on political questions, and then to leave the training and guidance of this class in the hands of opponents. What happens in the borough to which we have referred happens also in many parts of the country. A Conservative feeling exists; but no one is at hand to organize it, lead it, and make it effective. It is obvious, then, when the opposite party is organized on a popular basis, the Conservative party must put before itself one of two alternatives—either to do the same, or to fight its battle on an anti-popular basis. Now we are satisfied that neither Lord BEACONSFIELD, who gave to English Conservatism its new character, nor the present leaders of the party, have any desire to choose the latter alternative. We are equally satisfied that nobody who knows anything of the classes whom Lord BEACONSFIELD enfranchised can doubt that there exists among them plenty of Conservative feeling. Witness the artisan constituencies which persist in returning Tory members to Parliament. The difference between what is called the Caucus and those Conservative organizations which ought to be as active and alert in every constituency in the country as those of their antagonists lies far less in the form than in the spirit. One point to be insisted on is that the member of Parliament must be looked upon as a representative and not as a delegate; that he shall have reasonable freedom in all non-essential matters, and in these shall be entitled and expected to follow his own judgment. The evil of all careful organization is that it tends to cast opinion into one uniform mould, and often tends unduly to throw power into the hands of a single man or a single clique. But both evils can be avoided if they are kept clearly in sight in framing the organization, and if the principle of "give and take" is practically recognized in conducting it. The Liberal party has been beforehand in recognizing the force that lies in a good organization, and in one, if we may use the expression, that can be promptly mobilized. But they have made the mistake of so conducting it that men of honour and spirit more and more shrink from becoming its obedient servants. But a good cause ill organized will fail when a bad one well organized will win. It was once truly said by Mr. BRIGHT that a general election was not won or lost at the last minute; it was won or lost months before. This is precisely the fact that Conservatives must now keep steadily before their minds, if they wish to regain command of the government of the country, or even to exercise any usefully restraining influence on it.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

THE Republican Convention will meet at Chicago in June and the Democratic Convention in July. The preparations for a Presidential election have seldom caused so little excitement. The only political issue of importance, relating to the maintenance or modification of the tariff, is commonly evaded by the managers on both sides. A candidate who was supposed to favour revision would lose many votes; and it is not certain that he would obtain any countervailing advantage. As a rule, the Democratic party is the less hostile to Free-trade; but it has for some years past made no use of its majority in the House of Representatives to give effect to its convictions, and the MORRISON Bill for the reduction of that tariff has at last been rejected. It is indeed said that the movement will be continued in another form; but a majority formed from both parties is practically decisive. Some Democratic leaders in Massachusetts have lately summoned a meeting of the party to affirm the proposition that indirect taxation ought to be raised with exclusive regard to the interests of the revenue; but, unless public opinion in the State has greatly changed, the promoters of the movement will be accused of dividing the party. It is possible that a transverse schism may be caused by the nomination of General BUTLER as the Greenback candidate. If he had been re-elected as Governor, he would probably have received the votes of the Democratic section of his late constituents. The defeat which rendered him practically ineligible for the Presidency may perhaps not have alienated all his former supporters. The little party which has now selected him as leader has no considerable weight either in Massachusetts or in the Union. It would be the absurdest of all dishonest courses to repudiate the debt by discharging it in paper money created for the purpose, at a time when the greenback notes actually in circulation are at par, and when the chief financial difficulty of the Federal Treasury is to dispose of an enormous surplus revenue. Sooner or later the plethora of wealth will be relieved by a reduction of Customs duties and of internal taxes.

On the eve of a periodical trial of strength which is traditionally supposed to possess vital importance, controversy between the two great parties is almost wholly suspended. In the course of the summer the campaign, as it is called, will be conducted by itinerant orators who will probably find some material for their speeches; but at present the interest of the approaching nominations entirely predominates over solicitude for the final victory in September. The moderate excitement of the party contest survives from a time when great questions of policy depended on the Presidential election. The long list of Democratic Presidents which closed with Mr. BUCHANAN has for four-and-twenty years been followed by a succession of Republican administrators, with a social and political revolution interposed between the two series. The only Democratic candidate who has been elected since the Civil War was defrauded of the fruits of his success; but even in 1876 the wrongful accession of the Republican President had no permanent result. The distinction of parties has now become almost unmeaning, and when the Republicans are hereafter converted to sound economical doctrines, either the rival organizations will be dissolved, or some new ground of contest must be discovered. In the meantime party tactics and personal preferences tend to supersede differences of political opinion. The change which has taken place is perhaps not to be regretted. Party government, though it has hitherto been thought inseparable from representative systems, scarcely attains to ideal perfection. In England its operation has of late years been almost wholly mischievous; and the apparent decay of party conflict in the United States may not prove to be an unmixed evil. The inability of universal suffrage to dispense with professional managers seems to serve as a partial corrective of its dangerous tendencies. It is true that the modern English Caucus has been employed almost wholly for factious purposes, with the result of irritating and aggravating political animosities. The American "machine," as it is called, is worked in a more dispassionate spirit.

It is possible that, when the election approaches, the party leaders and orators may begin to extol the qualities of the nominees who will have been chosen. At the moment they scarcely think it worth while to praise their friends, or even to attack their opponents. The manipulation of enormous numbers of votes is a complicated operation, to be conducted only by technical and almost scientific methods.

Republican and Democratic journalists recommend the selection of delegates to State and National Conventions, and of nominees at Chicago, almost solely on the ground that their respective favourites will unite the party and command support more effectually than their competitors. Few foreigners succeed in comprehending the various considerations which ought to influence a choice. They only see that electors are urged to reject Mr. ARTHUR or Mr. BLAINE because, in the opinion of the speaker or writer, he will not be equally likely with some other candidate to secure the votes of the State of New York. Incidentally Mr. ARTHUR is accused of using the Federal patronage to promote his own candidature; and dark hints are thrown out as to Mr. BLAINE'S private history; but no serious stress is laid on such irrelevant disqualifications. It is generally admitted that Mr. ARTHUR, succeeding by accident to the Presidency, has discharged the duties of the office with credit and success; and the liberality and good taste with which he has performed his hospitable functions is not forgotten. Before the last election he was principally known as a skilful party manager or wire-puller. In concert with Mr. CONKLING, he was a principal supporter of General GRANT; and, when the attempt failed, he was rewarded for his services by election to the Vice-Presidency. It is not impossible that in the present contest he may have availed himself of the skill acquired by experience. While he has judiciously acquiesced in the laws which have been passed in late years for the reform of the Civil Service, the PRESIDENT has not failed to use for political purposes his large remaining patronage. He probably incurs little risk through the imputation that he has not discontinued the apportionment of the spoils to the victors. The impression that a candidate will, if he is elected, reward his supporters is not always detrimental to his prospects. Purists who hesitate to approve of such practices cannot but reflect that Mr. BLAINE, if he had been President, would have followed similar courses.

It is said that the Republicans in the Southern States will almost unanimously support Mr. ARTHUR; but at the date of the last accounts Mr. BLAINE commanded a majority of those delegates who had either received positive instructions or had publicly announced their own intentions. Mr. ARTHUR came next in order; and Mr. EDMUNDS was the only remaining candidate who had obtained any considerable support. It is well known that the preliminary preferences of the delegates often fail to indicate the result of the contest. In 1880 General GRANT began with a majority; and the names of General GARFIELD and Mr. ARTHUR, who were both active partisans of GRANT, had not been mentioned till the work of the Convention was far advanced. It is known that Mr. BLAINE will not be nominated on the first ballot; and in subsequent stages of the election delegates are at liberty to transfer their votes to the candidate of their second or third choice. The striking resemblance between the election of a Pope by the Cardinals in Conclave and the nomination of a party candidate for the American Presidency has often attracted notice. The vicissitudes, the surprises, and the prejudice against the most prominent aspirants are similar, because they proceed in some degree from the same causes. Mr. BLAINE'S turbulent and aggressive policy when he was Secretary of State under General GARFIELD may probably have rendered him popular with some classes of the community; but his removal by Mr. ARTHUR seemed to produce little feeling of regret. It is strange that Mr. BLAINE'S former rival, Mr. CONKLING, has never been mentioned as a candidate. If he takes any part in the present contest, he will probably use his influence in favour of Mr. ARTHUR; but conjectures made without intimate knowledge of the characters and mutual relations of American politicians can only be formed with hesitation. Mr. EDMUNDS, who seems to be a highly respectable candidate, may perhaps also be supported on the ground of his negative qualifications. He is not known as an active party leader, and he may therefore be less exposed to jealousy than Mr. ARTHUR and Mr. BLAINE. Mr. ROBERT LINCOLN has, in addition to his hereditary claims on the good will of the Republican party, held for two or three years the place of Secretary of War without discredit. Having been included in many lists as candidate for the Vice-Presidency, he may possibly be nominated for the higher office.

The Democratic managers have postponed their National Convention to July, and they seem disposed to defer the State Conventions as long as possible. Their object is probably to take advantage of any unpopular decision as to principles or persons when their antagonists have shown their hand at an earlier date. If Mr. ARTHUR should be nominated by the Republicans, the adverse party will take advantage of the prejudice against second terms of office; and Mr. BLAINE'S foreign policy would furnish just or plausible grounds of attack. If political managers in America were inconveniently sensitive, they might sometimes find themselves hampered during the Presidential contest by the opinions which they have expressed in a previous stage on the merits and prospects of candidates for nomination; but the ceremony with which a Convention usually concludes its labours accurately represents the policy and conduct of either party. As soon as a candidate has obtained the necessary majority, the Convention, on the motion of one of his former opponents, votes that the choice shall be unanimous. From that moment every member of the party is bound to vote for the nominee, and to repel on occasion any objection which may be made to his claims. The large section of the Republican party which now denies that it will be possible to secure the election of Mr. ARTHUR will, if he succeeds in the Convention, resent any future imputation on his merits. It will hardly be worth the while of Democratic orators to remind the opposite party of inconsistencies which may probably be common to both sides. Their own choice of a candidate will, perhaps, remain obscure till the eve of the Convention in July. Up to the present time Mr. TILDEN has been more often mentioned than any competitor. The pretensions of General HANCOCK, who was defeated at the last election, have not been revived. The party would, perhaps, gratify a natural feeling if it could elect the candidate who was defrauded of his rights in 1876. Mr. TILDEN himself, though he is advanced in life, is still vigorous and active, and his political opinions are believed to be moderate. Foolish and insincere charges against his personal character have not lately been repeated, probably because they produced no effect in the former contest. It may nevertheless be thought prudent to entrust the fortunes of the party to a younger candidate.

DEBATES ON THE ARMY.

THE House of Commons has been kindly patted on the back by superior persons for its good behaviour on Monday night. It agreed to a number of army votes without an altogether inordinate amount of talk. For this feat it is considered as entitled to much thanks. Whether the work was properly done, and the many difficulties that have still to be overcome before our army can be said to be in a decent condition were honestly faced, is apparently thought a matter of very minor importance. In view of the general character of debates on the army, this Christian disposition to be thankful for small mercies is at least pardonable. They all proceed on well-known lines. Every member who has a fad gives it an airing, and purely personal matters are discussed at length. Loose threads and slipped stitches are pointed out with care and precision. Something is said about the zeal of our officers and the native valour of Britons. In the course of the evening the SECRETARY of STATE for WAR shows himself open to persuasion that this or the other thing needs looking into, and promises to give it his best attention. The votes are agreed to, and progress is reported. Then the House turns to other business, after having talked about and settled everything except the essential. This was the result of the Committee's labours on Monday. It was employed for a good part of its time on a class of questions of which Mr. BIGGAR gave an excellent example. He wanted to know whether the War Office meant to do anything about the case of a major in the Antrim militia who planned a practical joke on somebody eleven years ago. This was a highly absurd example of the activity of members; but it differed mainly by being smaller and more Irish from Mr. DAWNAY'S long speech on the working of the Medical Department with the field force in the Egyptian campaign. It is, of course, of the first importance that field hospitals should be kept in a satisfactory state; and Parliament would be well employed in thoroughly investigating that part of what is called our army organization. But that was not what Mr. DAWNAY did. He confined himself to inquiring whether the doctors actually did or did not neglect their duty. Now that question has been adequately sifted by a Committee already. We know, and have known for some time, that the blame for the failure of the Medical Department in Egypt rests on the red-tape and stupidity of the War Office. The names of the officers were only brought in because a certain reforming General thought it consistent with sound discipline to scold his subordinates for not disobeying the orders of the War Office. It is the common fate of discussions on army questions to be frittered away into wrangles as to the good or bad behaviour of A., B., or C. in this fashion.

This way of doing the work of the nation is so convenient when difficulties are great and the only possible remedy is disagreeable, that we are not likely to see the last of it under the present dispensation. What the real condition of the army is we can learn from the complacent statements of apologists. It contrives to get along without absolutely disappearing. Since Lord HARTINGTON corrected the mistake of Mr. CHILDERS, who in the innocence of his heart tried to get grown men for the ranks, recruits have begun to come in again. Thirty-three thousand have been enrolled last year, and their sufficiency is proved by the fact that only a minority of our soldiers are less than five feet four inches high and thirty-three inches round the chest. Lord HARTINGTON'S timely measure has therefore saved the army. Thanks to it, we have to submit to nothing worse than "the "skeleton battalions, diminutive youths, and the other in- "cidental blemishes," as the Times calls them, with which we are already familiar. According to our modest standard, that is enough; and all is well as long as the skeleton battalions do not tumble into disjointed fragments of bone. Mr. O. MORGAN is prepared to show that fewer crimes are committed by soldiers—at least, there have been fewer courts-martial and fewer charges of drunkenness. We need not inquire—indeed, as the necessary information is withheld, inquiry would be useless—whether this apparent improvement is not largely due to the discouragement of courts-martial by the Horse Guards. It may, however, well be the case that an army largely recruited by weakly boys is comparatively free from violent offences. Neither is a more sparing use of the court-martial necessarily a sign of weaker discipline. If the colonel of a battalion is armed with power to inflict summary punishment and uses it, a trial can well be dispensed with in the case of many small pieces of misconduct. But all this parade of the thirty-three thousand recruits—mostly under five feet four—and of the improvement in the moral tone of the army is beside the question. Even if men enough to fill the ranks are coming forward, and they do desert or get drunk less, it does not follow that the army is in a satisfactory state. It is tolerably certain for one thing that more than thirty-three thousand men must be found if the force is to be kept at its proper strength without sacrificing the first reserve. Fifty thousand would be nearer the number required. Then the still more important question of quality is left out of sight in the midst of all this jungle of statistics. What should be steadily kept in view is whether this country is adequately defended by a home army of "skeleton battalions" filled by "diminutive youths," and covered all over with "incidental blemishes," as they are impudently called. That, however, is just the one consideration which is habitually burked in the House of Commons.

The Reserves are as feebly handled as the standing army. There was some talk last Monday of a general discussion to be held on the condition of the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers. Matter to discuss is certainly not wanting; but, if it is to be treated after the example set at the end of the debate on Monday, it would be a distinct saving of time to leave the whole thing alone. A number of questions were asked then, and answered in the traditional style of the War Office. Several members pointed out that there is a growing difficulty in getting, not only men, but even officers, for the Militia. The usual explanation was forthcoming. In a fit of cheeseparing economy the bounty formerly given has been first reduced and then cut off. The Government, having to hire its men in the market, thought it wise and businesslike to refuse to pay. When his attention is called to the inevitable result, the SECRETARY can only say that he will see, he will look into it, and perhaps something may be done, but that he is not prepared to propose any vote at present. The Volunteers are disposed of in the same fashion. After years of steady work, undertaken from pure desire to do something useful, the force has been brought by its own exertions, and in spite of the neglect of the War Office, into a decent state of efficiency. As it has given these guarantees of its solidity and good will, there would seem to be plausible reasons for treating it as if it formed a serious part of the defences of the country. What really is done is to leave it without a single field-piece, with no organized medical service, no commissariat, and no transport. It is armed with the antiquated weapon, commonly known as the gas-pipe, a good enough rifle in its day, but nearly as much out of date as the Brown Bess. Most of the men have no great-coats, the regimental depôts, as far as there are any, are commonly out of the regiment's district, practical musketry drill is sacrificed to "pot-"hunting," and when the men get any camp practice, a large part of the necessary expense is thrown on the officers. Nobody, not even Lord HARTINGTON, denies these things, but he, in common with his predecessors, does not think it any part of the duty of a responsible Minister to try and remedy them. He falls back on the stock formulas. He will look into it; there are many things to be remedied, and perhaps something may be done, but he is not prepared to propose a vote. In the long run we always come back to the difficulty of proposing a vote. It is, from the point of view of a sensible Minister, incomparably better to spend sixteen millions on an inefficient force than seventeen on a good one. A Secretary of State for War may have recourse to all sorts of makeshifts; he may fill the ranks with boys to feed the Reserve, and deplete the Reserve to keep the army from vanishing; he may neglect the Militia, and leave the Volunteers a mass of disorganized, ill-armed men; but he must not ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to add to the Budget. The fault does not rest wholly, or even mainly, with the Minister. After all, he must please the House and keep a watchful eye on the constituencies. The House shares his notions of army management; and, as the constituencies are too busy about their affairs to get into a panic, and are conscious, moreover, that we have just beaten OSMAN DIGNA, the army can be left to rub along. When forty battalions or so of the home army have not a man to show among them except the officers, and we are suddenly called upon to take part in a big war, then perhaps we shall set seriously to work. The awkward thing is that it will be a little late.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

WHATEVER may be his talents in other respects, Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has one power developed to an unusual extent, that of getting himself talked about; and what is more remarkable, he succeeds in getting himself talked about seriously. Now we are far from asserting that he is not an able man; on the contrary, it is clear that he is possessed of abilities of a high order. Why, then, does he delight in stirring up strife? Why cannot he wait patiently till his turn comes in the natural course of events to be one of the leaders of his party? The only unfriendly answer possible to these questions is that he must distrust his own cleverness, and that he fears that, unless he blows his own trumpet both often and loud, he will be passed over and forgotten. It may be that he has not solidity enough to stand the test of genuine political work, and he is most clearly wanting in elementary tact. But still it may be urged on the other hand that, in spite of the brilliancy of the exterior, there are sufficient sound mental and moral qualities to make him of use to his party in the future; and it may possibly be found, to the annoyance of those Radicals who have exulted in his frowardness, that he himself is of the same opinion.

Disagreement amongst those who ought to work together in harmony is always unpleasant, and it becomes particularly so when it is made the theme of public discussion. The present incident has been not less unpleasant than is usual in such cases; but it is not easy to see why so much importance has been attached to it, except for the love of scandal. In such cases as this, too, exaggerated implications, if not unfounded assertions, are certain to find their place in the mass of correspondence which grows up around the original difficulty. But there is one thing that seemed clear amongst the tangle of insignificant statements and counter-statements which have formed the correspondence of the last few days—namely, that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has been fighting a battle for himself, for his own personal aims, and for the satisfaction of his own individual ambition. This need not by any means imply that he has not, in a general way, and perhaps even ardently, desired the success of his party. But his own success has been always nearer to his heart. It was scarcely conceivable that a man with any true conception of party loyalty could have published such a letter as appeared on Wednesday, or written such a letter to his leader as was indiscreetly printed beneath it. And, although it would be unfair to accuse him of wilful misstatement, yet to the ordinary reader there are certainly some passages in the first letter (which he did intend for the public) which would give a false impression of the facts without the second letter (which he did not expect the public to see). His indignation is very great, for instance, when he is accused of having called the National Union of Conservatives a caucus; but in the letter to Lord SALISBURY he carefully describes it by that name. Again, he states that the letter to Lord SALISBURY (which need not be characterized) was approved by a majority of the Council; whereas it now appears that the letter was only communicated to the Council after it had been sent, and that it was minuted in order that the correspondence might be preserved for future discussion. If, however, there could be any doubt after the publication of these letters that the smooth working of the party had been forgotten by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, it would be demonstrated by the fact that the immediate occasion of his resignation was the adoption by the Council of the National Union of Conservatives of a resolution recommending harmony of action between that body and the Central Committee. This harmony, which until Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL took his unlucky part in the concerns of the Union had always existed, must again be re-established if the party is to deserve success.

The simple question at issue is, as far as the Conservative public is concerned, Is a dual control to be permitted? Lord SALISBURY and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, as is well known, work with absolute singleness of purpose and perfect agreement; but is Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, who agrees with neither, to be allowed to rule also? The very suggestion of the thing is ludicrous. No man in his senses could dream that such a method of carrying on any organization, however simple, was possible; much less such a method of working such a complicated machinery as that of a party. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL may be Prime Minister some day—we hope, at any rate, that he will live to use his undoubted talents in the service of his country—but this will not be done by such ways as have been referred to. His presence at the latest party meeting may be construed as a sign that he knows this.

THE DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER RESOLUTION.

THE assailants of the law of marriage are probably less satisfied with their majority of Tuesday, large as it was, than it has been in some quarters supposed that they ought to be. They failed by a very large margin to muster the imposing array of supporters on which they had announced that they could count; and the narrow limits within which cross-voting was confined made the majority little more than a party one. It may, or may not be, practically advantageous to those who desire an alteration in the law that their pet question should become simply a trial of strength between the two political parties; but, in such a case as the present, it is certainly not favourable to argumentative or moral victory. In fact, the argument for license has rarely been more weakly supported than was the case in this debate. The appearance of Mr. BROADHURST in the character of champion rather emphasized than obscured what all students of the question know to be the real history of the matter, that the agitation originally and unsuccessfully got up by a few wealthy law-breakers has enlisted on its side, first, the sectarian dislike of some religious bodies to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England, and, secondly, the vague modern crotchet that the legislation of the past has, in some nefarious way, been generally directed to suit the convenience of the rich and obstruct the convenience of the poor. Mr. CLARKE'S rather unexpected appearance in the character of a sentimental defender of deceased wives' sisters, Mr. HENEAGE'S disquisition on the importance of Mahomedan opinion as to the constitution and usages of the family, certainly had no influence on many votes besides those of the ingenious members themselves. Mr. FOWLER'S hatred of the Church of England, Mr. BROADHURST'S no doubt genuine belief that every working-man is dying to marry his deceased wife's sister, and is prevented by a wicked conspiracy of bishops and dukes, must have been the influencing arguments, if argument had any influence at all, with the supporters of the Resolution.

On the other hand, there occurred in, or in connexion with, the debate certain things not a little damaging to the case of the deceased wife's sister's friends. The loudly-expressed desire to go no further in licensing marriages of affinity than the deceased wife's sister contrasted awkwardly with Mr. THOMASSON'S intended, though not actually moved, extension to deceased husbands' brothers, an extension to which, and to others, as has been repeatedly shown, the same arguments can be applied as to the actual case. It must, moreover, have struck more than one reader or hearer of the debate as somewhat inconsistent that, while the word was apparently passed to throw the blame of the present law on the "sacerdotalism" of the Church of England, the dispensing practice of the Church of Rome (which has not generally been considered less "sacerdotal" than her Anglican sister) was triumphantly pleaded against the law. And, lastly, to dismiss an incident which practically has no direct effect, and is not likely to have much indirect effect, on the fate of the question, the whole debate showed more clearly than ever what is the real motive of the innovators. Leviticus, statistics, the house accommodation of the poor, the wrongs of guiltless infants, and the charitable tolerance of those societies in which, Mr. CLARKE tells us, deceased wives' sisters are received as without a stain upon their character—all were mere covers and afterthoughts to the main plea that certain people, more or fewer, want to marry their wives' sisters, and that it is a great shame not to let them. Mr. BROADHURST'S eighteen thousand aspirants to the hands of their brothers-in-law, Mr. HENEAGE'S Mahomedan standard of family life, Mr. CLARKE'S sugared quotations from Lord TENNYSON, Mr. FOWLER'S admiration of the princes of the blood and detestation of a clerical caste, and Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN'S picturesque, but not precisely original, account of the circumstances in which the Churches of Rome and England parted company, all come to this. "Thou shalt "not" is a very disagreeable formula to the natural man, and the natural man would much rather get rid of it. No doubt he would; and the inclination is by no means confined to the case of deceased wives' sisters. What the Parliament of England and the people of England have to consider is whether it is either right or wise to admit as a sufficient reason for the abolishing of a law divine or human, or both, the facts that some people have broken it, and would like to be relieved of the consequences; that other people are quite determined to break it, but are good enough to prefer that it should be abolished; that others are very much inclined to break it, and will be uncomfortable if they are not allowed; and that others, again, break it daily, and may just as well be purged of their contempt whether they will or no. This is the real, genuine, unadulterated case for the measure; and, if it is a bad one, it is certainly not made better by sectarian denunciations of sacerdotalism, or by attempts to convince the poor that they, as poor, are suffering a grievance of some sort at the hands of the rich.

THE PARKS.

A RUNNING fire of debate, newspaper controversy, and cross-examination has gone on all the week as to the Parks. It goes near to be thought that Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE has played tricks with Hyde Park Corner. If the Railway Bill passes, the other corner by the Marble Arch will have far worse tricks played with it. The exclusive character of some Park roads is a sore subject with the Radical reformer who does not see that to make the Parks more common than they are already will be to ruin them as parks. An intelligent American is said to have complained that Hyde Park was too wild, but that was before the reign of the present CHIEF COMMISSIONER. There is very little wildness left now, and the eastern and southern sides are laid out in the trimmest of trim gardens, with labels attached to the shrubs. Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON repudiates Sir ROBERT PEEL'S charges against the Royal Academy, and Sir ROBERT PEEL reiterates them. The Committee on the Parks Railway Bill sits daily, and has so far taken a good deal of not very disinterested evidence in favour of the Bill, and a little against it. The strongest argument put forward was that the British workman residing in the northern suburbs will save ten minutes on his journey to Westminster when the Parks' route is open to him. There are many ways by which the British workman may save ten minutes at less cost to the general public; but it is not clearly proved that in this case there are any workmen concerned. Mr. LEFEVRE has received a deputation of riders on tricycles who desire admission to the Parks. It is evident Mr. LEFEVRE would accede to this modest request if he could do so without admitting bicycles as well. The two kinds of "cycles" are, it seems, on a totally different footing, but make the same claims to have the rights accorded to hackney cabs. Finally, a question has been asked in the House of Commons as to a chimney-pot, or "cowled monk," which forms at present the crowning and most conspicuous ornament of the arch on Constitution Hill. We may notice this matter first.

Mr. LOWTHER, in bringing forward the question, added another as to whether Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE had received any petition from the Royal Academy protesting against the position of this conspicuous chimney-pot as "a violation of every principle of propriety and canon of good taste." Mr. LEFEVRE, in reply, asserted, what most people knew before, that the chimney-pot had been in the same place for forty years past; but he omitted to say that it is owing to his own mistake in removing an arch designed for one situation and placing it in another that the ornament in question becomes visible. Mr. LOWTHER'S mention of the Academicians Mr. LEFEVRE took very seriously, on the obvious ground that Mr. LOWTHER did not mean it seriously. But, though the incident terminated here as far as the House of Commons is concerned, the controversy between Sir ROBERT PEEL and Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON is continued. Sir FREDERICK denies that he ever thought a bust by Mr. BELT worthy of ancient Greece; and Sir ROBERT rejoins by quoting a letter from Mr. BELT, in which it is positively stated. Mr. BELT vaguely adds "others" to the PRESIDENT as describing his PAGLIATI bust, before they knew he had executed it, to be worthy of PHIDIAS. It is to be hoped in the interests of the public that Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON will not reply to Sir ROBERT PEEL again. There is nothing but wrangling to be obtained by this sort of controversy. It does not affect the Parks at all. Any one who understood classical architecture, or knew the works of DECIMUS BURTON, or the principles by which he was guided, could have told Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE that to remove the arch down the hill and to turn it half round would mar its effect. Mr. LEFEVRE would probably have refused such counsel, but that has nothing to do with the question. On Thursday evening the Duke of RUTLAND and Lord DE ROS made a vain appeal to the Government to reconsider their decision as to the removal of the statue to Aldershot, and, in all probability, it will go there before long.

Meanwhile, neither Sir ROBERT PEEL nor the President of the Royal Academy seems to concern himself about the Railway Bill. Here the moving power appears, from the evidence given before the Committee on Monday, to be a permanent official of the Office of Works, Mr. MITFORD. How far he is also responsible for the muddle at Hyde Park Corner we cannot tell; but he it is, as he says himself, who suggested the route from the Marble Arch to Albert Gate. The original proposal was to make a railway from the Marble Arch to Hyde Park Corner. The reasons against this course were obvious, even to Mr. MITFORD; but, instead of letting the matter drop, he must needs do a little amateur engineering on his own account, and propose the Albert Gate scheme, of which he is evidently very proud. The local opposition to the Bill is very strong. All Edgware Road seems to be against it. The evidence in favour of the scheme is very weak. Of course on Tuesday Mr. BELL and Mr. FENTON, who are railway managers, warmly approved of it. They are entirely within their province, but Mr. MITFORD'S position as a designer and promoter of railways is by no means so clear. This is just where the chief of a department should and can best interfere. But Mr. MITFORD'S chief is Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE.

SEA-FISHING.

THE catching of fish is a pastime so attractive to the people of these islands, and the opportunities for its exercise in our inland waters so limited, that it seems a little strange that the wide and inexhaustible region of pleasure which the sea affords should have been hitherto so little explored. Year by year the pursuit of what is supposed to be the finer art of freshwater fishing is becoming more restricted, and subject to conditions which place it beyond the reach of any but the wealthy. The Thames has still its votaries, and it must be reckoned as a wonderful proof of the resources of that noble stream that it should still continue to yield something. Without undervaluing these simpler delights, for to the true angler every kind of fishing is good when better cannot be had, we are tempted to ask why it is that the pursuit of fish at sea is so much neglected, and even judged to be an inferior art. Here is an open water which it is impossible to over-fish, which needs no preserving, which is ever well stocked. In all the elements of sport, the sea is at least equal to the loch or the river. The incidental delights are more various, the excitement certainly not less; while there is just a spice of danger to give zest to the pursuit. The dancing waves, the open sky, the wider panorama of land and water, are no bad exchange for the purling stream, the hanging trees, the enamelled meadow. It is supposed to be only a base mind which reckons the "bag" an item in the estimate of the sport; yet to many sea-fishing will have this recommendation over river-fishing, that the creatures taken have a certain edible and commercial value. The true angler is believed to be superior to this feeling; yet we may fairly doubt whether, if the salmon were as worthless a fish for the table as the barbel, we should esteem his capture so highly. Always excepting the salmon, which is really a sea-fish, with whom sweet water is only a passing domestic necessity, there are but few fish in the river which for their own sake are worth catching. In the sea the worthless ones are the exception. The abundance of species, the variety of forms, and the uncertainty as to what you may bring up are other elements peculiar to sea-fishing which the conventional angler, the classic Waltonian, misses. When you go trouting, you catch trout (sometimes); and when you go gudgeoning, you catch gudgeon, making no account of a chance perchling or dace. But there is no telling what creature may take your hook at the bottom of the sea, or your fish as he ascends to the surface. The original capture may be either whiting or gurnard, and what comes up may suffer a sea change on the journey, and win blessing or curse by proving dory or dog-fish. Finally, to those who can contain their stomachs in a "lop," sea-fishing includes, in addition to angling, a good deal of what is most adventurous in yachting.

As for art, those who visited the Fisheries Exhibition of last year might have observed the great variety of devices for the catching of sea-fish, not only by those who pursue the trade, but those for whom Mr. Wilcocks writes The Sea Fisherman. That valuable work, which we are glad to see in a fourth and much improved edition (London: Longmans. 1884), is a witness at once to the neglect with which this branch of angling has been treated, and the great advance it has made in late years. While angling proper has a whole literature to itself, sea-fishing has only its Wilcocks. The book is unique, and the only bibliography it admits is a comparison of editions. This is a fact which, though highly flattering to the author, is scarcely creditable to a nation which possesses in its circumjacent seas the most magnificent fishing-ground in the world—a field of art of which the potentialities are only bounded by the enterprise of the insidious shrimper and the intrusive trawler. This fourth edition of Mr. Wilcocks's book has been enlarged and improved; and if it is scarcely yet equal to its great subject, it is because the march of art in sea-fishing has even outstripped the teaching of its earliest apostle and only authority. While we have a great deal of practical information as to tackle and boat gear and all the coarser ways of taking fish, the defects which were conspicuous in the former editions are still to be noted in this. The first and most irritating is in respect to the clumsy arrangement by which the chapters are made to run into one another, dissertations on bait being mixed up with fishing adventures and the kinds and ways of fish in a manner most distracting to the reader. It is true there is an index; but, as the book is said to have been rewritten, it is a pity the matter was not re-cast, into some kind of order. The instructions given are such as are evidently derived from a long and zealous pursuit of sea-fishing as an amusement, and all that relates to boatmanship, the choice of fishing-grounds, the taking of marks, and the making of the various kinds of sea-tackle is of great value, and conveyed in a simple, seamanlike fashion. In regard to the matter of the instruction our only complaint is that Mr. Wilcocks hardly seems to attach sufficient importance to the improvements which have been recently made in the art of which he was the first teacher, especially in the substitution of artificial for natural lines, and in the various refinements, both in trolling or "whipping" and bottom-fishing, for which we are indebted to the ingenuity of the West-country anglers, in this branch of the art at the head of the world. Our author is a little old-fashioned, and slow to admit the value of the modern devices. Yet it is these which have given quite a new character to the art, and are rapidly revolutionizing the practice of the sea-fisherman. Half of the charm of angling lies in the successful deluding of the fish by means which at first sight appear disproportionate to the end to be achieved. Any one can catch fish in the sea—the art is to catch fish in the greatest number, under unlikely conditions, and with the least expenditure of power. Sea-fish being more numerous, more greedy, and more accessible than river-fish, are more easily taken by coarse tackle; but more will be taken, and the pleasure of taking them will be greater, in proportion as the lines, the hooks, and the lures are finer. No one would catch a salmon with a worm who could catch one with an artificial fly. Why should we not therefore pay the same compliment to the mackerel and the pollack as we do to their kinsmen in fresh water? It is a mistake to suppose that sea-fish are less particular or more stupid than river-fish. Other things being equal, fine tackle will kill better than centre at sea. The amateur, provided with his Plymouth line, his Manchester shooding, his gut tackle, and his artificial spinner, may be backed to catch more mackerel in a day than any professional. No one can deny that it is pleasanter to use the artificial than the natural baits even at sea. The best of these latter are troublesome to handle, and not seldom difficult to get, while some of the sea-worms recommended by Mr. Wilcocks are slimy, malodorous, and have a gruesome hairiness of leg. Sand-eels, which our author greatly affects, are only of partial distribution—like pilchards, the best of all fish-bait for bottom-fishing. Squid is unattractive, and mussel unsatisfactory. This matter of bait is a very important one in sea-fishing, and at once the chief source of trouble to the amateur as well as the main impediment to sport. Often it is more difficult to catch the bait than the fish. It is here that the watering-place boatman, always the most ignorant of fishermen, has the visitor in his power. As to feeling in the crevices of rocks for the spider-crab, or turning over flat stones for the "varm or sea tape-worm," or saving the long gut of the pilchard, that is a detail to which some may object. These are the concomitants of the sport, fondly dwelt upon by professionals, which are the opprobrium of sea-fishing. They are not necessary, and it should be the province of the artist to show how they may be avoided.

To move upward, working out the worm and the fish-gut, this is the course which sea-fishing should take if it is to be developed into an art. If Mr. Wilcocks has a fault it is that he stands too much in the ancient ways, and makes too little account of the refinements introduced by the skilled tackle-makers who made so brave a show at South Kensington. The extent to which artificial lures can be used in sea-fishing is of course limited, though the tendency is to advance on the finer lines—to eschew hemp where cotton can be used, to discard gimp and thread for gut, to reduce the weight of sinkers, and to substitute metal spinners, flies, and "babies" for squid, fish, and worm. There are, as we need not inform those who have fished at sea, two, or rather three, chief ways of catching sea-fish. The first is at anchor, when whiting, bream, haddock, and in the late summer mackerel, are the quarry sought, at the bottom or in mid-water. Here the tackle should be as fine as is consistent with the strength of the current and the size of the fish expected, with a sinker not heavier than is absolutely necessary, and in proportion to the weight of the line. The best kind of "rig" for all ground-fish is that which Mr. Wilcocks describes as the Kentish, which is a modification of the familiar "chop-sticks," if there is still water or little current. If there is a tideway, then the boat-shaped lead, with a gut trace with two or three hooks dependent, is to be preferred. The second method of fishing is also at anchor, but with a drift-line without sinkers, for bass or pollack. If either of these two ways are adopted, of course natural bait must be used, as the lure is stationary, and the fish would be able to detect an artificial one. The third and by far the most sporting method of taking fish at sea is from a boat in motion, either under sail or oars. This admits of artificial bait being used exclusively, and is called "whiffing" when pursued in a sailing-boat for mackerel, and trailing or trolling when the boat is rowed. The latter is the process adopted for the capture of bass or pollack, and it is perhaps that branch of sport which admits of the greatest variety and interest, seeing that it can be followed in smooth water and almost in any weather, provided there is shelter and the ground is fit. The tackle for this kind of sport should be of the finest consistent with strength; for fish of very large size may be looked for, which are stronger than salmon of the same weight. Mr. Wilcocks's instructions for the amateur under this head scarcely seem up to the latest science. There can be no doubt whatever that more fish will be caught with artificial bait when pollacking, either with the grey eel, Brooks's "baited baby," or sole-skin flies, than with the living sandeel or rag-worm—not to speak of the pleasure and triumph of deluding the fish by the finer art. As for rods, they are out of place in a boat, and as illegitimate at sea as hand-fishing would be on a river. They are useful only on the rare occasions when a shoal of bass are playing on the surface, or for casting from a rock among breakers in deep water. Fly-fishing at sea is, however, an epicene kind of sport, seldom to be had, for which no especial instructions are needed. The real art of the sea-fisherman consists, even more than that of the angler on shore, first, in knowing the ways of fish and their kinds; next, in using the finest tackle. The rest is mainly boatmanship, which cannot be taught by book.

THE CONSOLATION OF NEWSPAPERS.

BOETHIUS De Consolatione is a work of which every one has heard, and (of course) which most people have read. Most people have read everything of which every one has heard, despite the rumours which have been spread as to a slight difficulty felt by the public at the private view of the Royal Academy as to the subject of the President's chief picture this year. But Boethius (as every one will remember) omits to notice one remarkable and fertile source and form of consolation—that derived from the newspapers. There are people who hold that the newspapers are the root of all evil, which if it be so, there must certainly be truth in homœopathy. For instance, it would be a very painful thing for you to listen to a speech at a meeting of the Liberation Society. But when, without trouble, and without incurring the danger of evil communications, a man can quietly read at his breakfast-table how Mr. Stansfeld takes credit to the Liberation Society for having "abolished the word toleration," great is his delight, if he has any sense of humour. The right honourable advocate of free-trade in the streets is perfectly right. The Liberation Society has abolished the word toleration, at least as far as it is itself concerned, and a very pretty achievement for a soi-disant Society of Christian men that is. The Society cannot tolerate the Church, and it announces that it won't be tolerated by the Church. Such is the charity, such the meekness, of the political Dissenter. And we could not have known this, except, as hinted above, at a cost far too great to pay, without the newspaper; and yet too many of us sneer at that newspaper. This is not just.

But the pleasure derivable from those documents of which a modern writer has said in his haste that "the newspaper press does more harm than the invention of printing has ever done good" is by no means limited to this instance. A newspaper may, by a person in an optimist frame of mind, be described as a great engine for the condensation of boredom. For instance, it would, no doubt, not have been nearly so painful to spend an afternoon on Tuesday in the House of Commons as to spend an afternoon or evening on Wednesday with the Liberationists; the same society would have been in part present, but it would have been tempered and allayed. But still, five hours of discussion over a Franchise Bill which one side is not honest enough to avow that it cares nothing about, and the other side not strong enough to deposit in its proper waste-paper basket, could hardly be very cheerful to any one whose duty did not call him there. Faint and few are the relieving incidents on such occasions, and their zest is almost lost in the ocean of hypocrisy and twaddle. But in a newspaper report of reasonable fulness the tolerably practised eye can take the whole thing in in a few minutes, and appreciate all the pleasant jests, which show even in the dullest debate that humanity is never more human than in the House of Commons. The said eye runs lightly over fifty or sixty lines of insignificant print (alas! the ear cannot similarly run over five or six hundred or thousand words of insignificant utterance), and fixes at once on Mr. Gladstone protesting his inexpressible impatience to begin redistribution. Redistribution is "desirable, and even urgent"; the Government have "a hearty wish and a full intention" to redistribute without loss of time. Yet somehow, though a couple of clauses and as many schedules added to the Bill would do this urgent and desirable business, would gratify this hearty wish and give effect to this full intention, the Government cannot somehow see their way to do it. They are dying for redistribution, but somehow they think it would be well just to wait a little before redistributing. How dreadful, for instance (it is Mr. Gladstone who speaks again), would it be "if the labour of the House upon the Franchise Bill should be lost until the enactment of a Re-distribution Bill!" Mr. Gladstone shudders at the thought, and yet the same thought surely suggests that the best possible way of preventing such a terrible thing would be to make the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill one. Mr. Gladstone doesn't see that at all; in fact, if some former passages were forgotten, it might seem that the very idea had never occurred to him, and that he would bless the man who proposed it. Then in the paper we jump over Mr. Warton (which we could not have done without breach of privilege in the House), and another consolation turns up in Mr. Labouchere. Mr. Labouchere, who appears to have sot the entire force of a not inconsiderable intellect and a very ingenious fancy to the task of reducing Radicalism ad absurdum, is ready to do anything for Mr. Gladstone if he will only have nothing to do with any amendments at all. The House of Commons is a place of discussion; discussion is impossible without amendments, and Mr. Labouchere wishes all amendments, Liberal or Tory, friendly or hostile, limiting or extending, to be summarily burked. This is freedom, this is. Then we take another and longer skip, and come once more to Mr. Gladstone. Even Mr. Gladstone has not often surpassed his profound and final, because incomprehensible, explanation of what is meant by a distinction between borough and county franchise. "That distinction," said Mr. Gladstone, "does not rest so much on what the franchise is which qualifies the man as on what the man himself is." Somebody said "Hear; hear!" to this, and indeed it is not obvious what else could be said, if anything could be said at all. Any other response would require a short treatise de ente hominis. We are not sure, however, that some one ought not to have got up and moved for a return of answers to the question "What are you?" addressed to every existing and, under the Bill, future voter. There is, if we mistake not, a tract in existence entitled "What am I?" and perhaps it might help such of the new voters as can read to answer the inquiry. From metaphysics, a column or two of the Times being overleapt, Mr. Gladstone passed to pleasantry, and "hoped Mr. Lowther would not again entertain the House with his own personal history, and with references to the gallant manner in which he had at all times maintained his principles." Now if this is not a pretty good joke from Mr. Gladstone, who entertains the House ("engages its rapt attention" is the usual phrase of the party summary-writers next day) about once a week with selections from his personal history, demonstrations of the great moral worth of all parties to which he has belonged, and so forth, it is difficult to say what a pretty good joke is. And yet it might have been dearly bought by personal attendance on several hours of a debate on the word "uniform," which, interpreted by the laws of common sense, can refer only to the uniform desire of the Government to remain in office.

So much for Franchise Bills—a subject of unquestioned dryness, in reference to which, as we have shown, these hours of dull debate can be condensed into minutes of excellent political comedy. But there is no need to stop here. Who, save a few persons who have access to political news and the personal friends of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Macliver, would have known, but for the newspapers, the delightful opinion of the Prime Minister about "free comment"? The Plymouth Liberal Association wrote to communicate the usual resolution which, though we have not seen it, no doubt said the usual things, in the usual way (as per hektograph), and Mr. Gladstone acknowledged it per private secretary. "These proceedings of the Opposition respecting Votes of Censure may," Mr. Gladstone thinks, "become the subject of free comment during the debate next week." Now the phrase "free comment" is of itself, as has been said, delightful. It suggests that other charming form of speech common in the mouths of the feminine members of the lower classes—"a few words"—it being in both cases perfectly well known what sort of comment and what sort of words are referred to. And observe, too, that Mr. Gladstone apparently objects to Votes of Censure as Votes of Censure. According to this pleasing doctrine, an Opposition would seem to have the right to bring in one Vote of Censure per Session (or is it per Parliament?), and when that is defeated the Government ought to be bothered no more. The defeat of a Vote of Censure on the past is equivalent to a vote of indemnity for the future; and, if a fresh blunder or crime causes fresh protest, the protest, and not the question whether there is reason for it, is to be the subject of free comment. So does an old offender in court occasionally consider it a subject for free comment (or even for boots) that he should be troubled with fresh inquiries into his misdeeds.

One more instance of the recreation and consolation to be found in that much-reviled product of this so-called nineteenth century, the newspaper, and we have done. "M. Ferry," says a paper before us, "may be ignorant of many things, but he is not quite so stupid as to imagine that the majority in the House [of Commons] is not proof against any number of telegrams from Khartoum. There may be some score who will refuse to vote that black is white; but, if Mr. Gladstone speaks them fair, they will not carry their opposition beyond abstention." Now this citation does not come from our own irreverent columns, or from those of the St. James's Gazette, or from those of the Times, still less from those of any party organ of the Opposition; it comes from the Pall Mall. And let nobody say that the Pall Mall, having taken a leading part in supporting General Gordon's mission, is bound to be angry at his abandonment. That is so; but it is not all the fact or half the fun. Here is a Liberal, not to say a Radical, newspaper, the Radical-Liberalism of which has never recently been impeached, roundly charging the Radical-Liberal majority of a Radical-Liberal Parliament with being proof against any number of facts and perfectly ready to vote black white at a Radical-Liberal Minister's bidding. If this is not, to adopt a highly picturesque and expressive comparison, "more fun than a barrel of monkeys," we do not know what is. Somebody said that a true joke was no joke, but he was wrong. What the Pall Mall Gazette says is perfectly true, and it is an admirable joke—that is, if attention, as was explained on a former occasion, be kept strictly to the jocular side of the question. And perhaps that was what the ancient who made the remark about the "sooth bourd," after all, meant.

Such are a very few consolations of newspaper reading derived from the newspapers of a few hours, and applied under the adverse circumstances of bad news from abroad and a Gladstonian Administration at home (which two things are indeed one), and a Franchise Bill, and stormy weather, and a multitude of Exhibitions, and the Liberation Society, and the Deceased Wife's Sister, and the news that the vintage has been knocked about yet another year in France by those abominable ill-tempered saints whom Master Francis mentions, the saints who preside over hail, frost, rain, and other unpleasant atmospheric phenomena. They might have been multiplied many times, and they are accessible to anybody. Therefore let no one speak evil of newspapers unless he is not a laughing animal, or, which is the same thing, unless he is a sincere admirer of Mr. Gladstone. For this last luckless class there is, indeed, but little consolation, except in very carefully chosen periodicals, and in them only by sticking closely to the division lists and the leading articles. A moment's rashness of "cross-reading," of straying into speeches or paragraphs, and there is no knowing what the fervent Gladstonian may come upon. The only consolation for him is, that he is probably too much of a Gladstonian to have any eyes to see what he does come upon.

BOSSUET.

BOSSUET—"the last of the Fathers," as he has been styled by a pardonable anachronism, which, however, forgets Butler, not to mention others—is so conspicuous a figure both in literary and ecclesiastical history, and is so confessedly the typical representative and spokesman of the grandest epoch of the old Gallican Church, that it is not surprising to find an elaborate paper devoted to him in the Quarterly Review. How far the writer's treatment of his theme can be considered felicitious will appear in the sequel, and meanwhile it is rather strange to find in the long list of works enumerated in the heading no mention made of Mrs. Sidney Lear's Bossuet and his Contemporaries, reviewed some years ago in our columns. That he won his chief reputation as an orator, a controversialist, and a churchman may be allowed, but it is a little odd to be informed in limine that "the least appropriate aspect in which he can be viewed is that of a man of letters," especially when we had been told only on the previous page that any impeachment on the greatness of Bossuet would naturally appear to a Frenchman as sacrilegious as it would to an Englishman to impugn the fame "of our nearly contemporary Milton." For it is obviously only as being both literary men that any analogy can be traced between the two. Nor does the reason given for this strange verdict add much to its plausibility. If Bossuet always or generally wrote "for an immediate practical purpose," Cardinal Newman—if our memory serves us—has somewhere made a very similar statement about his own writings; yet the reviewer, we presume, would hardly venture to dispute his Eminence's claim to a high place among "men of letters," though he, like Bossuet, has written "as a doctor of the Church." In truth such an arbitrary canon as this judgment implies would make sad havoc of many illustrious literary reputations. Of Bossuet's encyclopædic, if somewhat undigested, learning, which seems to have embraced almost the entire circle of knowledge attainable in his day, with the solitary exception of mathematics, for which he had a distaste, the reviewer says next to nothing. He is right however in premising that Bossuet was eminently the child of his age and country, and that accordingly some acquaintance with the circumstances of his life is essential to an intelligent appreciation of his political and religious principles. And the following passage supplies on the whole a fair summary of the salient points to be kept in mind:—

> It is important to remember that France was then but slowly recovering from the disastrous effects of the civil war of the League, the object of which had been to extirpate the Huguenot party, and force both the Crown and the Church into unqualified submission to the Papal See. Nor must we overlook that in his own youth, through the senseless wars of the Fronde, Bossuet himself saw his country once more convulsed and the Crown humiliated; while across the water he watched the English rebellion running its turbulent and fatal course, and shaking the thrones of Europe with amazement and terror. Both his hereditary prepossessions, then, and the experiences of his youth, combined to foster in his mind the sentiment of absolute submission to the Crown as the only secure centre of national unity, and to root in him two invincible and life long aversions; on one side, to the reformed doctrines, which seemed in every nation where they found a footing to be a standing source of discord and weakness; on the other, to the encroaching policy of the Popes, which menaced the royal prerogative, and thrust upon the Gallican Church a foreign and unconstitutional jurisdiction.

It should be recorded to his honour that from earliest youth Bossuet was irreproachable in morals, at a period when unfortunately an ecclesiastical status, and even the highest dignities of the Church, afforded no sure guarantee for correctness of conduct. He had already as a boy of sixteen given promise of his oratorical powers, when called upon at a few minutes' notice—a wager being laid on his success—to preach before a gay party assembled at midnight at the Hôtel de Rambouillet, and not long afterwards the Bishop of Lisieux made him preach before a graver assemblage, of bishops and learned men, among whom was the famous De Rancé, who has left on record the impression produced by his discourse. He was forty-two when he delivered his great funeral oration on Henrietta Maria, the widow of Charles I., and about the same time he was appointed tutor to the Dauphin, an office he discharged for ten years with unwearied and conscientious diligence, but without gaining the affections or exercising much influence over the mind of a not very responsive pupil. It led however to his composing his Politics and Discourse on Universal History, on which Mr. Buckle has pronounced a verdict at least as narrow and one-sided as the work he so angrily condemns.

In 1680, at the age of 53, Bossuet became Bishop of Meaux, having previously held and resigned the less important see of Condom. He retained Meaux to his death in 1704, but throughout that quarter of a century—as was said of a late English bishop of a suffragan See—he was really the virtual primate of the national Church. The reviewer discusses his policy with special reference to three burning questions of the day in France, the Gallican Liberties, the treatment of the Huguenots, and Quietism. There is too much unfortunately in his conduct of the two last affairs over which his warmest admirers must desire to cast a veil. On his handling of the quarrel with Rome opinions are apt to differ a good deal according to the theological standpoint of his critic, and the Quarterly reviewer betrays throughout too marked an animus to be an impartial or discriminating guide on such matters. We may have a word to say on the subject further on. Let it suffice here to note that the first of the famous four Gallican articles, framed by Bossuet, solemnly repudiates all civil or temporal jurisdiction of the Pope, and therefore condemns the deposing power; the second reaffirms the decrees of "the holy Œcumenical Council of Constance," subjecting the Pope in spiritual causes to a General Council; the third limits his jurisdiction by the ancient canons of the Church and recognized national usages; the fourth declares his judgment "in matters of faith" to be subject to the consent of the Church. In the Protestant controversy Bossuet took a prominent part, and both his Exposition of the Catholic Faith and his well-known Variations of the Protestant Churches not only achieved a splendid literary success, but produced immediate results of a directly religious kind. It must be regretted, though in view of the conditions of his age it is hardly to be wondered at, that he was not content to confine himself to such legitimate methods of theological warfare; but whether or not he was directly responsible for the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, his own language forbids us to doubt that the measure had his hearty approval, though not the violence which followed on it. No doubt he could plead the excuse of his biographer that his error was shared by all the great men and public bodies of the kingdom, and indeed by the whole of France, not to say of Europe. He insists himself indeed justly enough in the Variations that the repression of religious error by the secular arm was a principle on which Catholics and Protestants were agreed, and that he knew of two Christian sects only that denied it, the Socinians and Anabaptists; he might have added that their doctrine of toleration was probably prompted rather by weakness than by conviction, and that the Anabaptists at all events had shown little disposition to abide by it when they had the upper hand. Some allowance must also be made for the peculiar circumstances of France in his own day, already noticed, which led the great majority of Frenchmen to identify patriotism with zealous maintenance of the established faith, and it is just to remember that he was gentle and conciliatory in dealing with Protestants in his own diocese. But still in a man of Bossuet's commanding genius these excuses cannot be accepted as more than partial, especially when we recollect the very different line adopted by his contemporary and brother prelate, the saintly Fénelon, who positively refused to comply with the King's desire that he should preach to the Huguenots, unless the soldiers were first withdrawn, observing that by the military method of proselytism they might doubtless bring flocks of converts to communion, whose conversion however would be worse than worthless. It is not pleasant to find Bossuet, on the other hand, in a funeral discourse on the Chancellor Le Tellier, who with his dying hand had affixed the great seal to the fatal edict, after which he said Nunc dimittis, lauding to the skies "the piety of Louis," as a new Constantine, Theodosius, Marcian, and Charlemagne, who "had confirmed the faith and exterminated the heretics." And the mention of Fénelon recalls a still more questionable episode in the career of "the Eagle of Meaux." It is not quite fair to say with Mr. Lecky that, when "the question of the disinterestedness of the love we should bear to God was agitated in the Catholic Church, Bossuet took the selfish and Fénelon the unselfish side." Most impartial judges of every religious school will be disposed to endorse the judgment of the Quarterly reviewer here, that, on the main issue at stake, Bossuet was substantially in the right; "the doctrine of pure love, with its apparent consequences . . . was too refined for common use. As Bossuet observed, it mistook earth for heaven, and exile for home." And Mme. Guyon, who, if a devout, was also a very foolish and flighty woman—whom St. Paul certainly would not have "suffered to teach"—insisted on preaching her doctrine, in season and out of season, "for common use." Still nothing can excuse the tyrannical cruelty of her treatment at Bossuet's urgent suggestion, or his ready credulity in listening to the silly slanders against her moral character. And far more deeply discreditable was his conduct throughout the whole business towards Fénelon, though less disgraceful than that of his worthless kinsman, "the little nephew of a great uncle," whom he employed as his emissary at Rome to bully the Pope into compliance with the dictates of the French Court, and for whose appointment to a bishopric he did not cease scheming to the last, though it was not granted till twelve years after his death. If the controversy exhibited the ignominious and undisguised humiliation of the Court of Rome, under the arrogant and imperious dictation of "the elder son of the Church," it is also too true that "the worst side of Bossuet's character was drawn out by the strife."

It is pleasanter to turn to his threefold celebrity as an orator, a controversialist, and a great ecclesiastical statesman. On the first point there is little new to be said; perhaps there is something rather stilted and grandiose about his eloquence at times, though the reviewer seems to us hardly to do it justice. Meanwhile it is interesting to learn that he did not, like Massillon, Bourdaloue, and the great French preachers of the day generally, write his discourses in full and learn them by heart, but drew up outlines and notes, to be filled up in delivery, special parts only being written out, as is—we believe—the general custom of great speakers, whether on sacred or secular themes. To enter on a detailed criticism of Bossuet's controversial position would be very like entering on a discussion of the controversy between Rome and Protestantism, and that would be obviously out of place here. It would be difficult perhaps to state the case, as it stood in the seventeenth century, between the rival creeds more effectively than Bossuet has done from his own point of view; to say that he does not meet scientific, historical, and other difficulties which at that day nobody dreamed of, is no disparagement to his acuteness, though it may make much of his argument obsolete. But after all Bossuet was greatest as an ecclesiastical statesman, and the reviewer's estimate of him in that capacity is perceptibly not appreciated. He maintains, if we rightly understand him, that Bossuet's Gallicanism was rendered "illogical" and almost absurd by his adhesion to the See of Rome as the divine centre of unity. "To the marrow he was a Catholic, according to his understanding of Catholicism; and that understanding involved a view of the Papacy which is radically inconsistent with his other principles. From the tradition of the Church he dared not recede; and that tradition assigned to the occupant of St. Peter's Chair an impregnable foundation for the very autocracy against which Bossuet so vigorously protested." That is of course the ultramontane reading of Church history, but to assume it is to assume the very point in dispute, not in Bossuet's day only, but for several centuries, between the rival parties in the Church. Gallicanism, in much the same sense as he understood it, had already been a moot point for more than two centuries, ever since the great Council of Constance, and its advocates argued, with at least as much plausibility as their opponents, that it represented "the traditions of the Church" in a far more remote and venerable antiquity. It is quite legitimate again for Anglican controversialists to contend—though the contention is not essential to the Anglican position—that "between Ultramontane servitudes and Anglican independence the Gallican Liberties were an illogical halting-place," but to assume this as a self-evident truism, in a paper not professedly controversial but critical, is to decide offhand a controversy bristling with disputed points, historical and theological, of which the writer betrays no inkling, and to condemn offhand a long line of illustrious Churchmen and divines, to whose names he makes no reference. His one argument has at least the merit of an exquisite simplicity; "the brand of heresy has been stamped upon it (Gallicanism) by the Vatican [Council], and within the entire obedience of Rome, Ultramontanism has triumphed and reigns supreme." As a statement of present fact, this would have been truer ten years ago than now; as a prophecy—and to serve the purpose of the argument it must include a forecast of the future—it is still more open to dispute; but we care not to intrude on Dr. Cumming's vacant throne. Whatever may or may not come to pass hereafter, it is sufficiently "illogical"—to adopt the reviewer's own chosen term—to infer that Bossuet's position as formulated in 1682 was untenable, because two centuries afterwards it was "branded with heresy" by a very questionable vote—questionable, we mean, in the manner of extorting it, for with its abstract justice we are not concerned—of a skilfully drilled assembly, passed under strong coercion, and in the teeth of the vigorous protests of all the leading spokesmen of that same hierarchy of which Bossuet was once the acknowledged leader. There is more force in the reviewer's comment on the "imperious and resolute immobility of thought" which distinguished him from Pascal, but the comparison of two men, of perhaps equal genius but utterly unlike in every other respect, is scarcely a happy one. Bossuet was not, and never claimed to be, a philosopher, as neither was Pascal an orator or a statesman. To say that words of Pascal survive which still speak to the hearts of all men, while "no one now takes practical account of" the writings of Bossuet, is much like saying that Locke is still read, while "no one now takes practical account of" the political theories of Burke. Philosophy, if it is good for any time, must be good for all times; politics, polemics, and preaching necessarily vary from age to age. It is true that the horizon of Bossuet was limited, and that "human intelligence, in its progress, has outwitted him." Will the reviewer tell us how many there have been of the greatest intellects the world has seen—and we are not prepared to elevate Bossuet to that supreme distinction—of whom the same might not as justly be affirmed?

MILKING TELEGRAMS.

THE action brought by the Central News Agency against the Eastern Telegraph Company, the Exchange Telegraph Company, Sir James Anderson, and Mr. Benjamin Smith, has disclosed a very interesting and a very diversified story. It is almost an illustration of Quidquid agunt homines. It is a narrative of adventure, of pluck, of enterprise, of despatch—nay, of more despatches than one. There is in it a spice of romance, and if the evidence for the plaintiffs had been true, there would have been in it a good deal more than a spice of fraud. The glories of the Special Correspondent have been celebrated by many pens, not least frequently or least eloquently by his own. The profession can never, from the nature of the case, lack a sacred bard. Its members would not be doing their duty if they did not describe in more or less highly-coloured language their own performances. Nevertheless it is impossible to read the testimony of Mr. Burleigh in the present case, which was given with perfect simplicity and an entire absence of ostentation, without feeling some pride at the spirit displayed by Englishmen in this, as in every other walk of life. Mr. Burleigh was sent out to Egypt by the Central News. He was with Lord Wolseley's forces when the assault upon Arabi's position was made, and he was present at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. He accompanied the Royal Irish, thinking, he says, that they were sure to be well to the fore. They were, and so was Mr. Burleigh. Looking about him with perfect coolness under fire he saw what happened, and galloped off with the information to telegraph home. It may be as well before going further to consider what Mr. Burleigh had done. He had secured for himself, and, as he thought, consequently for his employers, the earliest intelligence of an event, in which not this country only, but the whole of Europe, was deeply interested. Whatever may be thought of the policy which led to Tel-el-Kebir, it is impossible to doubt that the anxiety for news of it was eager and intense. By his own courage and sagacity, Mr. Burleigh was enabled to send an account of it before any one else, and within a very short space of time indeed. He was a long way ahead of the official telegram. The engagement was fought at daybreak; and at a time variously estimated, but at all events early in the morning, Mr. Burleigh's message was despatched. Yet it was not the first to be published in this country. The earliest account of Tel-el-Kebir actually printed in England was described as having been received by the Exchange Telegraph Company, which had not only no Correspondent at the front, but no Correspondent in Egypt at all. The question how this came about is what the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury have been engaged in investigating. Few more serious issues have come before a court of justice in our time. In one sense, of course, it does not matter to the public who sends the news, so long as the news comes. One man was as competent as another to say that Arabi's army, or rabble, had been crushed at Tel-el-Kebir. The picturesque details were of far less consequence than the bare fact. But it is competition which ensures that early and authentic intelligence shall be received. A monopolist cares nothing for the public interest, either in journalism or anything else. Competition, again, to be effective, must be fair. What the Central News complained of was that the contents of their telegram had been deliberately intercepted and stolen by unscrupulous rivals.

The way in which the Central News put its case was this. It is a Company formed for the purpose of supplying the public through the Press with information on all matters of interest at home and abroad. In pursuance of that object, it sent Mr. Burleigh to Egypt. The Exchange Telegraph Company is an association of a similar kind, which had, however, no Correspondent in Egypt. One of the Directors, if not the principal Director, of the Exchange Telegraph Company was, in the autumn of 1882, Sir James Anderson. Sir James Anderson was also Managing Director of the Eastern Telegraph Company, by which all telegraphic messages from Egypt were necessarily sent. The chief officer of the Telegraph Company at Alexandria was Mr. Benjamin Smith. Telegrams from the interior of Egypt passed through Alexandria, and Mr. Smith had access to their contents. It was his practice to read them, and to inform Sir James Anderson in England of what he read. For this purpose a system of "service messages" was established which had precedence over all others. "Diocles" was the name by which the Exchange Company was known in the offices of the Eastern Telegraph, and "Expedite messages to Diocles" was printed up in the offices of the latter association. On the arrival of Mr. Burleigh's telegram at Alexandria, Mr. Benjamin Smith forthwith made himself acquainted with it, and telegraphed it to Sir James Anderson. While this service message was being sent, Mr. Burleigh's message was detained, and thus the Exchange Telegraph Company, of which Sir James Anderson was Managing Director, obtained the earliest information of the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. Such was the plain story told by the witnesses for the plaintiffs, and it hung remarkably well together. The Central News has itself passed through the fire of hostile criticism, and did not in the opinion of purists in such matters come out altogether unscathed. Its habit of "expanding" telegrams might, perhaps, be defended as equally legitimate with the opposite practice of compression, so freely and beneficially applied to the Parliamentary and other speeches of able orators. Something, again, must be filled in at the office, and it has been contended that to draw the line at stops and particles is pedantic and narrow-minded. However that may be, the present case is altogether different. It was no question of exaggerating simple facts, of colouring prosaic narratives, and putting inferences drawn at home in place of assertions made on the spot. The charge here was one of moral, if not of legal, theft. Even the wise could scarcely call it conveying. A graver accusation has seldom been made against businessmen. The public had obviously the strongest interest in seeing the case sifted to the bottom. We are all more or less at the mercy of these news agencies. We rely on their integrity, or we should not care to read what they publish. But the sort of tricks which the Exchange Telegraph Company has been accused of playing are enough to destroy all confidence in those who could stoop to them. There is no room for dispute here as to the degree or amount in or to which plagiarism is admissible, if it be discreetly and artistically perpetrated. The wholesale appropriation of valuable news collected by the labour and capital of another to that other's direct detriment is conduct which cannot be "glozed with a text," or explained in a periphrasis. Honourable men have only one word for it, and that word is both short and disagreeable. Whether Mr. Burleigh was justified in obtaining evidence against the defendants by bribing one of their servants may be questionable, but is perhaps scarcely relevant.

It is, of course, absurd to measure the damages which a plaintiff has received by the amount specified in his statement of claim. The two have often no sort of relation. But the ten thousand pounds demanded by the Central News would scarcely have been excessive if they had made out their case. The action is interesting, if on no other ground because it is believed to be the first of the kind which has ever been brought. The plaintiffs had consequently some difficulty in shaping their claim so as to avoid being met at the outset by some legal objection which could not be got over. They said that the defendants promised to convey all messages entrusted to them with secrecy and speed, and that they broke their contract in both respects. But in any case they said that the Exchange Company had enjoyed the advantage of Mr. Burleigh's telegram, and was therefore liable to pay for it. They further charged conspiracy, but the Chief Justice ruled that there was no evidence of it. It is obvious that for the purposes of the case there was very little real distinction to be drawn between the two Companies with which Sir James Anderson was connected. It was essential to the argument of the Central News that they acted in concert, or rather collusion, with the intention and result of fraudulently benefiting the Exchange Company at the expense of the Central News. The suspicion of the Central News that its messages were being tampered with was first excited in a curious way. One Atti Hassan had been hanged for the murder of two Englishmen in the riots which preceded the bombardment of Alexandria. The Central News described the cutting down of his body by natives, who were said to have buried it in the tomb of a holy Sheikh. The story was contradicted in a country paper, and the Central News telegraphed to Alexandria to make further inquiry. The telegram elicited a repetition and confirmation of the account; but it also had other consequences, of a still more interesting character to the Central News. For scarcely had the inquiry been sent when the Exchange Telegraph Company published a statement, as from Alexandria, that the story was true. No explanation of this strange coincidence could be obtained by the Central News, but the charge of fraud has been definitely withdrawn. Questions asked about the announcement of the victory at Tel-el-Kebir did, indeed, meet with a prompt response. The Exchange Company, it was said, had a Correspondent at the seat of military operations, and he had been so fortunate as to anticipate Mr. Burleigh. Mr. Burleigh, however, being communicated with, denied the existence of any such Correspondent; and the Central News failed to procure either his name or a copy of his message.

There is an old saying, which is often illustrated, that one story is true until another is told. The defence of the Eastern Telegraph Company was no less curious and interesting than the plaintiff's case. They did not deny that the news of the battle which they sent to the Exchange Company was taken from a telegram sent over their wires. But they said that that telegram was not Mr. Burleigh's. This would of course be a complete answer to the action brought by the Central News. It would scarcely in itself absolve the Eastern Telegraph Company from the unpleasant imputation of betraying its customers by tampering with their messages. The Company, it should in fairness be said, went much further than that. They did not merely allege that the Central News was not the party aggrieved. They contended that they derived their knowledge from a public source, and that therefore no injury was done to any one. In this view they were supported by the Lord Chief Justice, who took from the first a very strong, some might say an unjudicially strong, line in favour of the defendants. In Lord Coleridge's opinion the case was settled by the evidence of Sir Charles Wilson, who had charge of the Intelligence Department in Egypt during the campaign. Sir Charles Wilson telegraphed news of the battle to Sir Edward Malet at Alexandria, and it is from that message that the Eastern Telegraph Company professed to have derived their information. Mr. Benjamin Smith admitted that, as soon as he saw Sir Charles Wilson's telegram, he at once forwarded its contents to Sir James Anderson, whom he knew only as Managing Director of the Eastern Telegraph Company, and not as connected with the Exchange Company. Sir Charles Wilson's message Mr. Smith regarded as public property, inasmuch as it contained news of universal interest, and as Sir Edward Malet, immediately after receiving it, posted it up in the Ramleh Palace. To explain the resemblance between Mr. Burleigh's telegram and that published by the Exchange Company, Sir Charles Wilson was called, and he said that in his official capacity he had authority to read all telegrams, and had, no doubt, read Mr. Burleigh's, though he had previously heard of the engagement from another source. Mr. Benjamin Smith stoutly denied that he had delayed Mr. Burleigh's message, explaining that it would have reached its destination earlier if Mr. Burleigh had been less copious, or if he had sent the facts first, and his comments on them afterwards. Examination certainly shows greater similarity between the Exchange Company and Sir Charles Wilson than between Mr. Burleigh and the Exchange Company. Neither Sir Charles Wilson nor Sir Edward Malet appears to have felt any objection to the divulging of Sir Charles's telegram. Lord Coleridge took the very unusual and somewhat irregular course of reading a letter from Sir Charles Wilson in explanation of his evidence, and threatened to adjourn the trial for Sir Edward Malet's attendance, if Sir Edward's correspondence with Mr. Smith was objected to. He thus did everything in his power to assist the defendants.

But they did not require much help. The simple explanation which they offered really disposed of the whole case, though they would have done better to offer it before they came into court. The plaintiff's counsel had to recede from a great portion of their own contention, and to admit that one of their principal witnesses was perjured. The jury found that the Exchange Company's message was taken from Sir Charles Wilson's, and that Mr. Burleigh's telegram had been neither appropriated nor delayed by the defendants. Thus the charge of fraud legally breaks down. It appears that the Central News telegram, if it was milked at all, was milked through the medium of Sir Charles Wilson's, and this, it seems, is legal. Whether it is not only legal but satisfactory is a further question.

MR. HENRY IRVING'S AMERICAN TOUR.

OF the three distinguished Englishmen who set out to invade the United States of America in the early autumn of last year, Lord Coleridge made the shortest stay and was the first to come back; Mr. Matthew Arnold lingered longer, and was delivered of three lectures, and returned home laden with spoil; Mr. Henry Irving paid the longest visit, and travelled the furthest, and was the last to set sail for England. In one sense, at least, the visit of Mr. Irving was more important than the visits of Lord Coleridge and of Mr. Matthew Arnold. The Lord Chief Justice of England and one of the best of English critics went to the United States alone, and they represented themselves only. But Mr. Irving was accompanied by Miss Ellen Terry and by the whole of the fine and strong company of the Lyceum Theatre, with the noble scenery and elaborate properties which we are accustomed to see at the London theatre which Mr. Irving directs with so much shrewdness and with so high an artistic aim. The visit of the Lyceum Theatre company, headed by Miss Terry and Mr. Irving, was thus more representative than the visit of the other English celebrities which preceded or accompanied it. The performances given in America by the Lyceum Theatre company have been fairly representative of the best that England has to offer in the way of theatrical entertainment. It is pleasant to know that these performances have been abundantly successful from a pecuniary point of view, and that their many artistic qualities have been frankly and fully recognized by the American playgoing public.

As good evidence as one could wish of the hearty welcome and prompt success of Mr. Irving, Miss Terry, and the Lyceum company generally is to be found in the fact that the route of the company had to be rearranged so that a return visit could be paid to the principal cities. The first performances were of course given in New York, and from New York the company went to Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago; and in all these cities a second engagement had to be made at the sacrifice of promised performances in smaller towns. Neither Hamlet nor Much Ado about Nothing was acted during the original engagement in New York, the four weeks of which were taken up with The Bells, Charles I., The Lyons Mail, The Belle's Stratagem, Louis XI., and The Merchant of Venice. It was in Philadelphia that Mr. Irving first acted Hamlet in America, and it was in Boston that Mr. Irving and Miss Terry gave their first performances in America in Much Ado about Nothing. These two plays were reserved for the second engagement in New York, but such was the immediate and lasting success of Much Ado about Nothing that Hamlet, although repeatedly announced and as often postponed, was finally abandoned, and Mr. Irving left the United States without having had an opportunity of acting Hamlet in the chief city of the New World. There can be no stronger proof of success than this, except the announcement that Miss Terry, Mr. Irving, and the Lyceum company return to America next autumn for another seven months' tour of the United States. There are even rumours afloat that Mr. Irving contemplates the erection of a theatre in New York, and that he may hereafter divide his year between England and America. All English travellers in the United States bear witness to the warmth of their welcome at the hands of the Americans; and it is a rare thing when a traveller has experienced this warm welcome once that he does not long to repeat the experiment. Terrapin and canvas-backs and gumbo are enticing delicacies; and there is perhaps some magic quality in the sparkling water of the Croton Aqueduct in New York, as in the plashing stream of the Trevi Fountain in Rome, to which legend assigns the property of bringing back to taste again and again all who have tasted once. Qui a bu, boira.

It is at once amusing and instructive to notice how the American critics passed through the same phases of opinion in regard to Mr. Henry Irving as an actor—from doubt to ardent admiration—which we have seen in the English critics. In London the process of conversion from hostility to respect has sometimes seemed slow and laborious as Mr. Irving appeared in one part after another. In New York the operation was of necessity very much more rapid from the circumstances of the case, play following play in quick succession, and giving no time for adverse opinion to solidify into prejudice. There were doubts after Mr. Irving's first appearance in New York, which was in The Bells. These doubts were not wholly and altogether removed after his performance of his next part, Charles I. But they slowly resolved themselves away as The Lyons Mail and Louis XI. followed. It was in these two plays that Mr. Irving made his most pronounced success personally and as an actor in the United States. And of these two plays Louis XI. has plainly been the more popular, in spite of its lugubrious thinness, because it affords the actor most striking opportunities, of which he avails himself to the utmost; indeed, we incline to the opinion that it is in this play that Mr. Irving has had his moments of highest achievement in the United States. The popularity of Louis XI. is the more remarkable in that Miss Ellen Terry does not appear in it. In The Lyons Mail, in the dual character of the Good Man and the Bad Man, Mr. Irving achieved a success second only to his success in Louis XI. The only objection we have heard urged against this double performance was to the effect that Mr. Irving's Good Man was so good, so very, very good, that he is altogether too good for this earth, and that, therefore, it is a great artistic blemish to remedy the judicial error, and to spare Lesurques's life when there was so excellent an opportunity of getting rid of him for ever.

In spite of the personal success of Mr. Irving in The Lyons Mail and in Louis XI., and in spite of his lesser success in The Bells and in The Belle's Stratagem, there has been expressed now and again a feeling of regret that he should waste his ingenuity and his high histrionic intelligence on plays of so little significance and of so little value. It is really in the two Shakspearian plays which Mr. Irving produced in New York, in The Merchant of Venice and in Much Ado about Nothing, that Mr. Irving's extraordinary skill as a manager and as a stage-manager has been seen to its fullest advantage. The Merchant of Venice has not been acted of late in New York, save by Mr. Edwin Booth and the strolling company which has lent him inadequate support. The symmetrical and artistic presentment of the play at the Star Theatre by the Lyceum company received instant and ample appreciation at the hands of the public. Even in the best days of Mr. Booth's theatre The Merchant of Venice had not been put on the stage in better style, and of a certainty it had not then been better acted in its minor parts, all of direct importance and significance in Shakspeare's comedy. It was at Booth's Theatre, too, that the most recent performances were given in New York of Much Ado about Nothing; but, in spite of the vigour and grace of Mr. Booth's Benedick—more robust and more of a roysterer than Mr. Irving's presentation of the character—the earlier production was less effective than the later, because Mr. Irving's company is stronger and more varied than was Mr. Booth's, and more especially because there is in Mr. Irving's company a most charming and winsome representative of Beatrice in the person of Miss Ellen Terry. It is in the fine and rich performance of these two plays—The Merchant of Venice and Much Ado about Nothing—as we have already said, that the press and public of New York, and indeed of the other chief cities of the United States, have seen the highest achievement of Mr. Irving as a manager; and it is with the greatest interest, therefore, that they look forward to the representation of a third Shakspearian comedy by the Lyceum company. Mr. Irving has already announced his intention of producing Twelfth Night during his forthcoming season in London, with Miss Ellen Terry as Viola, and with Mr. Irving himself as Malvolio. After the performances of Twelfth Night at the Lyceum Theatre here the scenery and costumes and properties will be sent to America, that the play may be produced there with the same completeness which characterizes all Mr. Irving's revivals in his own theatre. Since the death of Adelaide Neilson the only Viola before the American public has been Mme. Modjeska, whose representation of the part, highly interesting as it was, and highly intelligent as are all the performances of this delightful actress, was, however, quite as un-English and as un-Shakespearian as Signor Salvini's performance of Hamlet. As Malvolio no actor has made any mark of late years, and Mr. Irving's performance of a character rich in unconscious comedy may be anticipated with a pure joy.

The second American tour of Mr. Irving, Miss Terry, and the Lyceum company will begin at Quebec on the last day of September next. The company will appear in Boston for three weeks in October, and again for two weeks in February. It will act in Philadelphia for a fortnight in December, and for a week again in February. And it will appear in New York for four weeks in November, and again for four weeks in March.

ARCHÆOLOGY AT CAMBRIDGE.

THE festival which was celebrated last Tuesday at Cambridge may be truly said to mark an epoch in the history of one of our two greatest Universities. Even in these days of short memories, many who witnessed the opening of the new branch of the Fitzwilliam Museum must have recalled with wonder the spirit which hardly a generation ago would have made such a celebration impossible. It is true that learning, and the dignity of the scholar's life, have never failed to be recognized at Cambridge; but the conception of learning was till a recent time pitiably narrow, when compared with the broad ideas of those who shaped the modern University system of Germany. Still, all intellectual culture has a natural tendency to expand itself. A man who works sincerely even on narrow lines finds, as he gets on in his work, that he lacks something which others have acquired, and which he himself has failed to learn. And he finds that in order to supplement what is wanting in himself he has to go to men whose opinions and associations are widely different from his own. All real thought and study tend to get broader. The objects of all thought and study are so interlaced that no one branch of knowledge can grow far without crossing another. So long as the spirit of investigation is alive, however limited it may at first be in its range, it is certain to move on from one subject to another, and to grow by what it feeds on. There is still undoubtedly much to be done in order to make the studies prosecuted in the older Universities as catholic as we should wish them to be. But it is no longer the case that, in order to find competent instruction in many important branches of knowledge, the English student is forced to leave his native country and to acquire a foreign language. There is still much to be bettered among us, in this respect, as those who have done most to widen the range of our studies are often saying. One still opens a German Universitäts-Calendar with a feeling of envy at the manifold opportunities which are offered to the young German of acquiring knowledge of every kind, and, which is not less important, of acquiring it first from one eminent teacher, then from another who perhaps views his subject from a wholly different standpoint, and then again from a third. When once the full significance of this latter aspect of the question is understood we shall assuredly see a change in the habits of University life in this country. As it is, many who have passed through Oxford and Cambridge go abroad and spend a year or two at one or more foreign schools of learning, and do so with the greatest advantage. But want of means and the necessity to begin at once the bread-winning work of life make this impossible for the majority of students. Still the movement in England is all in the forward direction, and no more striking evidence of it could be found than in the opening of the new adjunct to the Fitzwilliam Museum last Tuesday.

The new building lies near to, and behind, Peterhouse and the Fitzwilliam. The space at the disposal of the architect, Mr. Basil Champneys, was limited, and did not admit of the effect which he has attained in other buildings in Cambridge; but he has made the best and most practical use of it. Beside the lecture-room, in which the opening ceremony was held, stand, on the one hand, the museum of classical and, on the other, that of general archæology. In the former are collected casts of the most important remains of Greek and Roman plastic art now scattered among the many galleries of Europe, including some of the most important of those recently discovered. It is only by means of such collections that ancient sculpture can be properly studied. In none of the great galleries of original works can the development of classical sculpture be half as well seen as in a judicious selection of copies taken from among them all and assembled together on one spot. For teaching purposes such a collection as is now made at Cambridge, and as we hope will be multiplied throughout the country, is indispensable. No reading and no verbal instruction can dispense with the actual sight of a work of art. It must be there before the eye, either in the original or in a fair copy, before we can know anything about it. It is true that a man may learn to talk glibly and plausibly about it by reading and drawing on his fancy. We remember the case of a man who playfully, in the last days of April some years ago, drew up an imaginary critique of the pictures in the Royal Academy for that year. The illusion was perfect. All the familiar qualities of one well-known artist were brought before us. We seemed to see the pictures on the walls; we seemed to admire the discriminative skill of the critic (who was, in fact, no bad judge in such matters) in showing us how here success was attained, and how here the painter had attained and there had fallen short of his high ideal. But none of the pictures were ever really painted. And we can recall another case in which a practised art-critic, without ever having seen it, maintained in a periodical of high reputation the authenticity of a disputed picture of the time of the Renaissance against those who had studied it with care and who held it not to be genuine. So easily does imposture entwine itself with art-criticism. But for a real knowledge, and, we may say, for even an intelligent appreciation, of art, and especially of plastic art, such collections as that just opened at Cambridge are of the first importance. In sculpture the cast far more truly represents the original than all but the very best copies in painting. Owing to the difficulty of reproducing colour and the thousand nuances which, in pictorial art, go to make up facial expression, most copies of great pictures only move the resentment of those who love the originals. In sculpture the cast comes far nearer to the original work, and serves only to reawaken the pleasure with which we first saw it. Few, again, of those who love art can see all the chief collections in Europe, and few of those who can are able to carry away in their memories a vivid and exact record of all that they have seen. For the study of classical art, in all its forms and developments, such a collection as this is better than any one of the great galleries of Europe, because it shows in a methodical form, as they cannot do, the course of this art from its earliest to its latest stages.

The opening of the new branch museum passed off most pleasantly. The Vice-Chancellor having called on Professor Colvin to speak, the latter explained at considerable length the history and objects of the new archæological movement at Cambridge; and Mr. James Russell Lowell, who followed in a speech full of tact and brilliance, was able to say, with justifiable pride, that no small share in that movement was due to his countryman, the present director of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Dr. Charles Waldstein, who has for four years been working with equal zeal and success in winning for this subject its due recognition in the University. Sir Frederick Leighton spoke for the Royal Academy, and Mr. Newton for the British Museum. The conclusion of his speech, in which he said that one of the things that he had most desired all through his life had that day come to pass, will linger long in the memories of those who heard it. Mr. E. B. Tylor, with a pleasantry fully appreciated by the audience, told them that archæology was after all only a branch of anthropology (on which subject the students at Oxford have now the advantage of his teaching), and threatened them, if they did not behave themselves with propriety towards the greater science, with being squeezed into the last chapter of all books on anthropology. Mr. E. A. Freeman amused, but did not surprise, his audience by suggesting that the Elgin marbles ought to be carried back to Athens, and their place supplied by plaster casts. He would doubtless also denude the National Gallery of all pictures except those by English masters, and have their places taken by copies. These gambols of the learned Professor of History at Oxford were not, however, taken seriously by anybody present. We want in England as many original masterpieces as we can get; but we want also to supply the place of those which we have not, and to multiply those that we have, in order that Greek art may be properly understood. Near as casts can come to the original, there is still a difference between the best copy and the marble as it came from the hands of Phidias. In the interests of Greek art it is good that, while much of the best remains on Greek soil, much also is scattered over Europe. It is thus not only placed in a safety which it would not find in its native home, but it is put within the reach of the world at large. Among others who spoke on Tuesday last at Cambridge may be mentioned the names of Lord Houghton, Professor Jebb, and Dr. Charles Waldstein.

The new branch of the museum, as we have said, is devoted to general as well as classical archæology. The Cambridge Antiquarian Society has here placed what it has gathered of Saxon and Roman remains collected in the districts of Cambridge. Casts from the forgotten cities of Central America taken by Mr. Maudsley are also to be found in the collection, and Baron von Hügel, who will take charge of the general department of archæology, has contributed much material of great interest from the South Sea Islands. The collections, valuable as they are still, are at present only in their infancy. We have only to remember what the British Museum and the National Gallery once were, and what they now are, to see how a movement set on foot with energy and intelligence may develop. The present movement in Cambridge could not be under better guidance than that of those who now lead it. Even at present the objects exhibited in the new building are not by any means all that the Museum owns: and, as time goes on, the diligence and liberality of those interested in archæological research will not fail to add to it fresh treasures. For the present, we can only most heartily congratulate the University on the acquisition which it has made to its educational resources, and trust that more and more every branch of human knowledge may be as well represented in Cambridge as in any other University in the world.

PRINCE KUNG.

ONE of those killing frosts which occur in the career of most statesmen, more especially in Eastern empires, has fallen upon Prince Kung. As to the exact cause of his disgrace, whether it be due to the failure of his negotiations in Tonquin or to the intrigues of his enemies, we have no authoritative statement. We see only the puppets on the stage of Chinese politics, and can but vaguely guess at the forces which pull the wires. Now and again we see a prominent figure struck down; but of how the bolt was forged which laid him low, or whose was the hand which loosed it, we know nothing. Rumour says that peculation and mismanagement of affairs were the principal causes of the Prince's fall, and though these, either separately or conjointly, are good and sufficient grounds for the dismissal of a Minister, yet it is quite possible that they may be but the stalking-horses improvised by his enemies to compass his overthrow. The venality of Chinese mandarins is almost universal, and though Prince Kung has always been held to be comparatively clean-handed, it would doubtless be far from difficult to bring evidence of an itching palm against him. As to the charge of political mismanagement, the course of events in Tonquin is enough to give colour to it, and it is probably this which is weighing him down to the ground.

The report that consciousness of disgrace had induced the Prince to commit suicide is fortunately without foundation. Had it been true, the event would be of the highest importance, as showing that the Prince, and those with whom he had been accustomed to act, believe the political tide running against them to be of such strength that their official careers must be considered as virtually over, and all attempts to stem the current to be useless. The Prince has held office too long, and has been temporarily stripped of his official honours too often, to let a mere turn in the wheel of fortune disturb his mental equilibrium. Twice has the Peking Gazette proclaimed to the world his disgrace and deposition, as a warning to proud and ambitious servants of the "Son of Heaven," and as often has he, Antæus-like, risen from his fall stronger than ever.

With the exception of these very brief intervals, the Prince has directed the destinies of the Empire for the last four-and-twenty years. To him belongs the honour of having introduced the new era of international relations which has revived the fortunes of his country, has rendered comparatively powerless the seditious elements in the provinces, and has strengthened the position of the Government in the face of the world. When called from the seclusion of the palace to save, if it were possible, the throne of his brother, the Emperor Heen-fung, he found the armies of England and France marching on Peking, and the Taiping rebels in possession of the richest provinces of the Empire. With true Oriental instinct, he attempted, when first opening negotiations with Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, to cajole them into foregoing their most pressing demands, and was still hoping to succeed when the French troops appeared before the walls of the Summer Palace, which was at that time his residence. This sudden and quite unexpected arrival of the enemy made flight a necessity, and with one or two faithful retainers the Prince scaled the back wall of the palace grounds, and escaped to the mountains, leaving one of his suite behind to watch events. Thus left to his own resources, this officer betook himself to a small pavilion at the back of the grounds. For many hours he remained undisturbed, and when at last he heard footsteps approaching, he lit his pipe in assumed indifference, and turned his chair towards the wall. The first to enter were two Sikh soldiers, who looked round the room in search of valuables, and not finding any, retired without doing more than glancing at the motionless figure in the corner. "And then," to quote the words of the mandarin himself, who related the episode to the writer, "there came in a French soldier. He also searched the room, and seeing that I was smoking, he took the pipe out of my mouth, and broke off the jade mouthpiece and went his way. I then thought it was time to follow the Prince." This he did, and thus was able to be present on the notable occasion when, on the 24th of October, 1860, the Prince, as the representative of the Emperor, ratified the English and French treaties.

Prior to these events Prince Kung, who is the fifth son of the Emperor Taou-kwang (1821–1851), had led the obscure life of unemployed princes, and it is much to his credit that he was able to sustain with dignity the part of Regent under circumstances of sudden trial and difficulty. At the time of his signature of the treaties the Prince was but twenty-eight years old, and he may be excused, therefore, for having appeared "anxious, hesitating," and "overpowered with fear," when putting his hand to documents which were so big with the fate of his country. Habit, however, soon gave him confidence in dealing with foreign affairs, and though he is reported to have been somewhat addicted to the pleasant vices, he devoted himself with untiring diligence to the study of international questions. At this time his position was one of unusual difficulty. His brother, the Emperor, was surrounded at Jehol by advisers whose main endeavour was to upset the treaties, while at Peking he was daily confronted by the Ministers of England and France, who showed no disposition to forego any of the privileges which had been wrung from the Chinese with so much squeezing. So long as the Emperor's health remained sufficiently good to enable him to direct affairs Prince Kung's influence was strong enough to induce him to support the treaties; but when, in the following year (1861), "he ascended on a dragon to be a guest on high," the position of the Prince and his colleagues became one of imminent peril. Already a decree had appeared which purported to have been issued by the dying Emperor, by which his only son, Tsai Ch'un, aged six years, was proclaimed the heir-apparent, and eight of the most pronounced enemies of Prince Kung were nominated to form a Council of State. In these ominous circumstances the Prince hastened to Jehol to attempt to win the Empress over to his views. In this he was successful; and, supported by the seventh prince, Prince Ch'un, who is now said to have supplanted him, and other Ministers, he was able to hold his own until the arrival at Peking of the newly-enthroned boy-Emperor in the November of the same year. On the approach of the Imperial cortège the Prince went out to greet his nephew, and was met by the members of the Council, who refused to allow him to enter the presence. The Prince however, strong in the support of the Empress, threatened to fight his way in with his escort if his path were barred. The Councillors, surprised and cowed, allowed him to pass, and he entered the capital in the company of the Emperor. The supreme moment had now arrived when the power, and even the life, of the Prince were to be thrown into the balance with those of his enemies. The slightest hesitation at this crisis would have enabled his opponents to grind him to powder; but he showed no sign of flinching. On the first assembling of the Council he entered the chamber and read to the astonished Ministers a decree prepared by Prince Ch'un under the direction of the Empress, in which the listeners were accused of having, by their "vicious policy," entailed on the country the miseries of war and its attendant evils, of having shown a disobedient and rebellious spirit towards the Empress Regent, and of having hastened the end of the Emperor by preventing his return to Peking. After detailing these high crimes and misdemeanours, the decree sentenced the three principal offenders, Prince I, Prince Ching, and Su Shun, to be stripped of their official rank, and the other Ministers to the loss of their councillorships. Having read this document, the Prince put to his audience the crucial question whether they meant to submit to the mandate or not. Unprepared for an act of open rebellion, the Councillors answered in the affirmative, and, leaving the chamber, hurried to the palace to remonstrate with the Empress. They evidently had not realized that their strength had gone from them, and by their protest to the Empress they filled up the full measure of their official guilt. The ringleaders, Prince I, Prince Ching, and their colleague Su Shun, who was on the road to the capital, escorting the body of the late Emperor, were forthwith ordered to be arrested. The first two were at once seized, and Prince Ch'un and Prince Jui were sent to effect the arrest of Su Shun. It was commonly believed that this man was the prime mover in the political intrigue against Prince Kung, and that it was mainly he who had led the Emperor into the debauched habits which shortened his life. He himself was notoriously an evil liver, and the sum of his iniquities was complete when Prince Ch'un on entering his chamber was confronted with the most unmistakable evidence that, even when performing the solemn duty of escorting the Emperor's remains, he was accompanied by his harem.

In China there is no room for compromises in an emergency of this kind. It was a duel to the death, and Prince Kung could only be safe from his enemies when they were in their graves. Fortunately he could depend on powerful official support, and at the same time the popular voice in the capital was loud against his opponents. In these circumstances it may well be imagined that the trial of the three culprits had little to do with their fate. Their sentences were already prepared, and after a short shrift the two princes were strangled in their cells, and Su Shun was beheaded like a common malefactor on the public execution ground.

Prince Kung appeared now to be firmly seated in power, and the suppression of the Taiping rebellion added lustre to his administration. But his success brought with it disgrace. The power he had been able to wield with the assistance of foreigners alarmed the Empresses Regent—the mother of the young Emperor had been associated with the Dowager Empress in the Regency—who, having experienced the lengths to which ambitious, headstrong Ministers might go, saw, or fancied they saw, in the Prince "an arrogance and a disposition to overrate his own importance" which required checking. The Chinese world was therefore suddenly informed, through the columns of the Peking Gazette, that the Regents had deemed it advisable to dismiss the Prince from office. Then followed negotiations, apologies, and explanations such as are probably now passing between the palace and the Prince's residence; and at the end of a few weeks a decree was issued restoring him to his former office, at the same time warning him "not to forget the remorse and contrition felt this day." From this time foreign questions began to usurp the importance formerly belonging to domestic affairs. The French Minister paid frequent visits to the Foreign Office to complain of outrages committed on Roman Catholic priests and their converts in outlying provinces of the Empire, and questions of trade furnished materials for brisk correspondence between the English Legation and the Yamun. These international difficulties were concisely summed up in Prince Kung's valedictory speech to Sir Rutherford Alcock, which concluded with these words:—"If you would only take with you to Europe your missionaries and your opium, there would be no more trouble in China." The Tientsin massacre, which occurred a year later, bore striking evidence to the reality of one at least of these causes of trouble in China; and it required all the tact and wisdom the Prince had at his command to prevent armed reprisals for the murder of the French consul, priests, and Sisters of Charity. It was on the occasion of these negotiations that a divergence of views between the Princes Kung and Ch'un first became apparent. Ch'un sympathized with the rioters; but, fortunately for China, he had not then sufficient power to make his support of much value to his proteges. On the audience question, also, he is credited with having strenuously opposed the admission of the foreign Ministers into the Imperial presence without the introductory kotow. On these and other practical political questions Prince Kung successfully withstood him; but he has not been, and in a country like China no Minister can be, beyond the reach of private personal malice. Possibly out of revenge for their defeat on the audience question, Prince Ch'un and his confederates in 1874 induced the young Emperor Tung-che to degrade Kung on the charge of having used "language in very many respects unbecoming." But it is a noticeable fact that, though in China the backstair influence of hostile courtiers may be sufficiently strong to inflict temporary checks on Ministers, it is only when the honour of the country has been sacrificed and her territories snatched from her that their fall implies ruin and disgrace. This makes the difference between the degradation of Prince Kung just spoken of, which lasted only twenty-four hours, and the present crisis through which his political fate is passing. He alone has been ultimately responsible to the country for the negotiations with regard to Tonquin. That he has been unsuccessful in his policy there cannot be a doubt; and a weapon has thus been placed in the hands of his enemies which they well know how to use. That Li Hung-chang is, as has been reported, using his influence in the Prince's favour goes without saying, as these statesmen—the most enlightened in China—have acted together through all the phases of the Tonquin question. In fact, the struggle now going on within the palace walls is a struggle between light and darkness, between an intelligent foreign policy and a return to the dark days of political seclusion and contempt for the foreigner.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.—II.

TAKING the pictures at the Grosvenor in the order of the Catalogue, the first to be noticed is Mr. Robert Bateman's "In the Sacristy" (4), a study of marble and other "properties" of considerable power. A deacon in a cassock is drawing water from a Renascence fountain to wash the sacred vessels. In front is a well-painted group of flowers. Mr. Bateman excels in flower-painting. In the small room he has a "Geranium and Great Master Wort" (344), which is a marvel of imitative art. Mr. E. J. Gregory's "Startled" (9) is the view of a sandy bank covered with underwood, from which a child has frightened a very shadowy rabbit. Mr. Gregory only contributes one other picture, also a landscape, "Marlow Backwater" (151), and we look in vain for one of his figure studies, or even a portrait, either here or at the Academy, where he is represented by a single picture, "Intruders" (178), swans and children, in which also landscape is predominant. It is impossible to say anything in praise of Mr. Robert Browning's large and empty landscape, "From an Islet in the Valley of the Mause" (12). Nor is it easy to admire his coarse and vulgar statue, "Dryope fascinated by Apollo in the form of a Serpent." According to Mr. Browning, Apollo admired a short, stout, thick-waisted woman, with a hideous face. We do not intend to deny the power of the artist in modelling, but only to find fault with his taste. Mrs. Tadema's "Birthday" (18), a group of children assembled at, presumably, mamma's door, is hardly so satisfactory as "Tiny Elizabeth, you must not leave us" (19), in which properties and pathos are mingled with great skill. The sick child and its anxious mother would be enough to touch the feelings, without the beautifully inlaid bedstead and the embroidery and silk. Altogether this is a charming little picture, over which it would be but too easy to linger. Mr. Boughton's "Cutting Herbage—Brabant" is not so interesting as his stirring and dramatic view in the Royal Academy, thus described in the Catalogue:—"A village below the sand dunes; high tide; breach making in the dyke, Island of Walcheron" (458). The frightened villagers, hurrying in the teeth of the wind from their houses, actually below the sea-level, and the great waves and heavy sky, are admirably represented, and stand quite apart from any other work that we remember by Mr. Boughton.

Returning to the Grosvenor Gallery, we observe a very fine study of the nude by Mr. W. H. Bartlett, "Soft Persuasion" (24), two children on a sandy shore, the elder endeavouring to induce her little sister to take the plunge. His "Hauling Canta—Coast of Cornwall" (78) is more a landscape than a figure-picture. Mr. Wegnelin's "Bath" (28) is not so pleasing a study as "Persuasion," but firmly drawn and brightly coloured. Mr. Napier Hemy contributes a powerful sea-piece, "Tipping a Shrimp Trawl" (29). As this artist puts off the peculiarities of his early years he emerges with great knowledge and ease. The technical part of this picture is simply marvellous. His "Trammel Net Catch" (99), at the other end of the room, is also very good. We have already mentioned with praise Mr. Calderon's exquisite "Aphrodite" (38), which occupies the place of honour at the end of the Large Room. It is flanked by two important portraits. Mr. Holl's "James Spicer, Esq." (33), and Mr. Herkomer's portrait of Mr. Parker, M.P. (42), are both solid and satisfactory; but, on the whole, commonplace, as are many of the portraits this year, both here and at the Academy, and especially those of Mr. Herkomer. His great picture of this year is in the latter exhibition and will disappoint his admirers. To our eyes it appears not only an unpleasant subject unpleasantly treated, but it is not equally finished. It represents the miseries of German emigrants landing in America, and is entitled "Pressing to the West—a Scene in Castle Garden, New York" (1546). The face of a sick woman on the left is fine, but a baby which crawls across the floor is only half-painted, and several other figures are similarly mere sketches, or even less. Mr. Herkomer's contributions to the Royal Academy number four, all but this one portraits; and to the Grosvenor Gallery he sends five, all portraits. Mr. Schmaltz, an artist of great promise, seems also to draw too largely on his resources. He has here three highly finished pictures—the "Queen of the May" (43), "Felice" (141), and "All is Vanity" (142). The second of these is the most pleasing, being a small but very complete portrait of the lady who figures in most of his pictures. "All is Vanity" contrasts badly with Mrs. Alma Tadema's sick child. Mr. Schmaltz surrounds his subject with everything that wealth can give, health only being desired. It is a painful and unpleasing picture. At the Academy Mr. Schmaltz has two pictures, one of them a very ambitious failure, "Too Late!" (827), which represents a dead girl on a bed, against the light, and her father, or husband, in a fantastic costume suggestive of Danes and Vikings, coming in at the door, and staggering in horror. The light and shade are well managed, and the whole effect is impressive to a certain extent, but not very far; and it is evident from the details that Mr. Schmaltz has exceeded his powers, and has much yet to learn. "All is Vanity" is hung at the Grosvenor over one of Mr. Alma Tadema's portraits of which we made mention last week, and does not bear the comparison. Mr. Strudwick is another disappointing painter. It is not pleasant to find fault, yet in "The Ten Virgins" (45) we see such an evident striving after Mr. Burne Jones, and such a complete failure to reach anything like his level, that it would be wrong not to record it. There is much to admire in the picture. The landscape is excellent, the figures very graceful. But, just to point to a single item in the sum of shortcomings which abound in the picture, let us look for a moment at the brickwork of the house. Those are not real bricks, and look like the painted sides of a child's Noah's Ark. Mr. Strudwick should study the highly-finished wall and arch in Mr. Fahey's "Love Sett" (93). Had Mr. Burne Jones painted such a subject, his bricks would have been portraits as well as his figures. Mr. Strudwick's second picture is much prettier. It is called "A Story Book" (193), and has a lovely Italian landscape background, while the figures are not unpleasing, especially the dancing group in the middle distance.

"The Indenture" (55), by Mr. Cyrus Johnson, represents a mother apprenticing her son to a London merchant. The scene is well worked out, the details being of what is now called the Queen Anne period. The picture is small and highly finished. We have already noticed Mr. Millais's fine portraits of Lady Campbell. No 57 was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1869, a child in white seated on a Japanese pottery garden seat; No. 62 was painted very lately, and shows the young lady grown up. Mr. Alfred Parsons's "Meadows by the Avon" (60) is a good and warmly sunny landscape. Mr. Hughes shows two of the decorative panels in which he so greatly excels, "Peaches" (63) and "Blackberries and Haws" (75), and, in addition, he has in the other room a wonderful picture, on a silvered ground, "The Song of the Seabirds" (185). Every one who has taken a voyage remembers how the gulls sometimes crowd the air in the wake of a ship, and fly across each other and up and down in confusion, sometimes approaching quite close and at others lagging far behind. This familiar scene Mr. Hughes has contrived to catch with great skill, but why he should not have put in the natural background of sea and sky, does not appear. Mr. Orchardson's "Farmer's Daughter" (85) is mannered and unnatural. We must praise Mr. Rooke's careful little portrait of Miss Honor Brooke (91). The Countess Feodora Gleichen sends a very good "Study of a Donkey's Head" (92). Mr. Sydney Hall's "Descent upon Italy" (96) shows a soldier, in what passes on the stage as ancient armour of an uncertain period, "tobogganing" down a mountain. It would take more power of drawing and painting than Mr. Hall shows in this picture to make such a subject pleasant. The same artist sends also portraits of the three youthful Princesses of Wales (231), which is poor and flat and unflattering. We cannot find any fault with Mr. Caldecott's sketch of "A Young Hussar" (101), except that it is only a sketch. Mr. Prinsep's "Little Bookworm" is a very pretty study. A little girl in deep mourning sits on a footstool in a library in full side-face, and pores over a large book. The flesh-colour is very delicate, and the subdued tone of the picture is in pleasant contrast to the crude reds and greens in which Mr. Prinsep usually delights. We have noticed already most of Mr. John Collier's portraits here, but not that of Mrs. Peck (95), a lady standing before a light-blue silk curtain, a masterpiece of drapery-painting. Mr. Burne Jones's decorative square picture of Daphne is entitled a "Wood Nymph" (104), and is very harmonious. It is impossible not to think of two pictures of very much the same size, shape, and subject by Mr. Rooke which hang in the outer room, "Daphne Flying from the Sun" (229), a study in violet and green; and "Clytie Turning Towards the Sun" (240), a study in scarlet and green; both of which would be more satisfactory but for the unusual and striking ugliness of the faces. Over Mr. Jones's "Nymph" is a curious half-empty canvas, by Mr. G. F. Watts (105), "Rain Passing Away." The great white cloud is gradated and brought to a point of highest light in a way perfectly marvellous. Mr. Watts also sends five pictures hung together. The portrait of Lord Salisbury (132) is the most satisfactory, and that of Lord Lytton (134) rather less so. We confess to caring very little for "Ulda" (133), for "Alice" (136), or for "The Happy Warrior" (135), all more or less allegorical, and at the same time more or less incomplete. Mr. George Howard's two landscapes are full of rich colour, and assert themselves even among so many figure-pictures. "The Walls of Rome" (108) is very small; too small, perhaps, to do justice to a great subject. "The Rookery" (116) is much larger, and shows a great advance on any work of Mr. Howard's we have yet seen. Miss Dorothy Tennant, in her "Naiad" (118), is more like M. Henner than ever; but her "Broken-hearted" (140) is very feeling and delicate, only it is a question if such pictures should ever be painted. Mr. Lehmann sends several pictures, both of figures and landscape, the most interesting being, perhaps, a portrait of Miss Amelia Lehmann (107), which shows how soon the influence of the Reynolds Exhibition has begun to tell. The same must be said of Mr. Sant's very pretty portrait of the sister of the present Duke of Portland (120). Such are the chief pictures in the Large Room of the Grosvenor; but our remarks should be closed by an apology for not noticing everything, or nearly everything. There are pictures in particular by Mrs. Jopling, Sir Robert Collier, Mr. Topham, and some others which we could easily dwell on. In the other rooms are many fine works, to which we hope to return on a future occasion.

THE ORIENTAL BANK FAILURE.

THE failure of the Oriental Bank Corporation was not unexpected, though it was hardly looked for so soon after the general meeting of shareholders. The Corporation was one of the very earliest of the Eastern banks, and it quickly obtained a very large and highly profitable business. At the time of the American Civil War the price of its shares on which 25*l.* was paid, there being a reserve liability of 25*l.* more, was as high as 70*l.*, and dividends of 20 per cent. were distributed. In consequence the credit of the bank stood so high that deposits were poured into it in perplexing amounts. The Eastern trade was then much smaller than it is now, and the bank found it difficult to employ in legitimate banking business the whole of the deposits attracted to it. The directors were tempted, therefore, to extend unduly the field of their operations. They covered with branches, agencies, and sub-agencies India, China, Japan, Ceylon, and the Mauritius; they also extended their operations to South Africa, Australia, and even South America. In the nature of things a business so widely distributed could not be properly superintended from the head office in London, and a wide discretion had to be accorded to local managers. Very often the discretion was not well used. The principles of banking are very simple, but in practice a bank manager requires to be prudent and cautious. Prudence and caution are scarce qualities, and they are especially difficult to secure in subordinate positions in such climates as those of India and China. But, unless managers have been trained in the East in subordinate positions, they want the experience that fully qualifies them for their position. Not seldom, therefore, the managers were hardly fitted for the posts they occupied, and they entered upon risks that proved disastrous. The Directors themselves also committed serious mistakes. Not only did they unduly extend the field of their operations, until the control of the bank practically passed out of their hands, but they engaged in a kind of business which is not strictly banking business at all. For example, they brought out loans for the Chilian Government. This is a kind of business that properly belongs to houses such as Messrs. Rothschilds and Messrs. Baring, but not to a joint-stock bank. The transaction proved an unfortunate one. The war between Chili and Peru caused a heavy fall in Chilian bonds; and, as the loans brought out by the bank were not fully subscribed for by the public, it was left with a large amount of the stock upon its hands. This stock depreciated seriously during the war; and, in deference to the outcry of the shareholders, the Directors sold it at a heavy loss at the very most unfavourable moment, when Chilian credit was unduly depressed by a naval defeat.

Misfortunes aggravated the effects of mismanagement. The fall in the value of silver caused by the demonetization of silver in Germany and the discovery of rich silver mines in America caused a heavy depreciation in all the securities held by the bank abroad. The bank, it will be understood, raised its capital and borrowed most of its deposits here at home in gold, and it invested both capital and deposits chiefly in securities valued in silver in the East. When, therefore, the value of the rupee fell from 1*s.* 10½*d.* to 1*s.* 7½*d.*, all silver securities fell in the like proportion, and some of them fell in a much greater proportion. As long as the capital so employed remained in the East, it is true that the depreciation was of no practical moment, but whenever it became necessary to bring back capital employed in the East, the loss made itself heavily felt. If the Directors at that time had been wise, they would at once have written down the value of their silver securities to the current value of the day; but they postponed doing so until the loss assumed very large proportions. Another circumstance which aggravated their position was the coffee disease in Ceylon. At one time the bank did a very profitable business in Ceylon, the coffee industry being highly prosperous. But, partly in consequence of a disease in the coffee-plant, and partly because of the rapid extension of coffee cultivation in Brazil, the coffee industry in Ceylon became depressed, and the losses of the bank were very severe. The bank advanced largely both upon produce and upon the security of the coffee plantations, with the result that in many cases it had to foreclose and take possession of the properties. These have since cost it much money to keep in working order, and have proved entirely unprofitable. As the bank could find no independent purchasers of these plantations, it founded a Company, called the Ceylon Company, for the purpose of taking them over and gradually realizing; but the Company has been unfortunate almost from the outset. The capital has been called up and spent, and the Company for years has been kept alive only by the Oriental Bank; as a matter of course, it has failed as soon as the Oriental Bank suspended payment. In Mauritius also the bank was very unfortunate. The great industry there is sugar, and, as we explained last week, the price of sugar has been steadily going down for years past until it is lower now than it has ever been known to be. The losses in consequence by the bank have been very large. In South Africa likewise, owing to the political disturbances that have prevailed there for years past, the bank lost heavily. At the late meeting of shareholders the chairman estimated the total amount "locked up" in Ceylon, Mauritius, and South Africa at about two millions sterling; in other words, it has sunk money there to that amount in properties which cannot be sold, though probably at some future time they may prove to be very valuable.

The Directors postponed recognizing facts as long as possible, but the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank at length forced them to look their situation in the face. Since then they have been energetically endeavouring to repair past mistakes. They have admitted and made provision for the depreciation of capital invested in silver securities; they have acknowledged fully the unsaleable character of their holdings in Ceylon, Mauritius, and South Africa; and they have contracted greatly the field of their operations. They retired altogether from South Africa, making over their business to a new bank started for the purpose, which, however, did not take upon itself any of the liabilities of the Oriental Bank Corporation. They have closed several agencies and sub-agencies, and, we believe, also some branches; and, generally, they have restricted their business as much as possible. Lastly, they have cut down expenses in a most rigorous manner. It may be doubted whether they have not gone too far in this latter respect. It is to be feared that by reducing their staff they seriously crippled the efficiency of the bank, and led perhaps to further losses which might have been avoided had the bank been fully manned. Some months ago the Directors came to the conclusion that even these measures were not enough, and they promoted a Bill in Parliament to enable them to reduce by one-half their subscribed capital. The capital actually paid up amounts to one million and a half sterling, and the Directors admitted that the unrealizable assets abroad amount to about two millions sterling. They estimate, however, that these assets, though unrealizable at present, will in the long run prove to be of the full value at which they are now estimated, and they considered, therefore, that if they made a provision for a possible depreciation of 25 per cent., they would have done all that at the worst would be requisite. By cutting down, therefore, the capital to three-quarters of a million sterling, they were enabled to propose to write off half a million sterling as possible depreciation of the assets held abroad, leaving them another quarter of a million to provide against the depreciation of silver securities. Unfortunately, the full disclosures that they had to make alarmed both shareholders and depositors. So late as the middle of January last the shares were selling at about 13*l.*; they fell, however, last month to 5*l.*; and though they rallied for awhile, they again fell on the eve of the suspension. This steady fall to about a fifth of the actual paid-up amount of the shares, and to about a fifteenth of the market value of the shares twenty years ago, showed that there was no chance of raising additional capital. The bank could not be kept alive, as the chairman admitted at the last meeting, without some new capital, and when the shareholders were anxious to get out of their liabilities even at the sacrifice of 20*l.* out of every 25*l.* paid, it was clear that they could not be induced to subscribe additional capital. And if the shareholders would do nothing to keep the bank alive, it was not probable that the outside public would come to their relief. Similarly, the depositors at last got alarmed. At the end of December last the deposits still amounted to 6,696,938*l.*, which was within about three and a half millions sterling of the amount in 1879. It will be seen that up to the end of last year the confidence of the depositors had been wonderfully sustained, considering the alarming rumours that have prevailed in the City during the past six years. But when the full statement of the bank's affairs came out, the depositors at length got alarmed, and the withdrawals assumed very large proportions. At the meeting on April 24 the chairman said that every fall in the shares was telegraphed out from London to the East, and that immediately deposits were withdrawn. These withdrawals at length became so serious that, coupled with the fall in the shares, the directors came to the conclusion they had no course before them but to close their doors. There is talk even now of resuscitating the bank under a new name; but we fear there is little chance of carrying the proposal into effect. Long before a new bank can be founded the business of the old one will have passed to other institutions; and it is not likely that either the existing shareholders or the outside public will be willing to invest money in founding a new Eastern bank. In the meantime the opinion of the City is that large numbers of the existing shareholders will be unable to pay the calls to be made upon them, and that, in consequence, the solvent shareholders will have to pay the full 25*l.* per share to which they are liable. At the end of December last the total liabilities of the bank to the public amounted to nine and three-quarters millions sterling, and a little over one and a half millions more were due to the shareholders, making the total liabilities eleven and a quarter millions sterling. On the other side of the account, bills of exchange amounted to about two and a quarter millions sterling, bills and notes to 2,900,000*l.*, and loans and advances to 3,470,000*l.* How much of these are readily realizable it is impossible to say. The chairman may have been quite right in estimating that the unsaleable assets did not exceed two millions sterling, supposing that the bank had been able to hold its ground and to continue working. But, now that the bank has suspended, it may not be possible to realize at once much of what the chairman considered good. All this, however, is for the present only speculation. It will be a considerable time before the actual state of affairs can be ascertained. In the meanwhile it is much to be desired that the liquidation should be taken out of the hands of the official liquidator and entrusted to some of the officials of the bank, with a strong committee of inspection. They would understand the whole business, and would have local knowledge as well as experience. They could therefore conduct the liquidation more expeditiously and more cheaply than an official liquidator could.

THE RIVALS AT THE HAYMARKET—DEVOTION AT THE COURT.

ADVERTISEMENTS in the daily papers have for some time past set forth, and a paragraph in the play-bill repeats, with what desire Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero have been actuated in arranging The Rivals for production at the Haymarket. They have been guided by "a desire to heighten the effect of the Author's play without encumbering its action." Their desire is certainly not fulfilled. On the contrary, they have lowered the effect of the author's play to an extent which is really remarkable, considering how good a play it is; and they have encumbered the action so lamentably that the action more than once breaks down under the load of encumbrances and entirely ceases. "For this arrangement of the comedy Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero are jointly responsible," we are advised, and we must add that their responsibility is a heavy one. It is not demanded that Sheridan's work should be treated with reverential regard. "A few transpositions in the dialogue and some variations of locality" might have been excused or justified if the transpositions and variations did not totally destroy the coherence of the plot and the gaiety of the action. What we object to are transpositions which weaken the comedy and variations of locality which make it absurd. Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero recognized one grand object when they set about the task of arranging The Rivals—which, after all, Sheridan had himself arranged with some dramatic aptitude, though the two people in question do not think so. The episodes might be inverted, the thread of the story tangled, the characters blurred, what the author made natural might be made preposterous, if only the grand object could be attained—a way found "to avoid shifting the scenes in view of the audience." But why should not scenes be so shifted? The play is of more importance than the setting. Sheridan left behind him an admirable comedy, carried on by just a dozen personages through a number of most diverting scenes, in which dialogue and incident are of equal excellence. A shifting of scenes is occasionally indispensable; but Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero evince a curious preference for dropping a curtain, instead of "letting down" or "running on" a view of a street in Bath or of the North Parade, and the author is made subservient to the scene-painter or the stage-carpenter. We are far from denying or questioning the completeness with which the two gentlemen who are responsible have pursued their mistaken path. We are ready to believe implicitly that the very under-clothing of the sedan-chairmen who appear in the first act is copied from the best authorities; that the oil in the lamp of the watchman who crosses the stage, and says that it is "past eight o'clock and a fine night" is some ante-paraffin compound which was generally adopted more than a hundred years ago. The curtsey which the flower-girls make as they offer bouquets to the passengers who have just alighted from the coach may be, and very likely is, a most exact reproduction of the curtsey of the period. We do not doubt that the pole-hook and terrets which the ostler is cleaning at the end of the stable-yard are off a veritable coach. Our only complaint lies in the fact that all these incidents of which the first act is mainly composed have nothing to do with Sheridan's comedy of The Rivals, which the management has undertaken to produce. The first act of the play, before Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero heightened the effect, was really an excellent piece of construction. Fag, Captain Absolute's servant, and the innominate Coachman who had driven Sir Anthony to Bath, met and discussed the situation; that is to say, they put the plot in train, stated why all the characters have met in the city, described Jack's father—"hasty in everything, or it would not be Sir Anthony Absolute"—and gave the cue as to Lydia Languish. Then Julia and Lydia meet. Lydia explains how her ridiculous old aunt has fallen absolutely in love with an Irish baronet, and how she carries on a correspondence with him under a feigned name, a Delia or a Celia. The silly old woman and Sir Anthony then discuss their project of the marriage between Jack and Lydia; so that when the curtain falls, the interest has been started and the diverting complications of the plot set going. But this was only poor Sheridan's crude idea. The effect had not been heightened to the elevation of the Bancroft-Pinero standard. Fag and the Coachman do meet, it is true, in the version which this pair of very responsible gentlemen have been so good as to amend; but their conversation is so hampered by black boys, sedan-chairmen, watchmen, ostlers, flower-girls, and others, that the dialogue goes for nothing. One never knows whether the librarian or the fruiterer will not speak next, and so attention is not concentrated on the explanatory sentences. Then Lydia's maid, Lucy, comes from the library, and gives a letter to the gentleman who is recognized by experienced playgoers as Sir Lucius. But at this period, in the new version, Lydia has not told the story of her aunt's folly, the spectator has not been permitted to see the "old weather-beaten she-dragon" who writes love-letters signed "Delia." The fun of the idea when Lucy delivers her epistle to Sir Lucius is therefore completely lost; for Lucy's identity is not obvious, and how thoroughly the needy Irish baronet, who believes himself to be corresponding with Lydia, is being befooled is not suggested. Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero are wrong in supposing that the guaranteed accuracy of the cut of the Coachman's breeches—from researches made in Bath and in the British Museum—compensates for the loss of all Sheridan's rare humour.

The absurdities continue. No scene is changed in view of the audience; let that be granted for what it is worth. But, to avoid such changes of scene, we not only find Acres writing his challenge to "Beverley" in the New Rooms—in a chamber most thoughtfully vacated by the visitors to the Spa—but actually Sir Anthony and Mrs. Malaprop arrange the match between the young people, and the lovers themselves are brought together, in the public apartment. All this should, of course, take place in Mrs. Malaprop's lodgings. Why should not half a score of men stalk into the tea-room where the pair of elders and pair of young people are assembled? Did Mr. Bancroft persuade Mr. Pinero that this did not matter, or did Mr. Pinero assure Mr. Bancroft that they were heightening the effect at this juncture? Let us see how they proceed to carry out the most desirable object of not encumbering the action. Sir Anthony in the highest spirits (we are speaking of Sheridan's Sir Anthony, not of Mr. Pinero's), having, as he supposes, smoothed the lovers' way and seen all well, declares that he "should like to have a little fooling" himself, and gaily hands Mrs. Malaprop off, singing as he goes. The stage direction says (LYDIA sits sullenly in her chair), and then follows, or rather then should follow, an admirable comedy scene between the lovers. Lydia is indignant that there is to be no elopement after all; Captain Absolute pleads that "a little wealth and comfort may be endured." The whole situation is in the truest feeling of comedy; but Mr. Bancroft thought the effect of it wanted heightening. So there is an awkward pause. Silence for a moment reigns supreme. The curtains which divide the room where Jack Absolute and Lydia are seated from a room behind are drawn; a number of guests who have all too obviously been waiting their cue throng in, and a gavotte is danced. The principals cannot be left out, so the lovers forget their quarrel. Sheridan is put aside, and Mr. D'Auban for the time completely supplants him; Mr. D'Auban, it must be added for the benefit of those who have an acquaintance with English dramatic literature, but are less versed in the personnel of the pantomime stage, being responsible for the arrangement of the dances. The gavotte itself is graceful and quaintly pretty; but is it not absurd—cannot even Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero see that it is absurd?—thus to interrupt one of the most vital scenes of the comedy, and not only to interrupt it, but entirely to destroy its significance, by causing the lovers who were on the eve of quarrelling to patch up a truce and postpone the expression of their feelings till Mr. D'Auban gives the signal for the resumption of Sheridan?

This resumption, it should be distinctly understood, is as far as the players can resume it, and for the most part this is but a very little way. We were about to remark that Mr. Pinero's Sir Anthony was ludicrous, but this would be to imply that it was to some extent laughable, and such an implication would be very wrong. There is not a shade of reality in his passion. Instead of the bluff, unctuous, hearty old man with all his violent impulses on the surface, Mr. Pinero shows a dapper reflective little person, who bears no sort of resemblance to Sir Anthony. When Fag declared that the old baronet was "hasty in everything, or it would not be Sir Anthony Absolute," he made an excellent criticism. The personage presented is not hasty in everything, and it is not Sir Anthony Absolute. How utterly Mr. Pinero misconceives the character he endeavours to play is best shown in the scene where Sir Anthony enters looking "plaguy gruff," as his son says, and begins with the speech "No; I'll die sooner than forgive him! Die, did I say? I'll live these fifty years to plague him"—how every line shows the spirit and self-will of the brave old baronet! He continues, "He's anybody's son for me. I never will see him more—never—never—never—never!" Will it be believed that as Mr. Pinero utters these "nevers" he adopts a soft, pathetic tone, as if picturing to himself a deserted, childless old age? Beyond this, misconception surely cannot go. Mr. Forbes-Robertson makes Captain Absolute a prim and peaceful young gentleman. One feels that his conduct in every relation of life would be exemplary. He makes a mistake, perhaps, in sitting down while his father is standing, for in that ceremonious age a son would not have seated himself while his father stood; but this is a minor matter. The whole performance, indeed, is very minor, if the phrase be allowed. Fag again (Mr. Elliot) is not as formal as a servant would have been. He leans easily on the back of a chair while talking to his master, and a servant, even if admitted to his master's confidence, would have preserved a bearing of respect. Mr. Bancroft and Mrs. Bernard-Beere make the scenes between Faulkland and Julia as little tedious as possible. These parts are well done; and Mr. Brookfield's David is a careful bit of character-acting, thrust into no undue prominence, and therefore the more effective. His dialect is faultlessly preserved. Mr. Alfred Bishop is somewhat faint and feeble as Sir Lucius; but Mr. Lionel Brough's Bob Acres is, with Mrs. Stirling's well-known and altogether excellent Mrs. Malaprop, the salvation of the comedy. We have seen it stated that Mr. Brough is too boorish and extravagant; but we certainly do not think that he was so on the first night of the play. He was, at any rate, irresistibly comic; and if at times he became grotesque, a country squire a century since may well have been such a figure as is here presented, while the stage directions at times oblige Acres to be farcical. It was curious to note how, when Mr. Brough and Mrs. Stirling appeared, the audience stirred from a condition of semi-somnolence, and laughed heartily: and, oddly enough, these were the passages the effect of which Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero had not heightened. We see, on reference to the playbill, that Miss Calhoun played Lydia Languish. It made no sort of impression on us, and we have really forgotten what her Lydia was like, beyond a general notion that it was not much like Lydia. On his first appearance Mr. Bancroft was hooted by a number of roughs in the gallery because they had arrived at the theatre before the hour announced for the opening of the doors, and had been caught in the rain. As the victim of so stupid an insult, we sympathize heartily with the manager. As regards the comedy, however, we sincerely trust that Mr. Bancroft may never again be actuated by a desire to heighten the effect of any standard play, and that he will abjure the fatal assistance of Mr. Pinero.

Devotion, as Mr. Dion Boucicault, junior, calls his adaptation of MM. Lockroy and Badou's Un Duel sous Richelieu, is one of the many plays of French feeling and origin in which the three familiar figures of French romance—husband, wife, and lover—fill the principal places. The work is more than half a century old; indeed, it was in 1842 that Donizetti's opera Maria di Rohan, founded on the story, was first produced, at Vienna. There are some fine moments in the play, which, however, the adapter has not improved by the invention of a first act, showing what could be readily explained and what in a few sentences is explained in Lockroy's piece; for to Lockroy alone Un Duel sous Richelieu was originally attributed. In this first act we have the marriage of Marie de Monbazon to the Duc de Chevreuse, whom she respects, but does not love; and the return of the Comte de Chalais, to whom her heart was given, but who has been parted from her by ill-fortune. It is a piece of sadly crude construction which brings the lovers together by making Chalais walk in unexpectedly just before the bride leaves the church, by herself to stroll about the grounds of the château some time before the completion of the marriage service. This was the bad old fashion of an earlier day, to invent the "situation" and take no thought as to how it might reasonably be brought about. In this act much is seen of the young Abbé de Gondi, whose ambition it is to be unfrocked in order that he may marry a certain Mlle. Geneviève; and the flippant young priest is the motive power of the work, for it is he who whispers scandal of the Duchesse de Chevreuse. Chalais indignantly contradicts the slander, and thence follows the challenge to the duel between Gondi and Chalais, that gave the name to the original work. It is a merit of Devotion that it increases in strength as it progresses. The complications of the third act are notably ingenious. Chalais, the King's favourite, has for a time supplanted Richelieu, but the Cardinal has returned to power thirsting for vengeance on his rival. This Marie knows, and she visits the Hôtel Chalais on the morning appointed for the duel, to urge her lover to fly. While she is there her husband, who is to second Chalais, arrives; Marie is hidden in a curtained recess, and it is of course in the recess that Chevreuse desires to seek a better sword than that which Chalais has chosen. The incident is old no doubt; when Marie concealed herself it was inevitable that Chevreuse would come near to discovering her; but the danger—which would give so totally incorrect an aspect to affairs, for Marie and Chalais are innocent of offence—is averted. The fact of their innocence strengthens the episode. The Duc being gone, Marie renews her entreaties to Chalais to fly and save his life from Richelieu; and the result is that, detained by her, he fails to reach the appointed spot before Chevreuse has taken the principal's place and in the combat which ensues has been wounded by Gondi. Chalais follows, and arrives in time to avenge his friend and his friend's wife; and then comes the dramatist's difficulty. How is this to end? Here is the woman beloved by both men. Her husband is noble and worthy; her lover is no less so—the word lover, in fact, is perhaps ill chosen; for Marie and Chalais may both say in Racine's harmonious line, "Le jour n'est pas plus pur que le fond de mon cœur." Nevertheless, whatever poetic justice may demand, dramatic exigency is supposed to require that one should perish, and Mr. Boucicault has chosen to sacrifice Chalais. Having fled, he returns to justify Marie. As he enters the Hôtel Chevreuse, where the Duc is waiting sternly, and the Duchesse in agonizing terror, for his arrival, he is shot and mortally wounded; and he dies, after convincing Chevreuse of the truth. The costume of the period is extremely picturesque if only the actors can wear it, and most fortunately for the chances of the piece Mr. Conway, one of the few players who is easy and natural in such a garb, has been secured for the part of Chalais. To speak of his dress first is, however, to do him some injustice; for Mr. Conway enters into the spirit of the character and realizes it with singular success. The actor has perhaps never been seen to greater advantage. He is always gallant and earnest, tender to the woman he loves, quietly dignified before his adversaries. The total absence of that self-consciousness which is the bane of most representatives of romantic parts cannot be too highly praised. Mr. Conway forgets himself, and only remembers Chalais. Mr. Clayton must also be warmly commended for his manly and unaffected performance of Chevreuse. The display of suppressed emotion has lately been the subject of much banter. Not the less is it a valuable quality, as Mr. Clayton proves during the scene in which Chevreuse waits with his wife the arrival of the man he regards as her betrayer. A very competent Marie is found in Miss Ada Cavendish. There is a certain impulsiveness in her playing of passionate incidents, an apparently unstudied energy—the result necessarily of very much and careful study—which is extremely telling. On these three the drama depends. Miss Venne, as Geneviève, has only to be pert and playful, and she can be very pert indeed. Mr. Boucicault's Abbé de Gondi is in no way remarkable. A misconception has arisen about this part. It has been stated that it was originally played by a woman, and that Déjazet had filled it. The original Gondi was a M. Taigny, and, so far as we know, it has never fallen into a woman's hands. The confusion has probably arisen from the circumstance that Déjazet's name is associated with Les Premières Armes de Richelieu; but this is quite another play, and quite another Richelieu.

NEWMARKET FIRST SPRING MEETING.

OLD TOASTMASTER opened the First Spring Meeting at Newmarket by winning the Two Thousand Guineas Trial Plate for Lord Zetland, beating Zadig, the winner of the Metropolitan Stakes, by a length. Lovely was made the favourite for the Visitors' Plate; and there was some interest in the race, because at the Craven Meeting Lovely had beaten Splendor, and Splendor had beaten Lovely, and now the pair were to fight out the rubber. As often happens in such cases, neither of them won. Lovely came with a rush at the distance, but she was too late to catch Xarifa and Dalmeny, although she left Splendor far behind. Baron Hirsch gave 1,000*l.* for a two-year-old filly by Hampton, called Glimmer, before the race for the Maiden Plate, and she won it, but by a head only, after a fine race with Menevia and Pompey. The Duke of St. Albans' two-year-old Clonmel, by Julius, showed a great deal of his sire's vile temper in his match with Lord Cadogan's Lonely. He bolted before the race and ran very unkindly in it, losing by five lengths. The Duke of Westminster's Whipper-in, by Hermit, a useful handicap horse, who had won each of the races for which he had started this season, only took the Prince of Wales's Stakes by a head, but he won in good style.

The racing on the Wednesday, with the exception of the Two Thousand, which we noticed last week, was exceedingly poor and uninteresting. Three of the recent purchases at Lord Falmouth's sale ran during the day. Prince Maurice, an own brother to Dutch Oven, and a fine powerful colt, for whom Lord Hastings gave 500 guineas—a sum which he should be worth even as a country stallion—came out for the first race; but he was scarcely trained enough for the long Cesarewitch course, over which the race was run, and he was tired out half a mile from home. Saucy Boy, his only opponent, won in a common canter. In the middle of the afternoon came Harvester's disappointment, and in the last race of the day, the well-bred Little John, by Kingcraft out of Jannette, a two-year-old with rather a light middle-piece, that had cost 290 guineas on Monday, was very easily beaten by Arqua, who had run a good second for a Sweepstakes at the Craven meeting. There was a heavy storm in the course of the afternoon, and the attendance was small for a Two Thousand day.

The weather on the Thursday was wretched, and the number of spectators was extremely limited. The Stud Stakes was won by Laverock, the winner of the Great Yorkshire Foal Stakes. This two-year-old belonged to Mr. Dawson, who trained for Lord Falmouth. Last year Mr. Dawson had won the same race with his filly, Reprieve, and immediately afterwards he had sold the winner for 2,000*l.* to the late Lord Grosvenor. After the race on this occasion he again sold the winner for exactly the same price, to Baron Hirsch. Camlet, who had been backed on the previous day for the Derby at 1,000 to 30, came out for the Welter Handicap. Last season he had won half a dozen races, and he had run third to Scot Free and the Sister to Adelaide filly at Sandown, when giving each of them 15 lbs. He is a handsome colt, but he is generally considered short. The terms on which he was now meeting his opponents were terribly against him, but they were a poor lot. He ran very badly, finishing eight lengths behind Dean Swift, while Rout beat him by a head for second place. There was a race on the same afternoon for the old-fashioned whip. Last autumn, the Duke of Hamilton challenged the Duke of Beaufort, who held the whip, with City Arab, and the Duke of Beaufort accepted with Faugh-a-Ballagh, who won the race by twenty lengths. This spring the Duke of Hamilton again challenged the Duke of Beaufort, naming Medicus as his champion, and the Duke of Beaufort again accepted with Faugh-a-Ballagh. Medicus, it will be remembered, had been an extraordinarily strong favourite for the Cesarewitch last year, and had run third in that race to Bendigo and Tonans. On public form it seemed as if long odds should have been laid on Faugh-a-Ballagh, but, for some unknown reason, the bookmakers accepted as little as 11 to 4. As soon as they had started on their four-mile journey, Archer took a resolute lead with Faugh-a-Ballagh. As much as a mile and a half from home Medicus was completely exhausted, and it was a mere farce for Faugh-a-Ballagh to canter slowly on, and eventually trot past the winning-post fifty lengths in front of his opponent. The day's racing was anything but brilliant, and the late Two Thousand, the approaching One Thousand, and the cold wind occupied people's attention far more than the sport of the afternoon.

The best public form shown by any of the fillies entered for the One Thousand Guineas was that of Queen Adelaide and Busybody. In the Middle Park Plate, when receiving 7 lbs. from Queen Adelaide, Busybody had beaten her by three lengths and a half; but a fortnight later, when giving Queen Adelaide 3 lbs., Busybody was beaten by a neck. This running offered a nice problem to students of public form, in the question whether Busybody or Queen Adelaide would now be the best at even weights. Queen Adelaide's defeat of Archiduc in the July Stakes, although by a head only, showed her to be a filly of exceptional merit. Two days later she had been unplaced to Superba, but that can scarcely have been her true form; nor could her being unplaced in the Richmond Stakes at Goodwood be considered as any guide in estimating her merits, beyond the fact that every defeat increases the uncertainty of a racehorse running up to his best form on future occasions. Busybody's race in the Great Challenge Stakes with older horses, in which she beat both Tristan and Despair, was a proof that she was not merely a fast filly in a bad year, if any such proof had been needed. Her Middle Park Plate victory was much in her favour; but then Royal Fern, who had been second, only half a length off, had run very badly in the Two Thousand, thus throwing a certain amount of discredit on the form shown by the runners in the Middle Park Plate. Yet her chance for the One Thousand was considered a wonderfully good one, for 8,800 guineas were given for her on the Monday before the race, and she started first favourite. Whitelock, by Wenlock, out of White Heather, was another favourite for the One Thousand. This filly was certainly good-looking enough to win. At Goodwood, in the Prince of Wales's Stakes, Knight Errant, who had run second to several good horses, was quite unable to make her extend herself. At Newmarket, in September, Knight Errant had beaten her by a head in a race won by Busybody by a length, but it was generally believed that she was not quite right at the time. Sandiway, by Doncaster, had won seven races as a two-year-old, and had earned more than 3,700*l.* in stakes. She had been unplaced in the July Stakes to Queen Adelaide, and also to Cherry in the Cheveley Stakes, and her victories had not been gained over any of the most successful two-year-olds of the season; but still there stood her long list of seven successes against only two defeats, and the latter were almost too bad to be trusted. Wild Thyme, by Lowlander, had won five races worth more than 4,000*l.*; she had also been placed twice and unplaced once only. In different races she had beaten both the winner of the Two Thousand and the second in the Two Thousand. Legacy had won a couple of races and lost half a dozen. Altogether, the One Thousand was an unusually interesting race this year, and, small as was the field, it was of very high quality. There were only six starters, but they had all won races as two year-olds. Legacy made the running during the early part of the race rather slowly, but the greater proportion of the pace was fast, and the race occupied a few seconds less time than any race for the One Thousand for some years past. Rather more than a quarter of a mile from home the six fillies were almost abreast, and then a beautiful race followed. Wild Thyme was the first beaten, and, as they began to descend the incline, Whitelock broke the line in front by taking a slight lead, while Legacy fell into the rear. Before reaching the Abingdon Bottom Queen Adelaide shot forward, and came into the Dip a neck in front of Whitelock. Whitelock then began to show signs of having had enough of it, and Busybody made her effort. There was a capital finish between Queen Adelaide and Busybody, while Whitelock was in close attendance, with Sandiway at her heels. At the winning-post Busybody was half a length in advance of Queen Adelaide, who was a length in front of Whitelock, and Sandiway was not far off. It was a beautiful and an interesting race, and the result seemed to show that the relative form of the fillies engaged in it had altered but little, if at all, since last season. Busybody is not entered for the Derby; but she is engaged in the Oaks, the Epsom Grand Prize, the Prince of Wales's Stakes and the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot, the Sussex Stakes at Goodwood, and the St. Leger, as well as some ten other races. The breeding of Busybody, who is by Petrarch out of Spinaway, is interesting as a specimen of in-breeding, for she has a treble cross of Touchstone, a double cross of Venison, and probably a double cross of Voltaire, although it is somewhat doubtful whether one of her ancestors was by Voltaire or Starch. Queen Adelaide was much admired as showing great quality combined with plenty of size and immense power. Wild Thyme's early defeat must not be made too much of in calculating her chances in future engagements, as she had been cased in her work on account of a temporary ailment, and in the opinion of some judges she was a little "fleshy" when she ran in the One Thousand. The rest of the racing on the day of the One Thousand was almost as bad as the weather, which is saying a good deal.

So much has already been written about the sale of Lord Falmouth's racing stud, that we need only make a short notice of it. Long beforehand every one had prophesied that the prices would be extraordinary, and when it was over everybody said that they had been extraordinary. All this was true enough, but it might fairly be asked in reply, whether any man could take 36,000 guineas elsewhere and buy with them as many horses of the same class. Something over 8,000 guineas apiece was an exceedingly high figure for a colt and a filly, but they were considered, at the time of the sale, to be two of the best three-year-olds of the season, with great prospects of winning the Two Thousand, the One Thousand, the Derby, and the St. Leger. Six thousand each was given for a couple of very inferior three-year-olds many years ago, and 10,000*l.* was given one year ago for a colt who lost every race for which he afterwards started during the season. Ten thousand pounds were also said to have been asked for the first favourite for the late Two Thousand the day before the race. Then, although 4,000 guineas is a very high price for a two-year-old, even yearlings have been sold for sums approaching it, and Busybody had won almost that amount in stakes during her two-year-old season, while another filly had exceeded it by considerably more than 2,000*l.* On the other hand, Lord Exeter's conditions, under which Lord Falmouth's racehorses were sold, make horses that are likely to win very valuable races much dearer than might appear at first sight; for, although the seller makes himself responsible for the forfeits when they do not run and half the entrance fee when they do run, he receives only a third of the stakes when they win. If Harvester had been sold unconditionally, he would probably have fetched 10,000 guineas. A year ago another horse belonging to Lord Falmouth started for the Two Thousand at exactly the odds at which Harvester stood for that race at the time of the sale. This was Galliard, who won during the season very nearly the sum which was given last week for Harvester. But if Harvester were to win an equal amount this year, instead of repaying his purchase-money he would still be indebted to his owner to the amount of nearly 3,000*l.*, for something a little short of that sum would have to be repaid to Lord Falmouth under Lord Exeter's conditions, as the seller's share in the horse's winnings. As far as Busybody is concerned, she has already reduced her price from 9,240*l.* to 7,240*l.*, and half a dozen of the sixteen races for which she is yet engaged were worth nearly 18,000*l.* last year, and will probably be worth as much this year; so she ought to have ample opportunities of repaying her purchase-money with interest before the winter sets in. Nevertheless, if Harvester should succeed in winning one of the great three-year-old races, and do well at the stud, it is far from impossible that before he dies he may prove the best bargain of the two three-year-olds which astonished the world, last Monday week, by fetching 9,000*l.* or more apiece. Then what would his purchaser care for his cost if he should win the Blue Riband of the Turf? Even a representative of a long line of Earls was distinguished above all the other Earls of his race as "the Earl who won the Derby," and it is esteemed almost a greater honour in this country to own the winner of that scamper round Epsom Downs than to win a great battle.

The Chester Cup was a chapter of accidents. Morgan, the jockey who was to have ridden Lord Rosebery's Cameliard—the first favourite, had been "wasting," in order to ride at the required weight, and he was so weakened by this process, that, after riding in the first race of the afternoon, he fell from his horse in a fainting fit. Then in the race itself the first time the horses passed the sharp turn into the straight, Beauty and Alban fell, and Beauty broke her leg. She was afterwards killed, but she had not been moved off the course when the horses that were running in the race came round the second time, and Cameliard, who looked very like winning, was jammed between the poor broken-legged mare and another horse. A second serious accident was just saved, but Cameliard was put out of his stride, and lost all chance of the race, which was won by Mr. Merry's Havock. The fame of Chester races appears to have vanished for ever, but Chester race-course still maintains its reputation for being one of the most dangerous in England.

THE ITALIAN OPERA—MR. CARL ROSA'S SEASON.

THE performances at Covent Garden this week have evoked an animation and interest that reflect something of old enthusiasm and past glory. Those who so insistently proclaim that Italian opera is a doomed institution, and has no raison d'être in art, should, after hearing Mme. Lucca in Les Huguenots and Il Trovatore, vary their pessimistic plaint or keep discreeter silence. The magnetic influence of pure vocalization can indeed never be annihilated by mere theories, however advanced or however interesting and novel; when, however, attempts are made to ignore its supremacy, it is satisfactory to record the hearty recognition of Mme. Lucca's brilliant impersonations on Saturday and Tuesday. On Saturday, as Valentina in Meyerbeer's opera, Mme. Lucca displayed her unequalled union of vocal and dramatic talent, receiving excellent support from Signor Mierzwinski as Raoul, Mlle. Tremelli as Urbano, Mlle. Leria, who made her début as Marguerite, and from Signori Cotogni, De Reszké, and Monti. It was, however, in her splendid impersonation of Leonora on Tuesday that Mme. Lucca most completely vindicated the pre-eminence of the vocal art in lyrical drama.

The most satisfactory points in the representation of Faust on Monday were the performances of Signor de Reszké as Mefistofele, and of M. Devoyod as Valentine. Both these artists possess fine voices and great executive skill, and both are excellent actors. The success of M. Devoyod during his first season last year in the part of Valentine, as in L'Africaine and The Flying Dutchman, was equally manifested on the present occasion; his Valentine is an admirably finished study, his acting distinguished by thorough consistency and truth, his style of singing singularly expressive and dramatic. The Mefistofele of Signor de Reszké, while deficient in the verve and profound intellectual grasp of M. Faure's unique impersonation, is yet an interpretation full of intelligence and vivacity. It expresses, however, too much of one uniform phase of humour, which, admirable in the first two acts, becomes inappropriate as the action progresses and the tragedy deepens; the conception of Mefistofele as a bon garçon is justifiable only within certain limitations, and Signor de Reszké fails to express the more elusive nuances of the character—the irony, malice, and deep-witted nature of the Protean fiend. Mme. Durand's Marguerite cannot be considered a successful interpretation, though it was of course endowed with considerable dramatic vitality; its excellence was chiefly displayed in the church scene and in the last act. Either from indisposition or other causes Mme. Durand's voice has not the freshness and purity of last season; her rendering of the music of the garden scene, and particularly in the exacting jewel song, was deficient in brilliancy as well as facility of execution. Neither was the Faust of Signor Marconi vocally efficient, though the singer contrived to animate his acting with much of the tenderness and delicacy that should find expression through the voice. His invariable practice of forcing his upper notes is both inartistic and ineffective, and was productive of ruinous disenchantment in the love music of the garden scene. Mdlle. Tremelli sang and acted well as Siebel, and Mdlle. Desvignes and Signor Ragner undertook the parts of Martha and Wagner. The chorus left much to desire, being almost inaudible in the first scene, and generally deficient in freshness and quality. M. Dupont conducted the opera, the orchestra rendering Gounod's masterpiece with irreproachable technique.

On Tuesday Verdi's very popular opera was given with a strong cast, including Signor Mierzwinski as Manrico, Signor Monti as Ferrando, Herr Gottschalk as the Conte di Luna, Mdlle. Tremelli as Azucena, and Mme. Lucca as Leonora. There is probably no opera so thoroughly hackneyed as Il Trovatore, and none more entirely removed from the ideal of the advanced school of composers. The tissue of absurdities that make up the libretto, the false and jejune sentiment, the melodramatic nature of the plot, are not less opposed to that ideal than the abundance of airs and concerted pieces, all deliberately designed to express the utmost capacities of the human voice irrespective of dramatic propriety or progress. If these incontrovertible facts possess a tithe of the disadvantages to impersonators that many profess to believe, it considerably enhances the value and significance of Mme. Lucca's performance that by her dramatic power and incomparable singing they suffered temporary and complete effacement. Despite all untoward circumstances, Mme. Lucca captivated the house, and her Leonora must be considered fully as dramatic, and in all respects as excellent, as her Carmen; the thoroughness of her impersonation, and its great range of expression, were remarkable. In the lighter music, as in the more dramatic, her success was striking; the animated cavatina, "Di tale amor," in the first act was given with most brilliant effect, which was greatly increased by the contrast presented by the singing of the two that follow. The pathos of "D'amor sull' ali" was finely contrasted with the agitation on hearing Manrico's lament, "Ah, che la morte"; and her passionate exclamation "Di te, di te scordarmi" expressed with intense power the anguish of the moment, even as her beating against the gate of the tower expressed her despair. The last scene was not less finely rendered, the sudden transition from hopeless grief to delight on learning from the Count that her lover should be spared was portrayed with wonderful force and nature. Signor Mierzwinski admirably seconded Mme. Lucca, and was very effective in the air "Ah si ben mio" and in "Di quella pira," which was sung with great spirit and energy; his Manrico is peculiarly individual, and is a far more robust conception than is usual on the Italian stage. The Azucena of Mlle. Tremelli was also a notable performance. Herr Gottschalk, who appeared as the Count, has a good voice, but was rather heavy in style, and in the familiar romance "Il balen" he scarcely expressed the delicate sentiment with fulness. Signor Monti was the Ferrando, while Mlle. Sonnino appeared as Inez, and Signor Manfredi as Ruiz. Signor Bevignani conducted, and the representation, all things considered, was excellent.

On Thursday La Gioconda was repeated, the cast remaining as on the opening night, with the exception that Signor Monti replaced Signor De Reszké. Mme. Durand increased her reputation by her excellent impersonation of the heroine, a character she has evidently studied with the insight of profound sympathy, and which she interpreted with remarkable fulness and depth. In the trio with Barnaba and La Cieca in the first act, in the duet with Laura in the second act, and in the whole of the powerful final scene, her singing was characterized by intense dramatic force. Mlle. Tremelli repeated her success as La Cieca, and created a great impression by her exquisite singing of "Voce di donna" in the first act, one of the most beautiful numbers in the score. The Enzo of Signor Marconi is a far more notable performance than his Faust; the smoother music of Ponchielli suits his voice and style better than Gounod's, and he was consequently more at ease in his part, and sang with considerable effect the pretty and sentimental cavatina in the second act. Mme. Laterna as Laura filled a not very agreeable rôle with ability, and sang with good feeling and dramatic expression. The choruses were very well rendered, and the sailors' chorus, to which so much additional charm is given by the freshness of the boys' voices, was particularly well sung. Signor Bevignani conducted.

Mr. Carl Rosa, whose short season ends to-night, must not be permitted to depart without receiving a word of cordial acknowledgment of the excellent work he has been doing. The performances under his direction have been good individually and collectively. There is a unity of design about his operas which is no less pleasing than novel, and the secret of which probably is that, under the sway of an intelligent director, singers endeavour to interpret their composer rather than to glorify themselves. The artists of Mr. Rosa's company constantly advance. Miss Georgina Burns was only a short time ago a passably good vocalist, with little or no idea of sustaining a part, and especially a leading part, in an opera. Now she plays Gounod's Marguerite, amongst other characters, with earnestness and feeling. Miss Perry had still more to learn than Miss Burns, but has learnt almost as much. Four or five years ago either the Royal Italian Opera or Her Majesty's was regarded as in all respects superior to all other operatic undertakings; but it is certainly the fact that, besides Mr. Maas and Mr. Barrington Foote, who have been tried on the Italian stage and have not been found wanting (at any rate as singers), Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Leslie Crotty, Mr. Ludwig, and, if not overtaxed, Mr. Davies and Mr. Snazelle, would hold their own on any stage. No amount of ill-directed and overdone newspaper eulogy can conceal the fact that Mr. Augustus Harris has peculiar aptitude as a stage-manager. How much a good chorus and a good orchestra aid the general effect those who, in many opera companies, have had experience of bad choruses and bad orchestras can thoroughly appreciate; and in these important particulars Mr. Carl Rosa's pains to secure choristers and instrumentalists have been rewarded. A second hearing of Mr. Gilbert à Beckett and Villiers Stanford's Canterbury Pilgrims (for the production of which, as for that in former times of other English work, Mr. Rosa deserves most special thanks) more than confirms the good impression created on the first night of its production. The whole seems more coherent and ingenious. We trace more closely the continuity of thought. Here and there Mr. Stanford might judiciously lighten his score, which is in places over-coloured; and we are strengthened in the opinion that his second act is not in all details as good as he might make it nor as short as he should. The love music has not the fervour and melody for which we look; but there are admirable passages in it; and to condemn an absence of melody in the first and third act is to confess that one has not listened or that one has not ears to hear. We note with satisfaction that a due meed of praise has been awarded to Mr. à Beckett's book, though an evening paper has lamented the absence of spoken dialogue. The critic of the journal in question can scarcely have apprehended the scheme of the opera. We have previously spoken of the praiseworthy representation of Carmen with Mme. Roze as the heroine, and of an adequate performance of Faust. Mr. Goring Thomas's Esmeralda has also advanced in popularity and strengthened its composer's reputation. Mr. Rosa's season has been most creditable to all concerned, certainly not least to Mr. Randegger and M. Goossens, the conductors.

REVIEWS.

SIBBALD'S INFERNO OF DANTE.*

MR. SIBBALD has had many predecessors in his work. Up to the present time there have been more than twenty English translations of the Inferno of Dante, taken either alone or in conjunction with the two other parts of his great poem. The earliest was that by Rogers in 1782 in blank verse, a little known but creditable performance. The latest was that by Mr. Warburton Pike in 1881 in terza rima, the employment of the leisure of a learned and hard-worked special pleader, one of the last of his race. Of them all two only are in prose—the excellent one by Dr. Carlyle published in 1849, which has been of so much use to all subsequent translators, and another of small merit by O'Donnell in 1852. Longfellow's and Pollock's versions of the whole poem are in blank verse, but line for line with the original, as also is W. M. Rossetti's of the Inferno only. Cayley, Ford, and others have used the triple rhymes of the original, of which Wright employed a bastard imitation; and Boyd's, the first English translation of the whole Commedia, is cut up most unsuitably into rhymed stanzas of six lines each. Cary's translation, which, like Pope's Homer, will probably always be the favourite with the generality of English readers, as the most successful poetical paraphrase of his author into their own language, is in unfettered blank verse, which altogether loses the form of the original without gaining the advantage of the greater literality afforded by prose.

It may be seen that the verse translations from the Commedia largely exceed in number those which are in prose, although Mr. Butler and the late Mr. Dugdale have both followed Dr. Carlyle's example, and have published prose versions of the Purgatorio, and it may be hoped that the former will before long also print his version of the Paradiso. Mr. Sibbald has, therefore, followed the lead of the majority of those who have been in the field before him, and has executed his work in terza rima, which, as strictly representing the form of the original, has almost paramount claims for adoption, if only the translator has the skill to use it, so as not to depart from the substance while intent upon preserving the form of that which he undertakes to present in another language. Professor Jebb, in the preface to his recent edition of the Œdipus Tyrannus, which is accompanied by a prose version of the play, has well said that the principal virtue of a translation is absolute fidelity to the original, not to the letter at the cost of the spirit, but rather to the spirit as expressed by the letter. And he adds that metre will often exact sacrifices precisely at the points which test the highest fidelity—namely, the light touches by which the genius and art of the original are most delicately marked.

Mr. Sibbald may be much commended for the way in which he has observed the precepts and avoided the dangers thus enunciated. He has succeeded in producing a thoroughly readable English poem; the notes are good and fresh, and his work is entitled to take a high place among those of similar design. He hardly ever adds and never omits a word, or varies the veritable import of the original. His style is good, his vocabulary is that of the best modern English, without resort to archaisms or the "verbum insolitum" which the judicious writer has been wisely warned "tanquam scopulum evitare." His rhymes, too, are natural and unforced. The exceptions to this general commendation are few indeed. In the first canto and in another place the word "harassed" occurs as a dissyllable, with the accent at the end, and rhyming to "last," "cast," and "passed." "Dool" is a good Scots form for "dole," in the sense of dolour or grief; and there are such verbs as "to drowse" and "to egress," although hardly in use. The proper names are almost always preserved in their Italian form, a difficult matter to manage in a metrical translation; but Jacopo da Sant' Andrea does not look so well to us in the form of James of St. Andrews as it may perhaps do north of the Tweed.

To pass on to other matters of observation on Mr. Sibbald's translation, it may be noted that in Cant. i. v. 100 he translates "umile Italia" as "humbled Italy," no doubt intending to convey Dante's opinion of its degraded political condition in his own time. But the epithet has almost always been supposed to have been borrowed from Virgil (Æn. iii. 522), where it can have no such meaning. In a note upon the allegorical significance to be given to Beatrice and Virgil, Mr. Sibbald exhibits the true and sensible spirit in which he has studied Dante when he says that the poem would lose its charm if the allegorical meaning of every passage were to be too closely insisted on. And he shrewdly adds that, worse than that, it cannot always be found. In the same tone he dwells in another place upon the wisdom of not attempting to make out everything, and does not pretend to be able consistently to reconcile all the astronomical indications. "Vassal" for "fidele" (Cant. ii. v. 98) is a very happy and appropriate rendering of the word in its old Italian and technical sense. The famous inscription over the gate of Hell is not made to begin in its first three lines with the same words, as it does in the original, although a slight transposition in the second line would easily have secured this conformity. The word "uncouth" does not represent any of the epithets given by Dante to the sounds which meet the ear inside the grim portal, and is not justified by citing Boccaccio's comment that they were "like German," nor is the word strong enough for the context. A few lines onwards the more general reading is adopted of "d'orror la testa cinta," instead of "d'error, &c." Professor Lubin, in the prose paraphrase of his edition, has given a novel turn to this by making the passage indicate that Dante's hair was made to stand on end with terror round his head.

A new significance is given by Mr. Sibbald to the simile (taken from Virgil, as to its earlier part) in the Third Canto, in which the souls passing Acheron are compared in their multitude and unceasing succession to autumn leaves as they fall. They are compelled to cross by Charon's gestures or words of command, and Dante has added the comparison of their obeying the summons, one by one, to a bird's flying to a call. This has generally been taken to refer to the return of a hawk to the lure thrown up by the falconer, and the "suo richiamo" seems to favour this. But "richiamo" will stand as well for the note of a decoy-bird employed in netting birds, as still practised in Tuscany, and this certainly would be a more exact and appropriate simile in the particular passage than the other. Lubin also, in his notes, has taken the same view.

"Sparkling tide" is hardly a satisfactory rendering of the "bel fiumicello" which surrounds the castle in which are placed the shades of the great heathens whose virtues and distinction have saved them from a sentence to lower depths. The note on the line (v. 107) suggests that it was spoken by Paolo and not by Francesca, for the reasons that it would more appropriately be placed in his mouth, and that in the next line the answer made to Dante's request to learn their history is said to have come from them both. But this novel reading appears to be more ingenious than well founded. Neither does the "boorish party" for "la parte selvaggia" (vi. 65) seem a very happy rendering. As Dante uses the same phrase elsewhere, it may have been an accepted one for the political section whom it describes, and it need not be supposed to have implied anything vituperative, any more than the term "country party" has done in England.

In the note upon the lines in Canto xiv., where allusion is made to the supposed letter from Alexander the Great to Aristotle, in which he describes how his army trod under foot and extinguished the flakes of fire which rained down upon them in India, Mr. Sibbald cites Plutarch's mention of something which may have suggested it, but gives no reference to the passage. The original germ of the fable is probably to be sought in Arrian's Expedition of Alexander (Bk. vi. 24), in which he compares the sands of India to "untrodden snow," as was first pointed out in an article on Lord Vernon's Inferno, in Fraser's Magazine for May 1869. This, together with a few words from Quintus Curtius, probably afforded the groundwork for this part of the spurious letter—the Alexandri Magni ad Aristotelem Epistola de Admirabilibus Indiæ—which was a popular book in the middle ages, and was often printed afterwards. It is curious to note, in connexion with this, that in Dean Stanley's Sinai and Palestine (Introduction, p. 33) he has called the sands of the desert "the snow of the south."

In the note on Michael Scott (xx. 115) it is suggested that his thin flanks, as mentioned, may refer to a belief that he could make himself invisible at will. This is novel, but hardly admissible, and it is better to continue to suppose that reference was intended to his actual personal appearance, which would have been well remembered in Dante's time. In the beautiful opening to Canto xxiv. the line is thus rendered by Mr. Sibbald:—

But soon her brush of colour is all bare, in which he is less fortunate, and more remote from the original than is his wont. The general meaning, it is true, is kept; but the simile is altered from that of a pen wearing out to that of a failing supply of colour to a brush.

In the story of Ugolino, Mr. Sibbald has defied criticism by the device of waiving a decision on a well-known point of controversy. He neither says that the door of the Tower of Famine was locked up, nor that it was nailed up, but adopts the safe compromise of saying that it was made fast. His own opinion, however, is made evident in a note, and is to the effect that the sound which reached the dungeon at the top of the tower was that of locking the gate. Before passing to Mr. Sibbald's Introduction and his notice of Giotto's portrait of Dante, it may be remarked with satisfaction that he has mentioned with just disparagement the unworthy Italian translation from Benvenuto's racy old Latin commentary, which was published at Imola on the occasion of the great Dante celebration held a few years ago. It will be pleasing to all interested in the matter to know that the wish expressed by him that this valuable illustration of the Commedia should be printed in full from the original has been for some time in course of fulfilment, and that students of Dante and the history of his period may at no very distant time hope to be able to have it in their hands.

The prefatory matter entitled "Florence and Dante" gives all that is necessary to be known of the political and personal history of the poet and his times for the due comprehension of his greatest work. The origin, motives, and interests of the contending parties in Italy and its cities are well set forth and explained, and with the same air of healthy freshness which distinguishes the whole of Mr. Sibbald's work. The latest authorities have been consulted, and the fairest conclusions have been arrived at. Dante's position in, or rather out of, the constantly changing factions which distracted his country is clearly defined, and his Ghibellinism is shown to have been something very different from that of the party to whom the name belongs.

The personal history of the man is also well told. The studies of his youth and manhood are described. His political importance is reduced to its proper level. It was impossible that, with his comprehensive views and lofty aims, he should have been successful in a warfare of mere partisans. There was a real Florentine girl—the daughter of Folco Portinari—the object of Dante's early and enduring love. But it was no ordinary passion, and she is no more than the suggestion of the lady of the Vita Nuova, and was at once raised in his imagination to a distant elevation above that of any woman who ever trod the earth. Mr. Sibbald cites the introduction of Beatrice into Dante's writings as the strongest instance of what he calls his economy of mental experience—that is, the skilful use of real emotions and incidents to serve for suggestion and material for poetic thought. Her marriage did not interfere with her place in Dante's thoughts; nor is there any sound reason for believing that his own marriage was an unhappy one. It formed no part of his poetical, philosophical, or political life. He had no occasion to introduce any mention of it in his works, and accordingly he makes no mention of it. Mr. Sibbald has some temperate and reasonable remarks upon the cruelty and injustice of Florence to her most distinguished citizen, pointing out that his fervent temper and devotion to great ideas placed him out of the reach of common sympathy, and that his return to Florence from exile could only have taken place under circumstances which could not have been wholly gratifying even to himself.

The disquisition on the portrait in the Bargello is interesting, and is devoted to an endeavour to ascertain the date at which it was painted. The fresco in which it occurs also contains figures, supposed to be those of Charles of Valois and of the Cardinal Acquasparta, who were together in Florence in 1301-2. But it is hardly probable that Dante, or even the other two, should have been receiving the honour of having their portraits placed in a public building at this date in Florence. Looking for another date at which a prince and a cardinal were together in Florence, Mr. Sibbald finds that in 1326 Cardinal Gianni Orsini was there as Papal Legate, and also Charles, Duke of Calabria, the eldest son of King Robert of Naples, who came as Protector of the Commonwealth. He entered the city with great magnificence, as recorded by G. Villani, and for some time resided in the palace of the Podesta. Dante had then been dead five years, and his friend the artist might have been then able to introduce his portrait without giving offence to the authorities, and perhaps even so as to gratify a returning desire to do honour to his memory. It is, however, not mentioned by Mr. Sibbald that it was concluded by the Commission who sat on this subject in Florence, and published their Report in 1864, that the painting is not the work of Giotto, but of one of his scholars, and that it was probably painted in 1337.

The book is exceedingly well printed and turned out; and, in conclusion, it need only be added that Mr. Sibbald's continuation of his work to the Purgatorio and Paradiso must be looked for with interest by all who love Dante and are glad to welcome his worthiest interpreters.

THREE NOVELS AND ANOTHER.*

IF every batch of novels were as good as the four books before us, the reviewer's lot would be a brighter one than it is. No two of them have anything in common, save the rare quality, shared by all alike, of possessing merit. There is none that is not rather above than below the average; while the first on the list is a book deserving considerable attention, and the last is a positive revelation. As to this last one, though it is something more than a mere collection of disconnected scenes, we should yet prefer not to class it with novels proper. Hence the heading of this article.

Bethesda is by a lady who evidently aspires to take a place among writers of the philosophical novel. And this book, so far as we are aware her first essay in this direction, shows promise which goes some way to justify the ambition. The aim and tone are lofty, and the style maintains a corresponding level. And, though the subject is a desperately dangerous one, it is so handled as to avoid the least deviation from the path of high moral purity. The author shows some familiarity with the advanced thought of the time, philosophical and quasi-philosophical; and perhaps does not always quite succeed in distinguishing the one from the other. In psychological analysis—and it is of such analysis of a very close kind that the book principally consists—much cleverness and insight is displayed. But it is very much overdone; there is too much of it. And the same objection applies to everything else in the book; everything is overwrought. The whole tone of feeling is so high as to be almost transcendental; the moral standard is well-nigh ideal; and the sentiment so intense as sometimes to come perilously near the line which should distinguish it from gush. The author to succeed—and we believe she can succeed upon these conditions—must exercise much self-restraint, repressing exuberance both of thought and language, and must learn the difficult art of compression.

The keynote of Bethesda is the insufficiency of conscience, even in exceptionally fine natures, without a rule of conduct, based upon principle, imposed from without the moral part by reason. The conscience is often expected not alone "to enforce doing what is right," but also "to decide what the right is." This is the rock upon which split two very fine and, as to one at least, extremely beautiful characters. The story is of a high-souled, intellectual, but, at the same time, emotional girl, and a man of high aims and noble thoughts, of a nature schooled by mental suffering and self-suppression, the self-sacrifices of whose earlier life show him a man of no common clay, yet never at his best the equal of this ideal woman. She is American; he is French; and (we may remark in passing) the element of nationality as influencing their respective characters is skilfully and unobtrusively dealt with. The scene lies chiefly in Italy and France, where Bethesda and her aunt are travelling, almost living. There they meet René d'Isten, a young man of family and position, and become extremely intimate. He had married some years before a Spanish girl, who, as he found out at the altar, loved another; they were never truly man and wife, and now lived habitually apart. These facts are well known to Bethesda and her aunt. The strength of his character is shown in his noble self-sacrifice in relation to his wife; its weakness is to be seen in his ultimate attitude towards Bethesda. Their mutual attraction was at first purely intellectual, out of which grows much close communion, ending where such platonic relations always must end between two such people—in love. They pass intellectual days, but amidst surroundings of exquisite sensuous beauty keenly enjoyed, and in an atmosphere charged with emotional disturbance. The spotless purity of Bethesda's character keeps their intercourse on the highest plane of sentiment; but, however elevated its nature, it is love itself into which their feelings ripen. It is with the almost wilful blindness of both (quite wilful, perhaps, on the man's part), with their trust in their own personal strength of character and upright intentions alone to bring them safely through such a situation, that the moral of the story is concerned. When at length the truth breaks on the pure and noble-minded girl, the conflict of her emotions is powerfully delineated, and the workings of her mind, both before and after that supreme moment, are finely analysed. On her return to America her mental condition becomes very distressing; but new surroundings and more judicious treatment than that of the weak and foolish aunt open her eyes more fully to a still truer view of the nature of the error for which she is now suffering bitterly. Then comes a serious illness, induced by mental agony; and after that a more settled frame of mind, in which peace is possible. That assured, René appears on the scene again. He has discovered that his marriage was informal, and that he can, if he chooses, be free of the wife whose love he had, at Bethesda's bidding, attempted in the meanwhile once more to win. Meeting him by accident, against her will, Bethesda, at whose feet he now throws himself as a potentially free man, bids him go by the next steamer back to his wife and marry her more effectually. Years afterwards we find he has done this to good purpose; and so the story ends, not without a faint hint, if we understand aright, that Bethesda, now once more in Italy, may possibly some day marry an artistic enthusiast—which would be a pity.

We have purposely refrained, lest we should prejudice our readers, from pointing until now to certain peculiarities of diction in this book. Bethesda is advertised as an American novel; and so, no doubt, it is. In the first volume, besides the constant writing of "will" and "would" for "shall" and "should," and the frequent occurrence of "anyway," in the American use, and of "someway," we light upon such uncompromisingly national expressions as the following:—"At a queer place way down in the city"; "but Beth stopped him right there"; "if Aunt Mabel felt badly about it." And it is an English girl who is made to say:—"Mrs. Trescott has had her time occupied, I venture"; which strikes us as a peculiarly happy compromise between the long English "I venture to say," and the all too terse American "You bet." To her also is attributed, "So you see, darling, anyhow you can fix it, you are my perfect spotless Lily"; and "He wouldn't have had an easy time of it, you better believe." The odd thing about it is that, though the first volume contains several such specimens (we have quoted the worst of them), there is scarcely one such, and not a single bad one, in the other two, as though these had received the advantages of a revision by another hand denied to the former. Be that as it may, it is to be deplored that a book of this character, and writing generally of such good quality, should be sullied by these isolated blots of language (for they are isolated), mere vulgarisms even in America, which jar so painfully on the ears of Englishmen. Perhaps American diction, as here exemplified, may be characterized in the terms felicitously applied by our author to American life, as having "lost its pristine clearness, and yet not reached the stage of filtering."

In The March of Loyalty we have a novel of the present—the very present—day, for it comes down to January of this year. But there is a mistake somewhere about the dates. The second period proper ends a year and four months earlier—say September 1882. Between the beginning of that period and the end of the first, people have grown from youth to middle age; yet the beginning of the first period is fixed at about 1877 by the age of an old woman of ninety, who was thirteen years old, or thereabouts, at the Irish Union in 1800. But let that pass. Most people would consider The March of Loyalty a singularly inapposite title for an Irish story of the present day; and we have to wait till the last page of the third volume for an explanation. It turns out to be the name suggested by the heroine for a rather truculent Orange party song, which the reverend gentleman who wrote it had christened "Ulster at Bay"; and we do not see why the heroine and our author could not have "let it go at that." The story is one that, if it does no one much good, will do no one any harm to read. The scene is laid in Ireland, in Fenian and Land League times. But this is used as framework only; political differences and disturbances have no appreciable bearing on the plot or interest of the tale. This seems a waste of good material. Broken heads and broken fortunes are capable of being turned to great account. But the book has merits, not the least of which is the thorough wholesomeness of its tone. The characters are naturally drawn, and there is just sufficient interest, in the leading love affair (in spite of the trite mechanism of a letter that fails to reach its destination) to induce one to see how it will end. The lover is a poor fellow; his conduct is not by any means satisfactorily cleared up; and he does not deserve half so good a wife as he gets. We could have spared the profusion of German quotations and French phrases, even with the decent excuse (for the latter) of a sojourn in Normandy. We could have spared, too, the great display of erudition on the part of the rector and his encyclopædic curate, the reality of which the author, wisely no doubt, leaves the reader to take on trust.

Readers who like to have their hair made stand on end by ghost-stories will be partially disappointed in The House of White Shadows; for, though the weird title does refer to a haunted house, there are no "real" ghosts in it. Such readers, however, may take heart of grace, for the book is eerie enough to string up the nerves and make one's flesh creep nevertheless. It is an ably written, interesting, even engrossing, tale of the sensational and romantic order, but having something in it too above and beyond what is usually to be found in productions of that class. In construction and execution there is much to be commended up to the end of the second volume; after that, events crowd in too thickly, and the improbabilities become more frequent and more violent. The events which gave the house its name relate to the last generation of inhabitants. These events are introduced in the form of an episode, forming perhaps (apart from the repetition in the third volume, which is a mistake) the best written part of the book. There is something very French about the lighter dialogues; a characteristic which we will give the writer the benefit of assuming to be intentionally impressed upon them, seeing that the scene is laid near Geneva and the characters are all French or Swiss. We can also quite unequivocally give the highest credit for the entire absence, in spite of these circumstances, of French tags and phrases. The hero is an eminent advocate, whose surname, with an ingenuity, the object of which is not obvious, but which must have cost some trouble, the author has succeeded in keeping a profound secret. Coming to the neighbourhood of Geneva for rest, he is impelled by the restless activity of his forensic mind, and a quite unaccountable belief in the man's innocence, to undertake the defence of a fiend in human form charged with the murder of a young girl. The evidence of guilt is as conclusive as any circumstantial evidence in the world ever was; but the great advocate obtains an acquittal. The trial is extremely well dealt with at considerable length. The circumstances are probably based on some actual case. But, be that as it may, we cannot refrain from recording our sense of the ridiculous inadequacy of the defence. The night after his acquittal, the murderer confesses his guilt to the advocate, whose feelings may be imagined. His silence as to this, from self-regarding motives, becomes one of the threads of a mesh in which he eventually becomes inextricably entangled. It would be unfair to tell too much of a story that depends to so great a degree on sensational and startling incidents; though there is probably nothing revealed in the climax that would not have been pretty clearly foreseen by readers of ordinary novelistic experience and acumen. The advocate's character is undoubtedly well conceived and drawn. There are other characters, too, that deserve attention. That of an ex-advocate, the crippled, shrivelled, shrewd, cynical, but still kindly, old Master Lamont is a capital sketch; and some of his conversations with his "familiar," the clever "fool," are crisp and entertaining. There is good character-drawing, too, in the long episode, that has more romantic material in it than goes to the making of many a whole novel. The bearing of this upon the main story is slight, yet we should have been sorry to miss it.

It is a relief for a reader, jaded with a course of regulation novels, even of as much merit as the foregoing, to come upon such a refreshing book as the Personal Recollections of Peter Stonnor, Esq. This is a book written to amuse, and most thoroughly does it fulfil its object. It is truly funny, and the fun is never forced, and is without a dash of vulgarity. Peter Stonnor is a man of position in his county, past middle age, and a bachelor; a stiff, prim man, proud of his position and lineage, with his family motto, "Stonnor et Honor," ever on his lips; proud, too, of himself and of the natural gifts with which he firmly believes himself endowed; sententious and priggish; yet, withal, a good, kind-hearted, honourable English gentleman, whom one learns to like thoroughly in spite of his foibles. Believing that no one would venture to play a trick on him, he is the victim of innumerable practical jokes, and some swindles; vain of his supposed social tact, he is for ever making the most ludicrous blunders; profoundly impressed with a sense of his own wisdom and perspicacity, he uniformly "gets the wrong sow by the ear." Here is an instance of the subtlety of the author's touch in delineating this character. When Peter Stonnor is being duped (he is ultimately robbed) by a professing Medium, "My interest," he is made to say, "was roused, not so much by Spiritualism itself, as at the knowledge of finding a power of philosophical reasoning within me, which I had been hitherto unaware of." The tricks played upon the poor man, his harmless vanity, and the blunders he makes, form the staple of the book; which, for the rest, has just enough consecutiveness to make it a story, and just that touch of human interest and pathos without which no story, however funny, is quite satisfying. There are other amusing characters, too, and some good stories. One the author must forgive us for quoting. It is told against a minor character in the book, an old beau in search of a wife with a little money. "Beg pardon, Mrs. O'Brien," he was overheard saying to a widow, just as she was driving off the course at Punchestown, "but was it eight hundred a year and four children, or four hundred a year and eight children, you were saying?" But it is by no means only the little plums like this that make the book funny. It is well written and amusing from cover to cover; and we recommend any one who wants to laugh honestly to read it without delay.

QUAKERISM.*

IT may seem almost like a violation of privacy to review such a book as this in a public journal; but it is something of a contradiction of the spirit of Quakerism that it should have been published at all. Making all allowance for changed times and fashions, what could be more alien to the principles of their founder than that the Society of Friends should publish their arcana and submit all the minutiæ of their decrees to the judgment of the outer world? For more than a hundred years after the institution of their yearly meetings the minutes were not even printed, but were preserved and circulated in MS., each monthly or quarterly meeting being expected to make provision for the supply of copies for the use of its own members. In 1782 they first appeared in print; in 1883 (and possibly before) "Friends" accept the conditions of the literature of the world without, and expose their secrets, not only for universal perusal, but for the impartial comment of uninterested critics. The change is significant, corresponding to the change which has come over Quakerism itself; and the book is rather a protest that the Society is alive than an evidence of its vitality. Quakerism, in fact, has lost its raison d'être, and so practically has ceased to exist. It may be doubted whether George Fox, if he were alive now, would not be the first to admit that it had no longer any reason for being, possibly that the very features which differentiate it were the main hindrances to doing the work which it was established to do. It would be no argument against the necessity and wisdom of founding such a sect if he were to make this admission. The decline and death of his Society may be the best evidence of his discernment and foresight in establishing it, they may exhibit the best fruits of his religious zeal. At a time when conformity to the Established Church and to the ordinary usages of society seemed like approval of, or at least acquiescence in, the manners of a Court and of a society whose life and morals were an opprobrium (though some of the brightest lights of the Church of England shone then), it may have seemed the best, or indeed the only course, for those whose souls revolted against the dissipation of the laity—that is, of the more conspicuous laity—and the supineness of many of the rural clergy, to found a Society which by its dress and habits should bear witness against the one and by its zeal and energy should be a protest against the other. French idiom associated the use of the plural "you" with the Court of the French king, and the Court of Louis Quatorze and the unworthy relations of Charles with it again suggested much to discredit England in the eyes of people abroad and to scandalize the devout at home. Hence "thee" and "thou" are explicable as protests and reminders; but why "farewell" instead of "good-by"—what is the spiritual significance or social value of this change? It is perhaps not worth dwelling on, except so far as it indicates a disposition to make changes for the sake of change.

The peculiarity of dress was a more important matter. George Fox probably did not intend that all his followers should adopt his suit of leather; but he was an enthusiast, and in other times and countries might have donned the raiment of camel's hair and the leathern girdle about his loins. And he would have been consistent with himself in doing so. What he did mean was that "Friends" should be marked off by their simplicity of apparel from men whose dress was identified in his mind with disgraceful lives, but which was really not so much unchristian as absurd. A man would attract far less attention walking along Pall Mall now in a suit of leather than in the bows and lace, the silk and velvet, the ruffles and the wig of a dandy of the Court of Charles II. It must have been a real witness against the ways of the world, and a real support to the professors of a purer morality, that they should exhibit this aloofness, and, without words, announce their antagonism to evil. But in 1883 (when the minutes of his Society are published) he would see the men of the world at all events dressed in a way which would have caused them to be taken for Puritans both by the ascetic and by the cavalier of the seventeenth century.

It is not too much to say that hardly any man who is of any importance in the world nowadays would provoke the indignation even of George Fox by his dress. In that matter we are all Puritans. And it is significant that these minutes contain no decree enforcing fidelity to the traditions of the sect in respect of peculiarity of dress. The traditional drab suit—with its knee-breeches, collarless coat buttonless behind, and its broad-brimmed hat—is a thing of the long past; only middle-aged persons can remember it, except possibly in a familiar instance in the city of London. But more has gone than this. The very modified peculiarities of absence of collar, and a hat slightly lower in the crown and broader in the brim have vanished or are vanishing. "Thee," "thou," and "farewell" are going with them, and what there is left of Quakerism is only a religious sect, and no longer a social caste. It has been found impossible to maintain the insignia of social exclusiveness, and the Book of Discipline contents itself with exhorting both men and women to beware of "adorning themselves in a manner at variance with the plainness and simplicity of the truth we make profession of." But George Fox might see and might be justified in seeing in all this, not the failure, but the success of his policy in enforcing these outward and visible signs of an inward conviction. He might say, and with some truth, that his system had done its work and was dying, not because it was effete, but because that which was more "perfect had come," and therefore that "that which was in part was done away." He might see in the changed habits and manners of society since his day the fruit of his own mission; and, however mistaken he might be in claiming the results of many co-operating causes as due to his preaching alone, no one who knows anything of the history of the last hundred years would deny to Quakerism the glory of an example which has been always pure and often elevating. The active share taken by Quakers as a society in the abolition of slavery and in the reform of prisons are honours enough to inscribe on the escutcheon of any corporation (if Quakers had escutcheons) and to justify its separate existence. The spirit of George Fox has survived in many of his followers down to our own day, though the form of its manifestation is of necessity different. And there are other ways in which they have rendered social services which, if less important, are not without interest. Their quiet lives and seclusion from society, their abstinence from many of its pastimes have left them an amount of leisure which in many instances has been well employed. Those who have enjoyed no personal intimacy with members of the Society of Friends would be surprised at the learning and accomplishments he would find in many of these quiet homes. There is a tradition of culture in some of their families which would put to the blush many sons who have been to public schools and universities and have rubbed elbows with the world, and many daughters who have been to finishing schools and had the best masters. First-rate libraries are often found among them, and sometimes gems of printing, choice Elzevirs, curious collections of Bibles, and old vellum texts that would make Mr. Quaritch hungry. Portfolios of water-colours, enlarged by successive generations, scrap-books, filled with family contributions, drawers of choice engravings bear witness (if any witness were needed) how mistaken is the view which would fasten on modern Quakerism all the negative features of Puritanism, or deny it the appreciation of much which makes life best worth living for. In its rapprochement to the outer world, modifying and modified by it, it seems to us to have fulfilled its destiny (no ignoble one), and to have won the right to say "Nunc dimittis" with no insincere gratitude. But its social features are, of course, only the expression of the spirit of Quakerism, however necessary they may have been as a testimony and a protection of the professors of the creed. The question still remains, What is Quakerism in its inner essence? What was its original idea, and what has become of it now? Its origination is the best proof that George Fox was something more than a fanatic, a sectary, and an ascetic. Like all religious proclamations which have impressed men's souls and have endured, it is based on an assertion, and not on a negation. (Christian martyrs denied the divinity of the Emperor, and died for it; but it was the martyrdom, and not the denial, that was the semen ecclesiæ.) He found the religious world divided between those who based their faith on the universal tradition of the Church and those who believed in the exclusive authority of Scripture. Each party had its infallible guide to which they professed to submit will, reason, and conscience; both Puritan and Cavalier doing many things sanctioned by the voice of the living authority or the letter of the printed book which shocked the religious sense, and must have driven him to ask if there was no other guide of life than these. And this impulse from without is apart from the mystical tendency of the man; it was, in a sense, as natural to him as it was spiritually true to conclude that he was not reduced to this alternative, which seemed discredited by much that he saw in the lives of the adherents of either side of it. In their rationale of religion they had left out, or assigned a subordinate place to, what he thought was the main factor in the relations of man to God. It was the indwelling Spirit, and not the Church, nor the Bible, who was the guide of life. How could it be otherwise when so many men, even unconsciously or against their will, subjected both Church and Bible to the verdict of conscience? In the war of parties, and when every one about him was on one side or the other, it was this insight into what he thought the defect of either side, and this discernment that he need not and could not belong to either, but that there was a third course, and that the true one, which marked the genius of George Fox. In it is contained the whole spiritual history of his Society. In it is involved the whole religious system of Quakerism. It followed almost logically that this belief in an inspiration which was the sufficient rule and light of life in all its details should make it necessary to dispense with all forms of worship and all external aids to faith; for how could one prescribe to another, equally inspired, the words of prayer or praise, or the help that he wanted for his peculiar need? The complete repudiation of all forms was the logical result of the exclusive adoption of one dogma, and the issue of its foundation-truth. Quakerism is the most logical creed in the world. It claims an equal inspiration for all, and it leaves to each the choice of his own words and modes of worship. It has been said that, notwithstanding the infinity of Christian sects, there are only two Christian parties—the Sacramentalists and the Spiritualists. If the analysis is true, Quakerism is Spiritualism pure and simple. It is as much opposed to the Lutheran as to the Catholic, and for many years its practice exhibited a thoroughgoing consistency with the inevitable deductions from its central dogma. If there must be dissent from the Church, it has the distinction of being in the completest dissidence, and of resting on a universal truth. It is easy to imagine a religious Churchman of logical mind regarding it as the only possible alternative to orthodoxy. But, if we may judge from the evidence of this Book of Discipline, this doctrine has ceased to be the differentia of Quakerism. The exhortations to read and study the Bible are as repeated and urgent as Churchman or Dissenter could desire; but this is not the point. What is to be noticed is not the presence of these precepts, but the absence of others; there are very few reminders of the once characteristic tenet, no intimation that the Bible itself is to be subjected to the inner light in every reader. The portion of the volume assigned to the special truth of Quakerism is absolutely as well as relatively small, and no reader of its purely religious parts would imagine that they were the exponents of a creed so individualized and unique; they would seem rather the utterances of a moderate and pious Evangelicism.

Except in the cases of those who have joined the Churches of England or of Rome, or have become "Christians unattached," we believe that this is what the religion of the Friends has issued in. It has shared the fate of their social customs and emblems. It has been modified by (and perhaps, too, has modified) its surroundings, and is now going through the process of being merged in them. Yet there are Quakers still staunch in their religious dissidence, though undistinguishable in their outer life. Though the sect is moribund, the men whom it has bred are a force in the world, and exhibit in literature, politics, and philanthropy the effects of the bracing discipline of their creed and customs for the last two centuries.

SIX CENTURIES OF WORK AND WAGES.*

THERE are (putting works of fiction out of the question) three classes of interesting writers, and there is no fourth; though almost every writer who is interesting belongs in point of interest to more than one of them. There is the writer—no doubt the highest kind—whose style is the important point, and who, whether he writes about broomsticks, or about the fall of empires, about the rose and the milk of Celia's cheeks, or about the circumstances in which it is casuistically justifiable not to fast, is always important and delightful. Him no age withers and no custom stales, and he is as perfectly sure of appreciation for ever as he is to-day or yesterday. Then there is the writer who has the faculty of masterly argument, no matter what premisses he may assume, and he also has a tolerably sure though a much narrower audience. And lastly, there is the man who knows a great many facts, and can put them lucidly, whether he can or cannot draw conclusions from them, or write delightfully about them. He has the least secure and lasting hold on an audience, but he has also the widest range of subject, and there is room for a great deal more of him.

To this last class Mr. Thorold Rogers belongs; and it is because he belongs to it that his singular weakness in reasoning and his alarming faults of taste may be, and are when he confines himself to the subjects which he does know, forgotten for the time, if not altogether condoned. It is not very easy even to forget them, for he generally takes very good care to bring them to mind. But by sufficiently good-natured and well-practised persons they can be ignored. Never accept a political remark from Mr. Rogers for it is sure to be worthless. Never accept a fact from Mr. Rogers out of his own special subject and period, for it is more than likely to be inexact. Treat all kinds of "flings" from Mr. Rogers on all kinds of subjects as the Russian censors do English newspapers, by carefully obliterating them from the mind's view. Remember when Mr. Rogers makes any statement of an æsthetic kind that he has got no taste; when he makes any statement of a religious kind that he belongs to a sect in which there are two Church members, and that Mr. Rogers is "no that sure of John." By this process you will have a really valuable residuum. For Mr. Rogers is one of the very few people who partially, it may be, and from a single point of view, do know the English middle ages, who have really taken pains to know them, and who (though he himself has often made his valuable knowledge subservient to very valueless deductions) have yet that honest love of a favourite subject which makes it nearly impossible for a man wholly to pervert his knowledge, or sink it in order to favour his prejudices. When Mr. Rogers speaks of the seventeenth and later centuries, even when he speaks of the sixteenth, he may be put aside altogether. But when he speaks of the period before the Renaissance in England, he is not to be poohpoohed, though of course he is still to be taken with many grains of salt. Nor is this the only point of interest about him. For it will always remain a very interesting problem how a man who has such a genuine and intelligent love of learning should have adopted such ludicrous political views, and how a man with such ludicrous political views can have bent himself to such genuine study of the very period which to any one who has political eyes in his political head is sufficient to make those views untenable. We can quite understand "my friend, Mr. Jesse Collings," as Mr. Rogers somewhere calls him, being a Radical; we can quite understand Mr. Chamberlain being a Radical (or anything else which came handy); we can even understand Mr. John Morley being a Radical, inasmuch as he has devoted himself to a special study of that period of human history which, looked at by itself, would make almost any one detest kings and lords and bishops. But in Mr. Rogers's case, who has devoted himself to the period which is the triumph of the aristocratic and ecclesiastical principle, and who admits fully the beneficial results of that principle in detail, Radicalism most certainly is not justified of her child. It must have given him a great deal of trouble to arrive at this point of wrongheadedness. "Such perversity, sir, is not in nature."

Mr. Rogers's present volumes consist in part of a working up into continuous narrative and argumentative form of the data given in his History of Prices, in part of a similar working up of similar data collected from other writers for the period since Elizabeth's reign to the present day. He tells us that he has (though they are not published) data as full as those of the History of Prices up to the reign of Anne; from that time forward he admits second-hand and scattered authority. From reading his book, and indeed from previous knowledge, we should say that the facts on which he rests his account of work and wages during the last three centuries are very much less numerous, very much less trustworthy, and, above all, very much less exhaustive, than those on which he bases his account of work and wages during the first. Indeed, though there are valuable facts here and there, the greater part of the second volume (the book is bound in two volumes, but is paged continuously) is scarcely of much value. The accounts of the actual history of the subject are desultory, piecemeal, insufficient; there is far more of mere opinion (which, as has been said, is always, or almost always, worthless with Mr. Rogers); and there are long passages of declamation against Tories, Turks, ground landowners, the University of Oxford, &c. &c., which contrast curiously with the general sobriety of the earlier part, where the author has plenty to say and has contented himself with saying it. As it may be thought unfair thus to set at nought Mr. Rogers's reasoning power without giving chapter and verse, let us do this once for all. At the close of his book he reverts to that fertile source of delusions, the cause of Mr. Hyndman's economic mania, the prosperity of the English lower classes in the fifteenth century. "I can discover," says Mr. Rogers very gravely, "no other cause for this remarkable material progress beyond the universal associations of labour." Yet he himself throughout his earlier chapters has given, and in this place partly refers to, causes enough independent of any such associations for the very greatest prosperity. The Black Death had thinned off superfluous population, and that curse of all growing and healthy nations except in their infancy was further kept down by the Hundred Years' War. The war did not interfere with English trade, but, on the contrary, somewhat extended it. It brought a good deal of "loot" into the country; it prevented, as the Wars of the Roses subsequently prevented, political oppression; the seasons (Mr. Rogers admits this) were extraordinarily favourable; the monasteries at their richest, if not at the highest point of their spiritual health, provided a vast system of gratuitous poor relief. Comfort had not become luxury with the well-to-do laity; and the vast, well-endowed, and powerful corporation of the clergy at once provided a professional opening for intelligent youths of all classes and did not burden the nation with posterity. Every circumstance favourable to prosperity was present, by Mr. Rogers's own statements, and certainly to his knowledge; and yet he can "discover no cause" of it beyond associations of labour (i.e. trade and agricultural unions), and apparently, though he is no Georgite, can hope for no return of it except through an upsetting of the present social system of England and the throwing of increased taxation on the land.

As a political guide or authority, therefore, Mr. Rogers cannot be said to exist. He is only a crotcheteer, who has less excuse than some other crotcheteers in that, unlike them, he need not make crotchet do duty for knowledge unless he likes. But his picture in the first three or four hundred pages of the condition of the lower and middle classes in England during the middle ages—a picture whose details may be familiar to scholars, but which will be certainly novel to the general reader—has great interest and merit. Mr. Rogers has done for England what M. Simeon Luce has less elaborately done for France. He has abolished the conception dear to the eighteenth and early nineteenth century, and not abandoned by half-instructed people now, of the misery of the middle ages. The one thing that he has still against them is that they were dirty, and we fear, according to modern standards at least, that an honest champion well read in mediæval literature can make only partial head against this very unpleasant charge. They were dirty not so much in the persons of the people, for they bathed pretty frequently, as in their houses, their clothes, &c. The Parkes Museum of Hygiene certainly did not exist then. So also they had, for want of turnips, to eat a great deal of unwholesome salt meat, and the salt was not good. But when these two drawbacks are allowed for, there is absolutely no doubt that the life of the ordinary peasant or the ordinary town craftsman, at most times between the reign of John and the reign of Henry VII., was a more comfortable life in every way than the life of the compeers of either now. They were less hardly worked, more plentifully fed, not much less comfortably lodged, more solidly if less showily and neatly clothed. They had a vast deal more leisure and infinitely greater variety of amusement. They were not so well educated, perhaps, if any one sets great store by School Board education. But for this infirmity a wise man's moan will soon be made. What with the Church, the Universities, and the wars, they had a very fair chance of rising in the world. The commander of the garrison of Norwich, who was killed in Litester's revolt, a knight and in a position of great trust, was a serf by birth. Also, despite the recent evidence of Peterborough Tower, they did much better work of some kinds than we manage to do now, and they did it, as Mr. Rogers shows, after making the amplest allowance for the difference in the value of money, much more cheaply. The general social arrangements of the rural districts were of a rather complicated and a decidedly well-arranged kind. There were not strictly speaking many yeomen. Mr. Rogers's loose expressions about every man being a landowner, which have misled poor Mr. Hyndman, mean simply that most men had land at a fixed rent of money and service which it was not usual to disturb. But the prevalent system by which the landlord supplied stock as well as land, with careful covenants as to loss and deterioration, and the elaborate profit and loss accounts which were kept, undoubtedly knitted the whole nation into a community of interest impossible where landlord and tenant are on a different footing. Often the landlords took large tracts into their own cultivation—a practice which in these days of Ground Game Acts, Agricultural Holdings Acts, and other devices for making a modus vivendi between landlord and tenant impossible, might very well be revived. The prevalence of common land at the time has been ignorantly talked of as an argument against present arrangements; it would hardly be of much use now, and is more than compensated by the increased acreage available for more profitable husbandry. Indeed, to any one reading Mr. Rogers's book without Mr. Rogers's prejudices, the secret of mediæval prosperity is as clear as the fact. We need not say bluntly that in those days they hung Radicals and burnt political dissenters. This would be an alarming way of putting the thing. But it would be more reasonable and nearer the truth than Mr. Rogers's astounding discovery that Trade-Unions produced what by his own account was obviously due to an entirely different and indeed opposed set of causes. Trade-Unions of the mediæval kind may have had some merits, but they could only regulate, not cause, the prosperity which came from other sources.

HOLMES'S HISTORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.*

AN author who at this epoch rewrites the history of a struggle which has been told as a whole by two well-known authors, and in isolated parts by half a score of others, must be prepared to justify his attempt. He may show, for instance, that previous narratives are one-sided, prejudiced, or erroneous. He may have discovered letters, or diaries, or some new matter of vast and varied importance. He may rely on personal experiences of Indian administration and on the part which he himself played in some of the scenes of 1857. We do not gather that Mr. Holmes rests his case on any one of the above pleas. He is industrious, and he has consulted blue-books, Parliamentary papers, biographies, articles in magazines and reviews and weekly journals, and narratives of particular campaigns to a very great extent. He writes in an animated style; and his descriptions of scenery, sieges, the pluck shown by a few resolute Englishmen against overwhelming odds, has spirited and in the main correct. We do not disagree, except in a few notable instances, with the praise or censure awarded to the men who, from position or character, really had much to do with shaping the course of Indian history. And the title selected by him for his work shows that he appreciates the nature of the uprising which he undertakes to describe. It was in truth a mutiny of petted and ungrateful Sepoys, accompanied by "disturbances among the civil population." It was not a protest of aggrieved caste or oppressed nationality. Moreover, Mr. Holmes puts all he has to say into one volume as compact and connected as is possible for a writer who has to describe remote scenes and to jump from one Presidency to another, from Lucknow to Delhi, and from Bombay to Eastern Bengal.

It is tolerably clear to us that Mr. Holmes has never served in any Indian department, or surveyed the country with the confident spirit of a tourist of six months. Nor do we wish to lay much stress on such mistakes or defects as the following. The magistrate of Agra, at the outbreak of the Mutiny, was not the Hon. E. Drummond, but his brother Mr. Robert Drummond. The former never served in the Upper Provinces at all until his appointment as Lieutenant-Governor of Agra by the late Lord Elgin. A Tahsildar is, no doubt, a head native revenue officer, who is responsible, we may add, for the collection of a couple of lacks of rupees; but a Pergunnah is not a county or anything like it. The term Zillah more corresponds to our county; a Pergunnah is almost equal, roughly, to the Hundred. To describe a Nazir as a "high native official employed in a judicial court," is almost obscurum per obscurius. The Nazir is the official who issues processes, keeps the roll of witnesses and announces their arrival, makes out lists of unclaimed property and stray cattle, and carries out public sales by the Court's order, just outside the Kutcherry. We are startled to hear that the Brahmans of Calcutta are "the most cunning and the most formidable of their order," and that they exercised a bad influence over their brethren in the North-Western Provinces. That the Mukarjis, Chaturjis, Banerjis, and others are astute, proud, and litigious, is generally admitted; but they have very little connexion with the Miars and Dhobes of Upper India. And the educated classes in Bengal, when once thoroughly awakened to the excesses of the Sepoys, were certainly not active in disloyalty. They were passive, acquiesced in the British rule, and gave no trouble. The printer, we apprehend, is responsible for the insertion of a wrong letter in a quotation from the Second Æneid, which makes the late Mr. J. Colvin guilty of a false quantity and spoils a line. For spes ulla vivendi, the schoolboy &c. reads videndi.

We cannot go through a review of events now tolerably familiar to most readers. They have been told before and may bear telling again. Our main charge against Mr. Holmes is that in treating of one or two important junctures he exaggerates or miscalculates their importance. He does not always perceive the real force of a blow struck or of an error retrieved. Let us take, for instance, the effect of the fall of Delhi in September 1857. At p. 367 he seems to admit the vital necessity of its capture. As long as it held out there was a "general disbelief in the vitality of the British power," and it was being followed by "general disaffection." But at p. 407, after the successful assault, he minimizes the fact and asserts "that the only positive and unmistakable benefit which resulted from it was the removal of the strain under which the loyalty of the Punjab had nearly given way." Here we join issue with the author. The capture of Imperial Delhi, the city of so many splendid historical associations, held by thousands of revolted Sepoys, who for three months had paralysed the efforts of our small force on "the ridge," was the turning-point of the year and indeed of the Mutiny. It is perfectly true that a great deal remained to be done after Nicolson's death. The garrison of Lucknow had to be carried off in safety; the whole Province of Oude had to be reconquered; Rohilcund was in arms; and the Moulavi in one place, Tantia Topi in another, and Koer Sing in a third, were by no means put down. But every administrator, from the Lieutenant-Governor at Lahore to the isolated district officer on the frontiers of Eastern Bengal, knew that to take Delhi was to retain the Empire; to fail in the assault meant retirement to the ships in the Hooghly on the part of those not massacred or hunted down in detail. Macaulay, in the second of his two essays on Pitt, says that nothing more was necessary to silence a whole roomful of boasting Frenchmen than to drop a hint of the probability that the great commoner would return to power. After his successes, it has been also said, Englishmen could again look one another in the face without shame. The fall of Delhi produced with Anglo-Indian residents a precisely similar effect. A short-lived triumph had been enjoyed on the premature announcement of its capture when our troops first appeared before it in June. A terrible reaction followed on the discovery of the truth. The tension on the minds of the whole English community during the weeks of July and August that elapsed after the Cawnpore and Futtehgarh massacres and other dismal events, will never be forgotten. With the recapture of Delhi, Englishmen breathed freely, and no one—except the worst alarmists and crokers—had the least doubt of our ultimate success. Similarly at p. 580 we are told that Sir Hugh Rose in June 1858, after his splendid march across Central India with all its combinations and victories, heard of an event "the news of which caused through India a sensation hardly less than that caused by the news of the first mutinies." We were really puzzled to hit on the particular tragedy which is said to have sent such a thrill throughout India, but we make out from the next chapter but one, that Mr. Holmes alludes to the defection of Sindia's army. The fact was not without its significance, and the occupation of Gwalior by the rebels did add to our complications. But by that time India had become rather callous to these sensational events. We had by that time more than one very able commander and plenty of soldiers from England. And seeing that Sindia's army rebelled about the end of May, and that it was thoroughly beaten, cowed, and dispersed by the 20th of June, there was not much time for the news, however "startling," to produce a serious effect. The truth is the fall of Delhi was like the old Greek proverb about one-half of anything. It was more even than the whole. And no one who reflected that that city had been recovered by the aid of English troops already in India at the outbreak and Sikhs and Goorkhas, ever doubted that, with the reinforcements since sent from England, the reconquest of Lucknow, the recovery of Oudh and Rohilcund, and the dispersement of guerilla warriors, desperate Sepoys, and plundering Dacoits, however arduous tasks, were mere matters of time, to be settled by one or at most two campaigns. At page 156 Mr. Holmes seems to imply that in June 1857, immediately after the outbreak, Brigadier Wilson at Meerut might have done something to help Mr. Colvin, who was severely tried at Agra. That nothing was done by a commander who had British artillery, rifles, and dragoons, to preserve his own station is true enough. But it is unreasonable to suppose that any help could have then been sent right down the Doab to protect the seat of the Government of the North-West Provinces. There was quite enough to do in watching Meerut Bolundshahr and keeping up the communication with the Hills and the Punjab.

To divers eminent administrators Mr. Holmes does not do full justice. The late Mr. Dorin, then in Council, is credited with more foresight and capacity than we should be inclined to allow. Sir J. P. Grant is termed a "clever bureaucrat, not a statesman." Lord Beaconsfield, we may remind Mr. Holmes, bestowed the highest praise on Mr. Grant's Minute regarding the annexation of Oudh, and those who are really cognizant of his career and character know that he was very far removed from the typical governor who goes by the rules of sealing-wax and red tape. On some of Lord Canning's acts Mr. Holmes passes no judgment at all. We cannot be sure whether he endorses that statesman's wise refusal to proclaim martial law in Bengal. There never was the smallest necessity for the adoption of any such stringent measure in the Lower Provinces, nor was there any emergency with which the established tribunals, fortified by plenary powers of life and death, were not perfectly competent to deal. The Gagging Act, unfortunately passed by Lord Canning and his Council, needlessly irritated the Anglo-Saxon community. It is the old story which the unlucky Ilbert Bill has done so much to revive. To say nothing of ordinary and peaceful times, Englishmen in India in seasons of peril, famine, anarchy, disaffection, and open revolt, will not stand the doctrine of equality. They are there because of their superiority in character, enterprise, and steadfast pursuit of national objects. Their loyalty needs no stimulus and their independent criticism, if not always judicious, must not be gagged by special Acts. In the well-known controversy between the late Lord Lawrence and Sir Herbert Edwardes as to whether it was better in the last extremity to abandon Peshawur or to retire temporarily from the siege of Delhi, Mr. Holmes has not the least hesitation in roundly asserting "that it would have been wiser to choose the latter alternative." We have already given reasons for showing that Mr. Holmes has formed a very inaccurate estimate of the state of affairs at Delhi, and of the importance attached to its capture by wavering Rajas and Nawabs. It is fortunate, as he says, that the choice never became necessary. But since the publication of Mr. Bosworth Smith's life, an English officer of rank and experience has lately expressed to us his decided conviction that Lord Lawrence was right and Edwardes wrong about Peshawur and Delhi. On another point Mr. Holmes delivers an equally unhesitating judgment. The Commissioner of the division had issued an order directing the district officers at Gaya and Mozuffarpore to come in to headquarters and bring their treasure with them; and we are told that "no measure had been more sagacious than this." It is perhaps fortunate that instances of this peculiar sagacity were rare in other parts of India. The Empire as a whole was saved, not because men hastily abandoned their posts, but because they stuck to them until the crackling of bungalows in flames and the roar of gaol-birds let loose on a passive community distinctly proclaimed that nothing more could be done. Mr. Holmes, writing a quarter of a century after these events, is too given to this tone of lofty superiority. He has missed an opportunity at the close of his work. There was a tempting field for any writer in the reconstitution of authority, in the treatment of chiefs who had met us in the field or been loyal and wavering in turns, and generally in the noble, firm, and conciliatory policy of Lord Canning. But very possibly he may have thought this task rather beyond his powers. The concluding chapter, in which he tries to explain the origin of the Mutiny and to apportion blame to various parties, is not unfair in many points. And one sentence has a really good ring about it. "If we had not been able to quell the Indian Mutiny, it would have been a plain proof that we had no business to be in India." And we may rely on it that if we are not to have something as trying in its way as a revolt of Sepoys, if India is not to become restive and unmanageable, we shall do well not to propound platitudes about "inequalities," "distinctions," or "sweeping away" old landmarks and discriminating laws. The last number of the Edinburgh Review, after impressing caution and foresight in carrying out the most obvious and elementary reforms, has some very sensible remarks on the impolicy of talking about the eventual "autonomy" of India, and propounding as a thesis for "academic debate" the "moral justification of our government" there. Lord Ripon and his advisers may not be greasing cartridges with the wrong fat or laying the foundations of a second rising of Pandays, Pathans, and Poorbeas; but it is quite certain that, if they persist in their career of reckless change, they will soon furnish Mr. Holmes and gentlemen of his research and enterprise with fresh materials for an unpleasant and discreditable chapter of history.

THE GOLD-HEADED CANE.*

IN a glass case in the Library of the College of Physicians there is exhibited a gold-headed cane, which has been the caduceus of five illustrious medicine men in turn. As a rule, says Dr. Munk, the cane which was carried by the profession had a round top, sometimes of gold, sometimes of silver, "but in later times generally of ivory." There was a reason for this shape, it appears. At first the top did duty, not only as a handle, but as a vinaigrette as well, being hollow within and perforate without, to the end that it might contain a quantity of Marseilles, or Four Thieves, Vinegar, which was supposed to be a powerful disinfectant, and which your Æsculapius, when he came within scenting distance of disease, would give his nose from his cane's head, as from a smelling-bottle. The Cane of the Five Doctors, however, has a common crutch handle, and is therefore not representative, nor strictly professional. The reason is that its first master was the famous Radcliffe, who, being "a rule to himself," and "at all times impatient under the conventional usages of his order," is supposed to have preferred the crutch handle to the knob, or globe, in something of that spirit of originality which impelled him, at the very beginning of his career, to do battle with the Galenists on the great small-pox question, and instead of stoving up his patients to give them air and exhibit "cooling emulsions." From his hands it passed into the keeping of the illustrious Mead, who bequeathed it to Askew, who bequeathed it to William Pitcairn, who bequeathed it to Matthew Baillie, after whose death it passed to the College of Physicians. There, for half a century or so, it "rusted inglorious," forgotten in a cupboard, till at last it was withdrawn from the dishonourable obscurity in which it had slumbered, and placed (with the President's silver caduceus, which was designed and presented by Dr. Caius, and the mace of silver gilt, which is the gift (1684) of Dr. Lawson) in the glass case where it now abides. In its retirement it appears to have dictated to the late Dr. Macmichael certain of its reminiscences of the five great men whose arms are blazoned on its top; and to these, at the instance of Dr. Munk, it has since made some interesting additions. Hence the present volume, written in the severe and formal style to be expected of its author, and containing a vast deal of curious, entertaining, and recondite information.

Radcliffe, the first of the cane's five masters, was in some sort the most successful also. In his day medicine as a science had hardly begun to be. He himself is recorded to have cured a quinsy by setting his two servants to pelt each other with hasty pudding as the very bed of death, by which means the patient was made to laugh, and the quinsy to break; while Bidloo, the Dutch physician attached to the service of William III., could think of nothing better for the boils with which his master was afflicted than to have his legs rubbed night and morning with a mixture of crabs' eyes, flour, and cummin seed. Radcliffe, however, had a great deal of good sense, and was an admirable talker, a fine judge of character, and an accomplished man of the world; he appears, too, to have been a born physician, and to have had a really remarkable gift of prognosis; so that, though he wrote little or nothing, and probably knew no more than many others of his generation, he enjoyed extraordinary popularity and achieved a professional success which has hardly been surpassed by the most eminent practitioners of our own time. He lived gallantly and luxuriously; but the amount of money he made was incredibly large. His apothecary died worth fifty thousand pounds; Dr. Gibbons, who lived hard by, made over a thousand a year from the overflow of his practice; he charged five guineas for a journey from Bloomsbury to Bow; his average receipts were twenty guineas a day, or more than seven thousand a year; he refused a baronetcy, and for a week in the camp at Namur he received a fee of four hundred guineas from his patient, Albemarle, and a gratification of twelve hundred more from Albemarle's master. It is not astonishing that seven years before he died he estimated his fortune, in money and land, at over eighty thousand pounds. His use of this was noble in the extreme. He bequeathed his Yorkshire estate to University College for the foundation of two travelling fellowships and the purchase of perpetual advowsons, together with a further sum of five thousand pounds for the enlargement of the college buildings. He left forty thousand pounds more for the building of what has for over a century been known to the world as the Radcliffe Library. He set apart five hundred pounds a year for ever "towards mending the diet at St. Bartholomew's Hospital." All the rest of his estate he gave to his executors on trust for charitable purposes; and in this way he became responsible—among countless benefactions of greater or less importance—for the Oxford Observatory and Infirmary. Whether or not he was a great healer seems doubtful. That he was a good man and a great benefactor of his kind is unquestionable. So many have shared in his heritage already that their number is hardly to be counted; and his heritage will remain, increasing with time, a blessing upon innumerable generations.

There is much to say, had we space to say it, of Radcliffe's four successors. Mead, for instance—"artis medicæ decus, vitæ revera nobilis"—was a remarkable man in every way; a fine scholar, a good physician, a bibliophile, a collector, a student, the friend of wits and poets, the patron of artists, the prince of good hosts and good fellows. He wrote wisely of quarantine and the sanitary cordon; he was a champion of inoculation, an authority on small-pox and measles; he introduced important innovations into the established treatment of dropsy. He was popular enough to make some five or six thousand a year; but he was so generous and charitable that, though between fifteen and sixteen thousand pounds was realized by the sale of his books and pictures and statues, he left not more than fifty thousand pounds, and "this sum was materially diminished by the payment of his debts." Askew, again, was a scholar, a traveller, a collector of books, marbles, manuscripts, and inscriptions. William Pitcairn, President of the College, was a physician pure and simple; so was Baillie, who, as John Hunter's sister's son, received about the best education at that time to be got. Of each and all of them the Gold-headed Cane has something novel and interesting to record; and they are but a few of the many—Hans Sloane and Dr. Warren, Goddard and Halford, Paris and Arbuthnot and Cheyne—with whom the Gold-headed Cane was brought into contact, immediate or indirect, and of whom it discourses in a manner "worthy of no small meed of praise."

ECONOMIC ENTOMOLOGY.*

NO effort has been made in this country at all comparable with what has been done on the Continent of Europe or in the United States of America towards organizing a scientific scheme of agricultural or economic entomology. It may be that the losses inflicted by the ravages of insects within the limited area of our group of islands and under the more moderate conditions of our insular climate are not such as to force the subject so imperatively upon the attention of the land-cultivating class or of the governing body; but the extent of damage to crops of all kinds by the spread of insect pests is sufficiently established to make it a serious item of calculation as regards the products of cultivation and the consequent well-being of the entire body politic. Of official documents bearing upon this branch of rural economy there is all but a total dearth in this country. There is certainly nothing to compare with the voluminous publications of the French Government relating to the phylloxera disease, or the manifold South-American reports upon the ravages of locusts, those of the Argentine Republic being conspicuously numerous and ample. Still less can our public departments pretend to vie with the support given to this important study by the governing body of the American Union and the several States composing it. The losses inflicted by insects injurious to agriculture within the Union have been put down at from $300,000 to $400,000 annually. The Encyclopædia Americana, now in course of publication, besides giving a succinct report of the most prominent varieties of insect life to which these ravages are due, supplies a list of the American writers and official compilers whose works make up the literature of the subject. Of these the most prominent in the reports are Mr. B. D. Walsh, the first State Entomologist of Illinois; Mr. Townend Glover, of the U.S. Department of Agriculture; and Mr. C. V. Riley, of the State of Missouri. The good work is being actively carried on under Mr. Joseph A. Lintner, the recently appointed State Entomologist of New York, following up the valuable researches of the late Dr. T. W. Harris and Dr. Asa Fitch. A handy little manual for practical use, we may add, has been recently compiled by Mrs. Mary B. Treat, entitled Injurious Insects of the Farm and Garden (New York, 1882). A leading part in the advance of entomology in Europe has from the first been taken by France, the whole literature of the subject dating, it may be said, from the publication of Réaumur's learned and handsome volumes just a century and a half ago. A series of admirable memoirs and reports, conspicuous amongst which are those of M. Guérin Méneville and M. Bazin, attest the spirit of research in that country from that day to this, stimulated of late by the grievous damage to the staple produce of the soil by various forms of insect life. In Germany much valuable work has been done of late by Ratzeburg, Kaltenbach, Altum, Taschbenberg, and other entomologists of mark, whilst in our own country there has for thirty years and upwards been little more than a standstill. So thorough and so trustworthy were the labours of Kirby and Spence that we need hardly be surprised to find their Introduction hold its own as the standard work of science for the students of British entomology, unsurpassed as it is for untiring research, exact observation, and graphic powers of description. As more especially devoted to the economical aspect of insect life, the writings of Mr. John Curtis were not long in establishing for their author a repute which no later rival has had the power nor, we may add, the ambition seriously to set aside. For many years engaged in drawing up reports for the Agricultural Journal, as well as being from the first connected with Dr. Lindley in the compilation of the Gardener's Chronicle, Mr. Curtis found himself prepared with ample data relating to the subject when he was invited by the Royal Agricultural Society not long after its foundation to prepare a series of reports upon the insects affecting the various crops cultivated in Great Britain and Ireland. One main cause of the difficulty in obtaining correct information on the forms of insect life that ravaged our crops was found in the circumstance of the papers which treated of such matters being scattered through rare and expensive works, often written in foreign languages. Twenty years of labour among foreign as well as domestic sources of knowledge qualified Mr. Curtis for the task of giving in detail the history and habits of the insects injurious to our turnip, corn, and other crops, explaining the transformations they undergo in their several stages, from the egg to the perfect state, whether beetle, moth, or fly; with the addition of whatever remedies for suppressing or checking the ravages of insects obnoxious to the farmer have been discussed or found practically effective. Farm Insects, in which he gave an exhaustive account of the natural history and economy of these pests of the vegetable world, with suggestions for their destruction, was accepted at once as the standard work upon the subject, and has for five-and-thirty years kept its place as the indispensable book of reference for every practical farmer and country gentleman. As it has been for some time out of print, a reissue of the book will be looked upon as a boon not only by this class of readers, but by all who take an intelligent interest in natural history, as well as in the economic bearings of field labour. Although we could have wished to see it so far remodelled as to incorporate the more important gains to science that have resulted from the labours of our entomologists during the intervening period, we cannot withhold our concurrence with the publisher's advertisement that the present reprint needs no apology, it being in the opinion of leading authorities fairly exhaustive of the subject, and both in its arrangement of matter and style of treatment leaving little to be desired. The original steel plates, which are exquisite specimens of the art of the graver, retain all their freshness and beauty, and the impressions coloured by hand add appreciably from an artistic no less than from a scientific point of view to the value of the book.

No crop is infested by a more varied or destructive array of enemies than the turnip. A picture is drawn by Mr. Curtis which may well appal the heart of an intending agriculturist. "First the ants run off with an incredible quantity of the seeds. Then come two sorts of turnip-fly, the striped and the brassy, which destroy the tender leaves as soon as they burst from the ground. At the same time, we have the maggot of a fly and the wire-worm both living upon the young roots, and also a large caterpillar or grub when they are more advanced. Then follow armies of black caterpillars, reducing the leaves to skeletons, and the blight of the plant-louse, together with a minute moth, to which we may add also a couple of weevils, which cause the lumps or excrescences on the bulbs, with slugs, snails, and mildew bringing up the rear." The natural history of each of these pests of the turnip-field is discussed in a succession of chapters, beginning with the saw-fly and its black caterpillar, under various vernacular names of evil omen, as Black Jack, Black Palmer, Black Canker, &c., swarms of which have been known to be wafted to our eastern coasts from no less a distance than Norway, or, as surmised by some authorities, from Russia, darkening the air and lying two inches thick upon the ground. It is not to be confused with the turnip-beetle, which belongs to the order of Coleoptera, the saw-fly being included among the Hymenoptera. Of this order there is an extensive family called Tenthredinidæ, made up of several genera, one of which is termed Athalia, comprising six or seven species, natives of Great Britain. To this genus belongs our turnip-fly, named by Fabricius Athalia spinarum. Its anatomy and stages of development are graphically depicted in Plate B, as well as in clearly drawn woodcuts inserted in the text, by aid of which the agriculturist need have little difficulty in detecting the presence of the enemy on leaf or bulb.

Not so common or so destructive among the saw-flies, and not observed by any English entomologist before Curtis, though made known by M. Dugaigneau, a skilful agriculturist of the department of the Loire, in the year 1819, is Cephus pygmæus, the Corn Saw-fly (Plate I.) The currant, the gooseberry, the pine leaf, and even grass have their several enemies among the saw-flies. Other species, as Tenthredo scrophulariæ, T. viridis, and others, are not satisfied with vegetable food, but prey upon soft-bodied insects, and will even attack the Telephori, the larvæ being phytivorous, the imago insectivorous. Further infesters of turnip crops are plant-lice, maggots of divers flies, caterpillars of moths, wire-worms, and the click-beetles they produce, the last-named enemy being the most fatal to the farmer's prospects and the most difficult to overcome, their ravages extending to corn crops, potatoes, cabbages, and the roots and stems of flowers. The general reader may be surprised to learn that there are nearly seventy species of beetles in this country which are the parents of wire-worms. Not more than eleven of these species, however, are held by Mr. Curtis to demand attention. They belong to the order Coleoptera, forming the family Elaterides and the genus Elater of Linnæus, which has been divided into several others by more recent naturalists. Their characteristic difference of structure, function, and habit will be readily made out by the aid of Mr. Curtis's clear descriptions and delineations. As to the means of coping with these and the other multitudinous pests of the farmstead and the garden, it can hardly be said that the resources of science are such as to encourage a very lively degree of hope. Every suggestion that seemed intrinsically plausible or that had to any fair extent the voucher of experience has its place in Mr. Curtis's pages; but he is too cautious to commit himself to any specific nostrum, either of the chemical laboratory or of any artificial agency soever. With all the advances made since his time by the aid of our agricultural colleges or by the researches and practical trials of experts, we are far from seeing our way to a code of rules which may keep the agriculturist safe from the invasion of insect pests or rid him of them when they have settled upon his crops. Efficacious as many a remedy may be found when brought to bear as an isolated experiment or within limited conditions, the difficulty of applying it on a wide scale or under varying circumstances of soil and climate may prove in practice insuperable. Nitrate of soda, chloride of lime, refuse of gas-works, salt, soot, alcohol, petroleum, may be each and all sovereign cures, can they only be brought to bear upon the insidious swarms of the enemy with wide enough range and without ruinous expense. Hand-picking, upon which our author most confidently relies against such pests as the wire-worm, has become subject to the embarrassment that the boys and girls on whose eyes and fingers he counted will be at the present hour preoccupied with the first or second standard in the Board school, whilst women's work has doubtless risen in the industrial market to a grade above that of gathering grubs and maggots. It is in the realm of animal life that the farmer and the gardener may most hopefully look for his saving friends. The robin, the wagtail, the blackbird, the thrush, and other small birds with a list of which the schedule under the Protection Act has made us familiar, turkeys, ducks, and fowls, above all the patient rook, will be found his most trustworthy allies. Aphides and other parasites which form the nemesis of these enemies of man's well-being may be encouraged in their withering powers of propagation. The alternation of crops is to be carefully studied. White mustard seed, for instance, the acrid roots of which appear to be too much for the wire-worm, may be sown with effect for a season in place of the corn or turnip crops. Practical hints of this kind, too numerous for us to particularize, make Mr. Curtis's pages as useful a manual for the agriculturist as he can place for reference upon his bookshelf.

Miss Ormerod's devotion to the study of insect life, her unflagging industry in collecting materials, and her unmistakable talent for putting into a popular form the results of scientific research, invest all she writes with an interest and a value which even experts will be prompt to recognize; her reports and addresses forming a welcome auxiliary to labours of a more original kind, and on a scale of more imposing magnitude. Without pretending to high rank as a primary investigator of nature, her assiduity and her aptitude for accumulating and imparting knowledge have won her a recognized position in the eyes of the public as Consulting Entomologist of the Royal Agricultural Society, and Special Lecturer on Economic Entomology at the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester. Ten lectures lately delivered for the Institute of Agriculture have been made up into a handy little Guide to Methods of Insect Life, with hints for the prevention and cure of insect ravage. Preferring common English terms to technical language, she makes herself intelligible to readers of ordinary capacity, condensing into the briefest form the results of wide and accurate study. Besides the writings of Curtis, many of whose woodcuts she has had permission to borrow, she here acknowledges obligations to Messrs. Newman, Westwood, Buckton, Rye, and other leading students of entomology, as well as to Dr. J. R. Schiner's Fauna Austriaca and the Reports of Professor J. H. Comstock, of Cornell University, U.S.A. We know no book at all comparable with it in size that we can more confidently recommend to beginners as an introduction to the study of insect life, whether as a branch of natural history or as an element in rural economy.

SOME AMERICAN BOOKS.

We have already remarked the extreme fulness, completeness, and minuteness characteristic of the American Census. The Reports of 1880 are not yet apparently by any means complete. It would seem that at least one-half the decennial period must be expected to elapse before the enormous mass of figures, collected in the course of a few weeks or months with amazing pains and still more amazing facility and accuracy from so vast an area, can be arranged, summarized, digested, studied, and their bearing explained by the various officers of the department entrusted with this laborious task. Each quarto volume contains several hundred pages, the two before us nine hundred and eleven hundred respectively. The volumes before us are nominally the third and fourth; but these are by no means the only documents in which the special results of the Census have been embodied. Vol. III. deals with the Agriculture of the United States (1), and specially with cereals and tobacco. It contains no fewer than seventeen maps, showing the distribution of the culture of tobacco, grain in general, wheat, Indian corn, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, the comparative yield per acre and per capita; as well as a number of plates illustrating a detailed description of an improved flour-mill of the latest type. The total number of farms in the United States in 1870 was 2,660,000; in 1880 it amounted to almost exactly four millions. This total, it would seem, is the number of farms in private ownership, and does not embrace the large areas of public land held under what is called the ranche system—that is, it is exclusive of the great cattle and sheep farms of Texas, Dacotah, and other States and Territories, which form so interesting and important an element of American farming industry. It includes Southern "plantations," but no garden, or holding less than three acres, unless at least 500 dollars worth of produce has been sold off from it during the year. The largest numbers of farms are, as might be expected, found in Illinois, Ohio, New York, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, the first of which has 256,000, the last 213,000. Of the Southern States, Texas has 174,000; Kentucky and Tennessee about 166,000 each; California scarcely 36,000. The average acreage of the farms, including both improved and unimproved land, is 134; the total area 536 millions of acres, out of an entire land surface estimated at 1,856 millions. In many of the older, and especially of the prairie States, Illinois and Indiana for example, nearly the whole territory, probably almost every acre of available land, is if not under tillage already appropriated and occupied in farms; while in Missouri the proportion is but 28 out of 44 millions; in Maine 6½ out of 19, and in California less than 17 out of 100 millions of acres. It is calculated that out of 10,000 farms, nearly three-fourths are cultivated by their owners, 800 let for a fixed money rental, and 1,750 for a share of the produce. Of the whole farm-land of the United States, 223 millions of acres are under tillage, nearly 62 millions are permanent pastures, orchards, or vineyards; and 251 millions consist of woodland or other unimproved land, including reclaimed land which has been allowed to relapse. Incomparably the largest cereal crop is that of Indian corn, amounting to 1,750 million bushels; next comes that of wheat, 460, and that of oats, 407 millions. The total cotton crop of 1880 is estimated at about 5¾ million bales, raised from about 14½ millions of acres; to which Mississippi contributed 963,000, and Georgia and Texas over 800,000 bales a-piece. Virginia, Missouri, and Kentucky are Cotton States in scarcely more than name. On the other hand, Kentucky raised no less than 171 million pounds of tobacco; Virginia 80; and Pennsylvania, the third State on the list, only 37 million. The acreage under hay, now given for the first time, exceeds 30 millions. The hay harvest of 1879 amounted to no less than 37 millions of tons, as against 27 in 1869, and 19 in 1859. The number of horses, mules, and asses increased from about 8¼ millions in 1870 to somewhat over 12 millions in 1880; that of milch cows from about 9 to about 12½ millions; that of other cattle from 13¼ to 22½, of sheep from 28½ to 35, and of swine from 25 to 47½ millions. It is noteworthy that the number of the latter, less than that of sheep by more than three millions in the former period, now equals that of sheep and milch cows together. It is a yet more striking fact, however, that the total estimated value of the live stock was nominally about the same at both periods, though the number had increased so greatly. Both in 1870 and 1880 the entire live farm stock of the United States was estimated at about 1,500 millions of dollars. Allowing fully for the inflation of paper money at the former period, this would imply a real increase of possibly 20 to 25 per cent., exactly the calculated increase in the value of the farms themselves. It is evident, then, that the average value both of farm land and stock has considerably fallen, though allowance must be made, of course, for a somewhat greater proportion of unimproved, or partially improved, land at the later date. Vol. IV. gives the statistics of American Railroads (2): a total mileage of somewhat less than 88,000, under the management of 631 Companies. An average dividend of 2·70 per cent. upon the nominal capital, with interest at an average of 5½ on the funded debt, indicates a period of depression. The total number of railway stockholders is supposed to reach 300,000, with an average holding of about 8,700 dollars apiece. Two hundred and ninety millions of tons were carried on an average 111 miles, at a cost of three-quarters of a cent per ton per mile; 270 million passengers were carried an average distance of 21 miles at a cost of about 1¾ cent. The net receipts were 0·53 cent per ton per mile, and 0·8 cent per passenger per mile. The number of killed and injured is alarmingly large. In the course of the twelve months 2,541 persons lost their lives, 5,674 were more or less seriously injured, on the railways of the United States. The Companies, indeed, affirm that only 364 were killed and 1,438 injured through causes beyond their own control. A closer examination of the figures shows that what are almost exclusively known as "railway accidents" in this country caused the smallest part of this terrible "butcher's bill." The number of passengers killed was 143, that of employés 923; while 1,475 "others"—neither passengers nor railway servants—were killed on the lines. No one who has travelled on American railroads will be at a loss to understand the meaning of these figures.

Collisions are not more frequent than in this country; probably, on the whole, much less so; while accidents through the fall of bridges, defective rails and engines are of course more common, American railways being much more lightly constructed, and the trains travelling on an average at perhaps half the English rate. But lines running without fence or protection, not only through woods, prairies, and farms, but through the streets of villages and even of cities, are a source of peril to the community at large, such as in this crowded country could not be tolerated for a moment. It is a significant fact that, while the total number of injured is more than double the number of killed, while nearly four passengers and employés are injured for each one slain outright, the number of others killed and injured respectively is exactly equal. Naturally half at least of the men, women, or children run over by a train are mortally hurt.

Mr. Wiebe's manual of the Kindergarten system (3) is an exceedingly convenient and practical description of the principles, methods, and mechanism of the Kindergarten proper. With this in hand any parent or governess could procure without difficulty the very simple apparatus required for the object lessons in their due order; and, understanding the spirit and meaning of the system, would find no difficulty in carrying it out literally, or varying it as experience might suggest.

Dr. Hague's essay upon Emerson (4) contains some personal details regarding the mystagogue's earlier years, ministerial career, and severance from the Church, not uninteresting to those who have been attracted and not repelled by Mr. Emerson's own writings. The argumentative account of the Emersonian philosophy is less entertaining, and perhaps not much more instructive.

We can do no more than call attention to the papers of the Education Bureau (5), among which is reprinted the Report of the Director of the American School at Athens (6); as also to the Eighth Annual Report of the Johns Hopkins University (7) at Baltimore.

RECENT MUSIC.

THE suggestion which must very often before have presented itself to musical editors and publishers, and which, at any rate, was very forcibly presented not very long ago by Mr. J. F. Crowest in a little book entitled Phases of Musical England, in favour of a so-called performing edition of oratorios and other classical works, has at last been rendered practical by the London Musical Publishing and General Agency Company, who have secured the invaluable services of no less an editor than Sir George Macfarren. The Performing Edition of Handel's Messiah, now lying before us, meets nearly all the objections which have been urged against the many versions of the immortal work which have hitherto been laid before the public. It is almost needless to state that the Messiah as written, and the Messiah as usually performed, differ in very material points; but it is not so generally known that until lately hardly a copy of the oratorio could be obtained which accurately represented the notes which were sung at a performance. Mr. Crowest, in the little book above referred to, after having admitted that it was a great boon to be able to possess a copy of Handel's Messiah at a cheap price, says with truth of his copy, "It is not printed as sung; it is not wholly Handel's music; the text as allotted to the music is often nonsense; neither is it printed in the way it should be played," referring of course to the pianoforte edition. He then proceeds to give various examples in support of his charges which we are bound to acknowledge he fully proves. The first and the last of Mr. Crowest's complaints are completely satisfied in this "Performing Edition," for the variations of rendering, especially in connexion with the use of the appoggiatura instead of the reduplicated note, are indicated in a smaller staff above the passages where they occur, and the chords accompanying recitatives here stand at the point in the bar at which they are to be played, making it now almost impossible for an inexperienced accompanyist to render a singer's efforts futile. With regard to the two other charges, we think that even Mr. Crowest will acknowledge that much (perhaps some purists may say too much) has been done to meet his views. To demand that the music should be wholly Handel's is certainly too exacting, seeing that the composer, as is well known, left the score in a very incomplete state, so incomplete indeed that the accompaniments we now listen to are largely due to the pen of Mozart, but at the same time we do think that the text as allotted to the music in some instances would be the better for careful editing. Sir George Macfarren has not hesitated in some of the more evident cases to exercise the powers of editor, and in the air "He shall feed His flock" has suggested, for the correction stands printed above the passage, an alteration which will commend itself to all who have noticed the awkwardness consequent upon the position of the words with which it opens. Strange to say, however, he has passed by the absurd effect which is produced by the rest after the word "Behold" in the air "Behold and see," and which he would have been perfectly justified in altering, as few singers sing the piece as it is written. "The pianoforte arrangement of the instrumental accompaniments," the editor tells us, "has been a delicate and difficult task"—a task which all who know Sir G. Macfarren's reverential love for the music of the great master will not be surprised to hear is accomplished with consummate skill and learning. To have attempted to give all Mozart's beautiful orchestral effects, or Handel's extraordinary contrapuntal figures, would have resulted in failure in a work intended for practical purposes, and indeed it may well be doubted if it were possible to do so in a pianoforte arrangement; but enough has been retained or indicated to give a very faithful impression of the original accompaniments without making them troublesome to play or obtrusive in effect. The editor has done something also to preserve the original, or at any rate the now accepted, tempi of the movements, by adding a metronomic indication to each, a deed which will deserve the gratitude of posterity, even if it is resented by the somewhat reckless innovators of the present day. Those numbers which are generally omitted in performance are to be found in an appendix at the end of this edition, and the markings of piano and forte so scantly vouchsafed in the original are modestly supplied by the editor enclosed in brackets, which, considering the authority from which they emanate, will command the attention which is due to them, while the admirable "Historical and Analytical Preface" will be of the greatest value to all earnest students of the work. The "Performing Edition" of the Messiah certainly supplies a want which has long been felt, and we think that we do not err in recommending it as perhaps the most useful of the many editions which have hitherto appeared.

Messrs. W. Morley & Co. have sent us a parcel of miscellaneous music of more than usual interest. If Morley's Organ Journal, the first three numbers of which lie before us, continues its career in the manner in which it has begun, its success amongst organists may be considered as certain, and under the editorship of so energetic a musician as Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, we may be sure that the standard of excellence will not be allowed to sink. "A Prayer" and "Festival March" from the pen of the editor constitute the first part, and both will be found to be taking and musicianly pieces of work. The second part contains a very clever arrangement of a "Largo" by Handel, and a well-known gavotte by Gluck, while the third part is taken up with a "Fantasia" of rare beauty, in D minor, also by the editor. We have not for some time met with a piece of organ music which has pleased us so much as this work, and we can safely recommend it to all who can appreciate a thoughtful and thoroughly artistic composition. It is divided into three movements, an "allegro moderato," which serves as an introduction to a most charming "adagio molto" in D major, and followed by a finale "allegro vivace," full of vigour, which itself ends "andante molto maestoso," a few grand chords accompanied by a stately pedal bass, which is very effective. Number Five of Morley's Voluntaries is a collection of short and easy pieces for the organ, harmonium, or American organ, composed by Dr. Charles J. Frost, and fully sustains the credit which the former numbers have achieved, while Morley's Album of Duets for the Violin and Piano, by Mr. Arthur Carnall, will be welcome to that large number of amateurs who are at a loss to find easy, and at the same time artistic and melodious compositions for performance. Another collection issued by Messrs. W. Morley & Co. is their Part-Song Journal, edited by Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott. The numbers before us are adaptations for choirs of favourite songs by Messrs. F. H. Cowen, Henry Pontet, and Odoardo Barri, all of which are very ingeniously treated and do not appear to lose any of their interest in the new dress which they have here assumed. Amongst the songs from the same publisher we find two by Mr. Theo Bonheur, entitled respectively "The Red Scarf" and "Lassie," both effective in their way and deserving of success; and "Thine," a pleasing ballad by Mrs. Emily Phillips, to which she has added a cleverly written violoncello obbligato which adds greatly to its effect. Mr. Michael Watson is represented by two songs, "Our Guards," a spirited martial lay, and "The Harvest Moon," a delicate song with much freshness of melody and graceful simplicity; and Mr. Thomas Hutchison, whose work is always good, by "Shall we meet again," a song which deserves to become as popular as his other successful compositions. Two well-known songs, "The Children's Home," by Mr. F. H. Cowen, and "Laddie," by Signor Ciro Pinsuti, now appear as duets, arranged with much success by Mr. A. J. Caldicott; and "Laddie," in yet another form, as a pianoforte piece, by Mr. Boyton Smith, proclaims the favour it has attained with the public. A pretty waltz called "My Lady," by Mr. Theo Bonheur, which will doubtless be heard in many a ballroom this season, closes our list.

M. TAINE, in a brief preface to the extremely interesting Correspondence of Mallet du Pan which M. André Michel has published (1), remarks, with justice, on the very scanty use which historians of the Revolution have, for the most part, made of the invaluable materials of the Swiss journalist. There is this excuse for them, that the most valuable portion of Mallet du Pan's work was practically unknown till thirty years ago, and was then published only in part. Mallet du Pan was undoubtedly one of the most considerable of contemporary authorities; though he was one of a class which neither at the time nor afterwards is wont to find favour with partisans. He was a Whig in the best sense of the word, and equally opposed to the blind destructiveness of what used to be called the Revolutionary, and is now called the Radical, party, and to the blind refusal to recognize facts of the extreme Royalists of his time. The present fresh instalment of his work consists of letters on the state of French affairs, sent weekly from Berne to the Emperor at Vienna, from the end of 1794 to the period of the annexation of Switzerland by France, in 1798. At that time the revolutionary authorities showed their sense of the writer's powers and their appreciation of the principles of liberty by expressly outlawing him. He fled to England, the only place, as he wrote to the Abbé de Pradt, "where a man is allowed to act, think, write, and speak," edited the Mercure Britannique for two years, and died in 1800. The present volumes, as their dates will have already informed the reader, do not deal with the period of internal excess and crime. They have to do with that of internal corruption and external violence. Extremely well informed in matters of fact, Mallet du Pan brought to the task of conveying his information a clear conception of the general political situation and a faculty of writing, not indeed very elegantly, but with a rough incisive vigour which is extremely effective. His remarks on the moral of the luckless Quiberon expedition, in the first of these volumes, show a very uncommon political capacity, and deserve to be read by every Englishman who wishes to understand the reason of the failure of successive well-intentioned English Ministries to crush the revolutionary spirit by the awkward methods pursued from the 1st of June to Maida, if not later. Isolated sentences and judgments of his, moreover, bear the same marks of insight. "Quant à la conjuration de Babeuf," says he, speaking of the event in which our modern Socialist teachers see the first dawn of true anarchic wisdom, and genuine cooperative economy, "elle était plutôt le prospectus d'un complot à faire qu'un complot déjà formé." His character, or, as the seventeenth century would have said, "portrait," of Barras is also very happy. Barras, he says, among other things, "n'est point sans espoir de gouverner seul; son règne durerait trois mois, mais il règnerait"—a sentence which is not only neatly phrased, but contains by anticipation a decisive criticism of French politics for eighty years as we know, for how much longer we can only guess. It would be possible, of course, to detect in his book some doubtful explanations, some falsified prophecies, and perhaps some misstated facts; these were inevitable under the circumstances. But (as M. Taine has very well pointed out, and as any one who adopts the useful plan of reading the book before reading M. Taine's introduction may see for himself) his great value is in the manner, at once precise and large, in which he estimates and gauges the current of public opinion and the tendency of current events. One is sometimes tempted to think that the multiplication of the organs of public opinion has resulted in a lamentable falling off as regards the clearness and trustworthiness of their expression. There are so many that each writer for the most part resigns himself to the expression of a very small part of opinion, even if he takes the trouble to do anything more than simply write after the event (as he might have written before it, and with equal conviction and importance, that Mr. A. pulverized Mr. B. and all the country sympathized) or that Mr. B. staggered Mr. A. and all the country applauded. Mallet du Pan never falls into this boîte à quatre sous of the lower journalism. Moreover, his book is particularly valuable at the present day when the lessons of the French Revolution, which were always present to our fathers, are being pronounced out of date, if they are not altogether read backwards. He represents, and rightly represents, "sensible people" as hostile to revolutionary extravagance. But he never commits the fault, too common nowadays, of supposing that the dislike of sensible people will, of itself, suffice to counterbalance the support of people who are not sensible. His book is worth the attention of all politicians, and we cannot refrain from quoting one sentence of M. Taine's eloquent preface:—

> Sur les jacobins, notamment, il revient à vingt reprises; c'est qu'ils sont la faction active et dominante; personne, sauf Burke, n'a si parfaitement compris leur fanatisme, leurs instincts et leurs procédés de sectaires, l'embâtissement de leurs dogmes, leur ascendant sur les esprits incultes ou mal cultivés, la force de leur propagande, la puissance et la malfaisance de leur rêve, leur aptitude à détruire, leur incapacité pour construire, leur appel aux passions dissolvantes et meurtrières, le mécanisme interne par lequel leur doctrine transforme un demi-lettré ou un artisan utile en un "philosophe à pique," et le conduit de l'ignorance à la présomption, de l'enthousiasme au crime, en lui persuadant qu'il sauve la patrie et qu'il régénère l'humanité.

"Pretty much like anything we know nowadays, Mr. Rigmarole?"

M. Schuré has read the Légende des Siècles very carefully (which does him credit), and has succeeded in reproducing the more reproducible parts of his master's manner with some cleverness in La légende de l'Alsace (2). Unfortunately the substantive interest of the book, which it is hardly necessary to say is ardently patriotic and suasive of revanche, is not very great. We think we like Thomas Ingoldsby's legend of Sainte Odile better than M. Schuré's. Now if M. Victor Hugo had treated any of Barham's subjects (we do not remember that he has), we do not think we should have thought much of Ingoldsby in reading that légende.

The volume for 1883 of MM. Noël and Stoullig's useful theatrical and musical annals (3) needs in itself only mention. The preface (by M. Ch. Garnier, and devoted to first-nighters and their defence) is somewhat less interesting than some of those prefixed to earlier volumes.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE Americans, like ourselves, have their great ship question, only in a somewhat different form. With us the difficulty is to make sure that our constantly increasing vessels are properly seaworthy. With them it is to prevent their merchant marine from disappearing altogether. There are few more astonishing things in the history of trade than the sudden decadence of the American merchant marine. It trod close on our heels till after 1850, and then began to wither. Lieutenant Kelley, of the U.S. Navy, gives the history of this decline and fall, and suggests remedies, in his book on The Question of Ships (1). He has rather a weakness for sonorous rhetoric; but he states the case with force, and the remedies he suggests are good as far as they go. He does not say that America should give up Protection for the shipbuilder, but he justly thinks that it ought to protect less. If shipowners were allowed to buy iron vessels of over a certain tonnage, and to import all kinds of material free of duty, Lieutenant Kelley thinks that the industry might revive. He may be mistaken; but there can be no doubt that the stringent registry laws have done much to depress American shipping. For the English reader perhaps the most interesting part of the book is the chapter on the training of seamen.

Among the Clods (2) is not an encouraging title. It suggests ponderous attempts at being funny, and the Town Mouse justifies the fears. He has apparently no particular knowledge of country life, which is, after all, useful when you are going to write about it, and he takes what may be called the stock cockney view. For the rest, the book is padded out by a number of stories, each rather duller than the other, by mere force of the author's straining after extravagance, and there is a dreadfully tiresome comic American who is always telling tales.

The title chosen by Mr. Hazlitt for his volume of essays is a trifle misleading. Offspring of Thought in Solitude (3) looks like a heading for a new system of philosophy, or yet another religion. The author does not fly so high. His volume is a collection of twenty-seven essays ranging from "Coleridge Abroad" to "A Cause Célèbre." They are made up out of the more or less curious facts which have come under Mr. Hazlitt's notice in the course of his reading. Even when he has a good subject for a discussion of principles, as in the ninth essay on "The Differences of Writing and Painting" (it sounds like the title of a new Laocoon), he keeps steadily to details.

Mr. Hill excuses himself for publishing his essay on The Indo-Chinese Opium Trade (4) on the sufficient ground that it was a case of force majeure. The essay won the Maitland Prize, and by the terms of that foundation was bound to be published. In our opinion no excuse was needed. Mr. Hill gives a useful sketch of his subject, and if he takes, what we in spite of his argument still think, a mistaken view of the opium trade, he does it without denouncing everybody who differs from him as a heartless corruptor.

Mr. Prothero has edited a translation of the first volume of the Universal History (5), the last work of the indefatigable Leopold von Ranke. It has been executed partly by himself and partly by the Rev. D. C. Tovey, Assistant Master at Eton, and has every appearance of being thorough and scholarly. It is at least free from German idioms.

We have received a copy of Mr. F. Russell Forbes's handbook to the Roman Catacombs: their true History, and Records of Early Christian Art (6). It is compact, well printed, and copiously illustrated with clear woodcuts.

A Practical Guide to Photography (7) is a book which only a specialist can fairly criticize. As far as we can judge, Messrs. Marion & Co. have supplied the amateur and beginner with a clear and useful guide.

Surely Florida is the best written-up of all American States. The Columbia County Immigration Association at Lake City, Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. publish two more of their neat-looking books on games. One is Piquet and Cribbage (9); the other is on the "new game with cards and dice" called "Norseman" (10). Both are done by "Aquarius." It is a pity that such pretty little books should have such gritty covers.

The reprint of Walden (11), published by David Douglas at Edinburgh, is handy and well printed. Mrs. E. Kennard's sporting novel, The Right Sort (12), appears in a one-volume edition in a red cover, with a thrilling picture on it.

The Rev. H. P. Owen Smith's Short Table (13) is a thin note-book duly ruled and divided with headings wherein the student may make his notes of Greek and Roman history, their wars and battles, political events, and important persons.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus publish a Shilling Knightage (14) as companion volume to their Peerage and Baronetage. It includes an essay on Knighthood by the editor, Mr. E. Walford, M.A.

We need only mention the appearance of the twenty-seventh edition of Ingall's Foreign Stock Manual (15), and of the fourth edition of Mr. Kemp's Manual of Yacht and Boat Sailing (16).

We have received in reference and apparently in reply to the article on "A New Defoe" (SATURDAY REVIEW, p. 438), a revised and much more definite Prospectus from Messrs. Bickers & Son. It appears that the Periodical Works are not to be included, and the word "complete" has been dropped; but the edition is to extend to Twenty-two volumes, and to contain some miscellaneous matter not hitherto reprinted. Bibliographical and other introductions are promised; but we still do not observe any mention of the running commentary in explanation of words, allusions, &c., which Defoe especially needs. On the other hand, the name of the editor, Mr. H. B. Wheatley, is now given, and Mr. Wheatley's former work in connexion with Pepys and other classics supplies good ground for hoping that his edition will be as satisfactory as its limits permit.

ROYAL HOSPITAL for INCURABLES—The VOTES and INTEREST of the readers of the "Saturday Review" for the Election on the last Friday this month, are earnestly solicited on behalf of Mr. CHARLES BRUCE, who has been deformed and a cripple from his birth. A self-made and self-educated man, he has managed to support himself in very modest circumstances by his pen, and has written between twenty and thirty books, all of a good tendency. His volume of Sea Ballads is as complete as anything of its kind. He finds his physical powers giving way, and his friends are trying to obtain for him the shelter of this admirable Institution. References may be made to, and proxies will be gratefully received by, Mr. BENJAMIN CLARKE, General Editor, Sunday School Union, 56 Old Bailey.

TO COMPOSERS.—Messrs. REID BROS., Music Publishers, 268 Oxford Street, London, W., will be happy to receive MSS. for perusal, with a view to the PURCHASE and PUBLICATION of same, if approved of. Stamps must be enclosed for return of MSS. if not approved of.

"Compared with other books having the same aim, these books deserve very favourable mention. For the notes are well selected; they never commit the capital fault of trespassing on the province of the grammar or the dictionary, and so pandering to the pupil's laziness; and they are, moreover, generally well expressed and to the point."—Saturday Review.

THE DAILYS of SODDEN FEN. 3 vols.
"A novel far above the average both in design and in execution is 'The Dailys of Sodden Fen,' by the author of 'Our Crotchets to a Hair,' wherein the author has aimed high and has gone very near the mark. Persons, places, scenes, ideas, choice of subject, style of writing, all are out of the common, all have the charm of originality and freshness. The contrast between the characters of James Daily, the father, and Adam Daily, the son, is admirably worked out; the portrait of Susan Daily is a gem; the sketches of the children are delightful; the picture of Jessie is charming beyond measure; the purpose of the story is noble and worthily set forth."
Illustrated London News.

IN LONDON TOWN. By KATHARINE LEE, Author of "A Western Wildflower." 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"The story is bright and amusing throughout. It is written with a clever woman's generous sympathy in manly views of life, and with a sly perception, also, of the narrowness into which exclusively masculine ideas are apt to run. No one who knows what good writing is, no one who is original enough to enjoy originality, should miss the pleasure that this novel will give."
Daily Telegraph.
"This is a capital novel, fresh, vigorous, and very wholesome. It is one to be read, loved, and remembered. We can hardly fancy that any one can rise from its perusal without feeling the happier and better for it. Miss Hatchard, the kindly underbred little artist, young Everest himself, his uncle Burney, Fowler, and his pretty wife, Lucilla Markham, and Pianetta's cousins in the Parsonage are people whom to know is a liberal education."

THE MINISTERIAL DEFEAT.

IT would be the merest prudery to affect to consider the result of the division of Tuesday night as anything but a grave disaster for the Government. Even their most unhesitating supporters have shown not the slightest exultation over it, and have exchanged the thanksgivings appropriate to a Parliamentary victory for ferocious attacks on the few Liberal members who dared in some measure to set their conscience and their country above party allegiance. To a Government in possession of a normal majority of at least a hundred, a majority of twenty-eight on a strict issue of confidence or want of confidence is equivalent to a ruinous defeat. It may not immediately bring with it the consequences of an actual failure to muster a majority of supporters; it may not involve a dissolution or a resignation. But it amounts to a declaration that the Government has forfeited the confidence of the House of Commons, and it makes indisputable the already certain fact that it has forfeited the confidence of the nation. It has, and must have, even more direct results than this. No man in whom a spark of honour or a remnant of conscience subsists can fail to resent the strain which party allegiance of this kind puts on him. He votes; but he is nearly certain to revenge himself for the dirty work of voting by relaxed enthusiasm in the party cause. The matter has been undoubtedly made worse for the Government, first by the imprudent tactics of its friends in reference to the vote; and, secondly, by the course of the debate itself. When despairing appeals are made beforehand to leaders of the Liberal party not to say this and not to do that, because of the stigma which the saying and doing will fix on Mr. GLADSTONE, the fact that, after all, the things are done and said implies inevitably that the stigma is, in the judgment of Mr. GLADSTONE'S supporters themselves, affixed and irremovable. The two men not holding office in the House of Commons on the Liberal side who possess, by common consent, most political ability, most experience of affairs, most independence and uprightness of judgment, were implored by all the tender remembrances of the past, by all their faith to Liberal principles, by all their hopes of future good fortune, to profess confidence in Mr. GLADSTONE'S Egyptian policy. These two men, in their places in Parliament and with all the force of language of which each is capable at his best, have declared that they have no confidence in Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy. To Mr. FORSTER and Mr. GOSCHEN the defenders of the PRIME MINISTER appealed; by Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. FORSTER they have been judged.

But the hapless case of the Government does not depend solely on this protest of the ablest and honestest men of their own party, or on the dwindling of the most dutiful majority that ever, in Liberal phrase as to this very matter, voted black white at a Minister's bidding. The opening speech of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was entirely devoid of rhetorical ornament, and possessed simply the attraction of orderly arrangement, of grave logical argument, and of rigid adherence to facts. The speaker too seldom takes the trouble to speak so well; but on this occasion he produced a model of sober Parliamentary exposition. Mr. GIBSON and Mr. COWEN in the florid style, Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL in the lighter, all produced speeches of very high merit, Lord RANDOLPH'S being perhaps the best, and including a short passage of arms with Mr. GLADSTONE, in which Mr. GLADSTONE was completely worsted. Mr. CHAPLIN easily exposed the more obvious fallacies of the PRIME MINISTER, and every sentence of Mr. FORSTER'S and Mr. GOSCHEN'S speeches was a thong for the shoulders of the Government. What had Ministers to set against this, unquestionably the best display of Parliamentary speaking that the Opposition has made during the present Session, if not during the present Parliament? Lord HARTINGTON, put up to perform (unconsciously, no doubt) his usual office of lure, attempted in vain to give form and body to the empty assurances of the PRIME MINISTER; and no soul in Parliament or out of it even professed to derive satisfaction from his assurances of the vague help which, in an inextricable concatenation of "ifs" and "supposings," the Government might perhaps be able to hold out to General GORDON. Sir CHARLES DILKE, the adroitest and most supple debater in the House, a debater who with even a rag of pretext can usually cover up the most unpresentable cases, made the weakest speech he has made for years. Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE'S utterances it is unnecessary to discuss. Otherwise Ministers themselves were dumb, save for Mr. GLADSTONE, who shall be dealt with presently. From the outside they had the valuable assistance, apologetic, for the most part, of Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD and Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, of Mr. O'CONNOR POWER and Mr. BUXTON, with, to finish all, Mr. JOHN MORLEY'S unfavourable estimate of writers in newspapers. Mr. MORLEY should know something of writers in newspapers, and it is interesting to learn that he has no high opinion of them.

There remains Mr. GLADSTONE. It is not necessary—it is even something of a mistake—to describe with Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL the PRIME MINISTER'S speech as the worst he ever delivered, or, with other critics not by any means always sympathizers with the Opposition, to pronounce it simply bad. It might be argued, on the other hand, that if a speech could be treated according to a well-known phrase in historical politics, if it could be "surrounded "with a wall of brass," shut out from all possibility of answer, of comparison with actual facts, of contrast with published documents, it was a very remarkable and ingenious speech. But it was chiefly remarkable for this very necessity of shutting out all inconvenient facts, averting the attention from all hostile arguments, and accepting from Mr. GLADSTONE premiss and conclusion, illustration and assertion, without comparison and without sifting. No speech has ever shown more fully and more fatally that dangerous and growing tendency to ignore fact, public opinion, anything and everything but his own views and ideas, which now distinguishes Mr. GLADSTONE. That the author of the expedition which but a few weeks ago went more than a day's journey into the wilderness for no purpose whatever but to kill from five to ten thousand Arabs fighting for their freedom at Souakim, should now speak with generous indignation of the wickedness of a similar proceeding at Khartoum would be incredible except in the case of Mr. GLADSTONE. That such a man should produce with sober triumph the argument that it could not be an indelible disgrace to fail in succouring four garrisons because there were six others not mentioned in the indictment would be equally incredible except in Mr. GLADSTONE'S case. No living man probably but Mr. GLADSTONE would have failed to see that Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH simply formulated General GORDON'S charges, arranged General GORDON'S complaints, compared and supported by facts General GORDON'S published exposure of the vacillation and obstruction of the Government.

Certainly no leader but Mr. GLADSTONE—perhaps no followers but Mr. GLADSTONE'S followers—could have characterized the vote of censure itself as pale and colourless. No Government has ever been accused in plainer words of a disgraceful failure at once to support the interests of the country and to defend the officer who has put himself in peril for those interests and for its own. No one but Mr. GLADSTONE could have calmly waived the Egyptian question as a "secondary" one, as to which excitement is got up for party purposes merely; and no one but Mr. GLADSTONE could have so ignored the feeling of the country as to sit down without one intelligible pledge to do even at this eleventh hour what the country ardently desires. By Mr. GLADSTONE evidently the whole scene—the despatches, the importance of Egypt, the wishes of the country, the relation of a Government to its agents—is unfocussed, ungrasped, uncomprehended. He looks at something perfectly different—at a GORDON, an Egypt, an England, a set of Blue Books which exist nowhere save in his own imagination, and triumphantly vindicates his conduct in relations which have no correspondence or counterpart in the working world. How his colleagues who can hardly be thus deluded, how the more honourable sort of his followers regard in their hearts the quagmire of blunder and disgrace into which they have floundered under his guidance, it is impossible to say. But the reduction of a majority of over a hundred to a majority of twenty-eight, the miserable performance of some and the tell-tale silence of others of the most effective debaters in the Cabinet, may give some hint as to the state of mind prevailing.

The matter is not over; it is only begun. A short but very important debate in the House of Lords on the same evening which saw the virtual carrying of the Vote of Censure in the Commons shows the dangers which await England in the approaching Conference if it ever assembles. No valid undertaking has been given to rescue the garrisons or General GORDON, no really vigorous steps have been taken to protect Egypt from external foes or free it from internal disorder. It is said, indeed, that another step towards bringing the war into Egypt has been taken by the abandonment of Dongola. The first subject of importance at this moment, and for a long time to come, to every Englishman of patriotism and political capacity must be that which Mr. GLADSTONE declares secondary; the first object of every Englishman of honour and spirit must be the wiping away of that disgrace the imputation of which Mr. GLADSTONE feels so keenly while he is so indifferent to the disgrace itself. What may be the next step necessary to take in Parliament must depend on the progress of events. But the country will not hold the Opposition blameless if they abandon the task which they have now, if somewhat late, undertaken with vigour, and which they have carried so near to a successful conclusion. It is possible, but from experience unlikely, that Mr. GLADSTONE may have learnt something from the lesson of Tuesday. If he has not, a fresh one must be set him to learn, and that soon.

A CONSERVATIVE CAUCUS.

THE political machinery which was first elaborated at Birmingham and afterwards extended into a Union of Liberal Associations or Radical Clubs has certainly not been inefficient. Impatient sufferers from the usurpations of the Caucus are tempted to imitate their adversaries, like the famous hymnologist who could not understand why the devil should have all the popular tunes. Accordingly it is proposed in some quarters to abandon the traditional Conservative organization for the Birmingham system of primary and secondary elections, by which the party managers ostensibly derive their title from the numerical majority of the party. Mr. SCHNADHORST and other competent apologists have often described the mode of government by Caucus. In Birmingham, and probably in some other large towns, the Club suffrage seems to be universal, though it may perhaps elsewhere be confined to Parliamentary voters. Any inhabitant who professes to be a Liberal may take part in the election of the governing Council, better known at Birmingham as the Eight Hundred. Simple-minded Liberals of moderate opinions may perhaps applaud the tolerance by which their equal rights are recognized without perceiving that their votes are practically neutralized in the exercise of the only function which is permitted to the mass of electors. The Eight Hundred who as soon as they are appointed succeed to all the powers of their constituents represent only the majority of a majority; and the candidates who are selected to fill Parliamentary or municipal vacancies are again chosen by a majority of the Eight Hundred, of course on the real nomination of a few adroit managers. It is not certain whether the original authors of the Caucus intended to confine their operations to the selection of candidates and the conduct of elections. They have since converted the system into a permanent contrivance for dictating through the members whom they return to Parliament and the country. The Federation of Liberal Associations combines the American system of election management with the sinister operation of the Clubs in the French Revolution; the Jacobins also had their mother society and their branches in all parts of the country.

The malcontents of the Opposition who from time to time more or less openly propose to copy the Birmingham model may probably not deliberately contemplate the establishment of an elected body which is to supersede the independence of individual members. If they were to succeed in their efforts to rival Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. SCHNADHORST, they might perhaps for a time be more formidable as a political faction; but they would have abandoned all Conservative principle. Democratic Toryism is an idle paradox if it implies that all questions are to be decided by a popular vote. The qualifying epithet destroys the meaning of the substantive description. Adventurers and agitators might find their account in dependence on a body which would probably prefer their guidance to the policy of responsible leaders; but serious statesmen will scarcely condescend to hold their rank as party chiefs at the mercy of any Council or Committee. Skill in canvassing delegates, who themselves hold their position in virtue of similar arts, is not a quality which commands the confidence of the genuine supporters of order, of property, and of established institutions. It is, of course, necessary that the heads of a party should consult the feelings and wishes of their followers and of local sections; but they ought to reserve to themselves full discretion as to the advisers on whom they rely in each particular case. Unlike the nominees of an Assembly or a Committee, they have, as a general rule, no personal interest in preferring the less eligible candidate for a party nomination. It is still more important that they should retain their present control over policy and business. Tory demagogues would be more capricious than past and future Ministers, and there is reason to suspect that they might not always be equally loyal. The complaint that local preferences are not sufficiently considered is greatly exaggerated. The leaders and managers of a party in Opposition are as anxious as any elected Committee to secure as many seats as possible. It would be easy to recount instances of their deference to the wishes of any constituency which has a strong leaning to a candidate of its own choice. It is not to be wished that, as in the Presidential contest which is now proceeding in the United States, the sole test by which the merits of a candidate are judged is the greater or less probability that he will command the largest possible number of votes.

An elected Council, organized in imitation of the Birmingham model, would in practice not confine its efforts to the selection of candidates or to the conduct of elections. It is not improbable that in some places it might commit the party to a course of action which would be fatal to its prospects of success. Two or three years ago local majorities might have given countenance to the absurd theories of fair trade, with the result of alienating all their more intelligent allies. Political leaders, though they are liable to mistakes, are more competent than provincial factions to keep touch of Parliamentary and public opinion. The official leaders of a party have a more truly representative character than any Caucus or Committee which could be appointed by direct election. They have in every case fought their way by ability and merit of some kind to the front rank of their party, and the chiefs who hold the highest rank are virtually elected by colleagues who are themselves chosen by a kind of tacit suffrage. Perhaps the most valuable element in the modern English Constitution consists in the tendency which it has hitherto shown to evolve the ablest candidates for the highest political positions. Down to the present time Prime Ministers and leaders of Opposition have never been dwarfed by comparison with superior rivals in the ranks of their respective parties. PEEL and PALMERSTON, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Mr. DISRAELI, and Mr. GLADSTONE would have been chosen as leaders by acclamation, if, after full experience of their fitness to rule, their names could have been submitted to election; yet some of them might never have had the opportunity of exhibiting their capacity if promotion had depended on the votes of provincial Committees. It may be said without disrespect to American institutions and political traditions, that Presidents of the United States have sometimes been chosen on the ground of their mediocrity, while English Prime Ministers have almost invariably been the ablest members of the party which from time to time was dominant. A hundred years ago PITT and FOX were as much the natural champions of the causes which they respectively defended as ACHILLES and HECTOR.

It is true that the favourites of political Clubs must have qualities which enable them to rise above their competitors. The Jacobins appreciated the logical and pitiless fanaticism of ROBESPIERRE, and the Cordeliers admired the unscrupulous audacity of DANTON; but the gifts of the demagogue are not the attributes of a statesman. The originator and head of the modern English Caucus undoubtedly possesses great ability; but his influence largely depends on the wide prospect of revolutionary change which he offers to the cupidity and passion of the multitude. The Jacobin Dictator was more consistent and more thoroughgoing than the rivals whom he condemned in succession to judicial assassination. It is difficult to judge whether it would have been possible to resist his tyranny by any organization of the honest and respectable majority of Frenchmen. It is at least certain that no representative of constitutional liberty could have bid against the chiefs of the Mountain by outdoing them in massacre and violence. To compare, not small things with great, but English Radicals with Jacobins of 1793, the Birmingham Caucus has nothing to fear from servile copyists who are restrained by their professed opinions from competition in the career of spoliation and destruction. If any Democratic Tory thinks it possible to enlist the mob on the side of the Constitution, short experience will dissipate his unreasonable hopes. The blessing which has been invoked on "each man possessed of aught "to give" now rests mainly on those who are prepared to give away the possessions and rights of their neighbours.

If wavering Conservatives have any doubt whether they shall obey their proper leaders or transfer their allegiance to the nominees of Clubs, they may consult with advantage the enemies who are sometimes safer counsellors than prejudiced friends. The adherents of the present Government unanimously recommend the Opposition to borrow from themselves the popular strength which is supposed to reside in the Caucus. It is intelligible that hesitating Liberals should wish to destroy in others the independence which they have abdicated for themselves. The Radicals on their part would welcome an admission of legitimacy or necessity of a machinery which is, as they know, still suspicious or odious to the sober portion of the community. It is for the purpose of tempting their adversaries to commit a suicidal blunder that Ministerial speakers and writers incessantly dwell on imaginary differences and latent schisms in the ranks of the Opposition. Supposed conspirators or traitors are ostentatiously applauded for their pretensions to independence, and the party is encouraged to try unpromising experiments which would involve the abandonment of its existing and traditional organization. As it has been said, the advice of enemies is instructive, but only as indicative of the course which ought not to be followed. The same comment may be made on frequent taunts against the inactivity of the Opposition leader in the House of Commons. It is prudent to abstain from movements which might delay the disintegration of the present majority through the secession of some of its principal members.

THE COLLAPSE OF CHINA.

THE treaty just concluded at Chee-Foo by Captain FOURNIER on behalf of the French Government is from several points of view a very serious business; but it, or at least the manner of its making, has a comic aspect also. In the first place, here is another instance of a fighting man making peace where the men of peace had made war. French diplomatists in the Far East have done little for many a day but cause complication, and civil Commissioners have been chiefly busy in envenoming quarrels. When there seemed no outlet to the confusion caused by a little war but a big one, a straightforward naval officer presents himself, and makes what is to all appearance a satisfactory settlement. Then, too, we have to consider the slightly ridiculous figure cut by some of the bystanders. We live in an age, as has been observed before, singularly credulous about the existence, malignity, and activity of bogies. Some time ago the favourite raw-head-and-bloody-bones was the solidarity of the Mahometan world. For the last few months it has been the wrath of China. France was gravely advised to mend its manners or else terrible things would happen. It has done just the contrary, and has even threatened worse. Then all at once the rage and fury of the Celestial Empire has vanished. The Tsung li Yamen has become childlike and bland, has kissed the rod, and promised not to do it again. Now it would seem that the critics of France are about to rush into the other extreme. After using the Tonquin muddle to point the moral of the folly of ambition, they are beginning to discover that the Colonial policy of M. FERRY is a masterpiece of wisdom, foresight, and consistency. It is forgotten that RIVIÈRE was thrown into a position of danger, almost unsupported, and that troops were sent out in driblets, and that the authorities on the spot wrangled with one another, and mismanaged nearly everything. In point of fact, France has won, not because it was wiser than its opponents, but because it was not quite so foolish, and has so great a superiority of strength that it could not help winning when once it had begun to exert itself with any energy.

However the fight has been conducted, there can be little doubt now that it has ended in favour of the French. The treaty made by Captain FOURNIER represents a substantial victory; and its terms reflect great credit on the good sense of M. FERRY, who has directed the negotiations from Paris. As usual, there is some confusion as to the competence of the representatives of China. It is commonly found after a treaty has been signed with that country that the proper Mandarin has not had his say. There is always some authority behind everything who has the last word, and who never is consulted. When the bounce of poor Marquess TSENG produced no effect, the grandmother of the EMPEROR had to be all at once consulted; and now the Ambassador is on his way home. In the present case, the over-zealous officer who has taken upon himself to speak for this wonderful Empire is the irrepressible LI HUNG CHANG, who seems to come in and out of Chinese politics like a comet. It is said that this Viceroy has made the treaty out of his own head, and is prepared to thrust it down the throat of the Brother of the Sun and Moon. The amount of truth in all this is not difficult to guess at. If LI's august master's wire-pullers see their way to getting rid of the treaty, LI will probably die suddenly, and Captain FOURNIER will have toiled in vain. There is, however, no great chance that a means of escape will be found. The Tsung li Yamen have no doubt realized the folly of making any further fight, the treaty will be accepted, and all the stories about LI's officiousness may be safely attributed to the artistic love of lying innate in the Oriental mind, or to the wish to keep a useful excuse for treachery at some future day. The terms of the treaty itself are, on the whole, creditable to the statesmanship of the French Government. M. FERRY has asked for no more than it was possible to obtain without paying a very serious price. He has secured a recognition of the French protectorate, which means dominion in Annam and Tonquin. A distinct frontier line has been settled, and privileges secured for French trade. After serving its purpose as a means of putting pressure on the Imperial Government at Pekin, the demand for an indemnity has been surrendered at the right time and as a favour. The colonial policy of France has seldom been distinguished by this combination of vigour and moderation. The usual course has been to ask for everything at once, which is an effectual way of getting nothing. It is certainly early to decide that the Tonquin difficulty is settled for good. M. FERRY will doubtless be attacked by fire-eaters at home who will clamour because he has not insisted on all sorts of sentimental satisfaction to the pride of France. Neither is Tonquin at peace yet. There will be some internal fighting to be got through, and, to judge by the past, the frontier will be a source of continual trouble. Whoever has an Oriental for a neighbour may calculate on a series of little wars, and may be sure that, willingly or unwillingly, he will have to extend his dominion before long. These questions, however, belong to the second and following stages of the conquest of Tonquin. For the present it is tolerably plain that we have seen the end of the first. France has its foot down in the Songkoi delta, and has it in its power to turn the conquered territory into a solid and useful dependency.

The first difficulties which M. FERRY may have in consequence of the treaty will probably not be with China, but with other European States. According to the French version of its clauses, the trading privileges conceded by China are to be confined to the citizens of the Republic. The provinces of Yunnan, Kuang Si, and Quangtu are to be opened to them exclusively. If this is so, M. FERRY's good sense must have failed him when he insisted on any such stipulation. It is highly improbable that European and American States which have treaties with China will submit to this exclusion. They will insist on corresponding concessions for themselves; and indeed they must, if they are not content to remain in the Far East on sufferance. China, unless it reasons very curiously, will not think itself bound to pay much attention to Powers which are satisfied with a position of inferiority. Either the Government at Pekin or the French themselves will be called upon to put all the Powers dealing with China on the same footing. If, therefore, the French version of the treaty is the right one, and it is far from improbable that it is, M. FERRY has begun by saddling himself with a new Tonquin difficulty of greater extent than the old. For England in particular the question is one of great importance. We have made several attempts of late years to open a trade with Yunnan from Burmah. We already almost monopolize the commerce of China, and our traders who are on the spot, and exceptionally well equipped to profit by the opening of new areas of trade, will certainly try to have their share of the possible good things to be picked up in the three provinces. From a purely political point of view, the success of the French in Tonquin is of vital interest to our Indian Empire. With a strong European Power firmly established on the other side of Siam, the position of our Burmese frontier will be considerably modified. It is useless to shirk the fact that it will be threatened, very much as the North-West frontier is threatened through Afghanistan. Siam will become a south-eastern Merv, unless for the first time for centuries past an Oriental State suddenly develops a high capacity for statesmanship and government. The danger, we may be tolerably sure, will be hustled out of sight at present; but it is there. It is a greater and not a less peril that France may be content for the moment to have its hands free to play a bolder part in the Mediterranean. The course of events for a year or more has not been such as to make it hesitate greatly. It has held on its way in Tonquin with some hesitation in matters of detail, but with a sufficiently clear view as to what it meant to obtain. In the midst of a chorus of threats and warnings, it has gone on refusing to be scared by spectres and careless as to whose feelings it wounded. At the end it has obtained its immediate object, and vastly improved its chance of success in things of greater moment. It may be trusted without too great rashness to profit by its experience—whether others will is another question.

PLAYWRIGHTS ON PLAYWRITING.

EVERY one at all connected with literature has observed the widespread popular desire to know "how it is "done." "Now, tell me," says the inquisitive fair, "how "do you begin writing a story?" or a play, or an article, or whatever it may be. No anecdotical literature is better liked than the chapters which tell how authors worked; all about SCHILLER's decaying apples in the drawer, and BALZAC's white flannel dressing-gown and coffee, and SCOTT's "grand rides in the hills," when he was working at Marmion. That inquiring periodical, the Pall Mall Gazette, has attempted to satisfy the public curiosity by asking a number of dramatic authors and adapters how they write their plays. Without being too inquisitive, a man may often have marvelled how some of our modern pieces ever entered into the mind to conceive. In some cases, of course, the answer to such questionings is supplied by research and observation. The "author" has merely spoiled a French play by adapting it to English ideas of morality and manners, or he has "con-"veyed" the plot of some other man's novel. These crude methods are not recommended, or confessed, by Mr. GILBERT, Mr. SIMS, or Mr. PINERO, who have deigned to gratify the curiosity of the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. GILBERT is short and sensible. Like every artist, he "finds it "difficult to answer" a question so vague. Can a poet say how he came to write a poem? EDGAR POE revealed the secret in detail, but nobody quite believed the author of the Raven. Of course different sorts of plays are written in different sorts of ways. If Mr. GILBERT wants "to exploit a certain actor," he fits him with a character as a tailor fits one with a coat. If Mr. WORTH were asked how dresses are made, he would probably answer like Mr. GILBERT, that "the first consideration is to enable" the customer "to exhibit" herself "to the best advantage." Again, Mr. GILBERT goes to work quite otherwise if he has "a distinct doctrine to urge upon the audience." Mr. GILBERT as the didactic dramatist has one method, Mr. GILBERT "exploiting" an actor has another method. In the libretto of a comic opera, once more, he has quite a different and very artificial set of conditions to work in. Thus his only general rule is, "Always construct your last "act first." Never begin till you see your way out of the wood. Did SHAKSPEARE see his way out of Hamlet before he began his first act? Critics, who doubt all things, have doubted whether SHAKSPEARE's method would have been approved of by Mr. GILBERT.

Mr. SIMS appears before the public, in his theory of playwriting, as a weary Titan. When he is offered a commission to write a piece, the first thing he does is to decline it. The composition of melodramas is not a task for the irresponsible humourist or the giddy trifler. It "means from "three to six months of mental misery, and a long period "of physical prostration." It is "the most exhausting and "most distressing of all forms of literary composition." Yet SOPHOCLES lived to a good old age, ARISTOPHANES was not unhappy, and SHAKSPEARE seems to have had a sweet unruffled character. The anguish (and the indubitable success) of Mr. SIMS doubtless come from his habit of "taking infinite pains." To bid an ambitious playwright take infinite pains is good advice, doubtless; but even he who follows Mr. SIMS's counsel will not necessarily succeed. We have known men of great practice and success in other forms of composition take infinite pains with a play, and study the stage and the best modern and ancient novels for years. Yet their plays, when finished, were, as any ordinary playgoer could see, portions and parcels of the dread théâtre impossible, for which M. ABOUT has written so much. But, on the whole, Mr. SIMS is probably right when he says that the laboriously conscientious method is seldom employed. "Playwriting is both an art and a trick." No teaching will make a man a playwright, any more than it will make him a fencer, a bowler, a novelist. Nature must give a man the necessary bias, that he may be improved by practice, collaboration, and painstaking.

Mr. PINERO thinks that the publication of an author's method may, at least, "act as a warning." He warns the world that he "begins by conceiving a story." But this is assuming the question at issue. How does a man conceive a story? Are there any new stories to be conceived? How far may Memory legitimately assist Invention? These are the real problems. However, Mr. PINERO jumps the difficulty, conceives a story, and then makes it conform to the taste of the manager and the censor. He hints that this can only be done by a prodigious sacrifice of his inspirations, and is peculiarly anxious to lighten his labours by abolishing the censor. What bold, bad ideas has Mr. PINERO been conceiving; what stories too broad, what situations too "strong" for the censorial mind?

> But there is nothing, nor shall be,
> So sweet, so wicked, but my verse
> Can dream of worse, says Mr. SWINBURNE. Can Mr. PINERO "dream of worse" than Low Water, which, he hopes, will be presented to the public again in a more favourable light? If he can, will he tell the P. M. G. what he dreams of? The censorship will not interfere with a free press. Mr. PINERO's later remarks are chiefly concerned with his own apologia, and are a defence against "a very genial, well-wishing oppo-"sition." But this, as older dramatic critics cried, "hath "nought to do with DIONYSUS," and does not really let the public into the secret "how plays are written." Soon one may learn how Lord TENNYSON writes his plays, and all about the secret of Mr. BROWNING.

MUNICIPAL BRIBERY.

THE Municipal Corrupt Practices Bill, though it is of secondary importance, naturally follows the similar measure passed last year for the regulation of Parliamentary elections. It was not worth while to oppose the reference of the Bill to a Grand Committee, for the omission of a limit to the amount which may be legally expended raised no question of principle. The present Government and Radical legislators in general so rarely prefer common sense and practical convenience to party advantage that the ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S reasons for not specifying the amount of permissible outlay are creditable to his judgment. The enforcement of such a rule would require the elaborate machinery of the Corrupt Practices Bill; and every additional complication diminishes, as Sir HENRY JAMES justly remarked, the chance of inducing respectable and competent persons to become candidates for municipal office. Even an occasional recognition of the claims of property and station is welcome from the party which habitually exalts the pre-eminent qualifications of the working-man. It matters little whether the Bill is altered in Committee, for the main provisions against different forms of bribery will not be seriously opposed. It is certainly desirable that seats in Town Councils should not be directly or indirectly purchased, especially as it is known that bribes ostensibly intended to affect municipal elections are in many cases really given in prospect of Parliamentary contests. When the paymasters and the recipients are in both cases the same, there will always be a tacit understanding that party services are to be rendered on all suitable occasions, and that they will not be gratuitous. Some cynics allege that municipal corruption has increased since the admission of women to the local franchise; but it is evident that, as at present the female householder has no Parliamentary vote at her disposal, any contract which she may make must be completed at the municipal election.

The public interest in suppressing corrupt elections of any kind would be still more indisputable if the remaining motives of unbribed voters were necessarily laudable. It is a paradoxical process to trust with large and even with supreme power constituencies which, in the opinion of the same legislators, would sell their votes if they were assured of impunity. Corrupt Practices Acts are proper and necessary, but they assume liability to corruption. The advantage of facilitating the admission of poor men to the House of Commons is not unmixed; and the prohibition of corrupt bargains has little tendency in any other way to elevate the character of members. Cheap elections will probably diminish the independence of those who will owe their seats to Associations and Clubs; but other causes contribute to the conversion of representatives into delegates. Intimidation and the more or less legitimate influence with which it is frequently confounded have been almost entirely abolished by the institution of the Ballot. The probable expectation that bribery would be suppressed by the same means has been disappointed. Experience has confirmed the truth of the proverb that there is honour among thieves, including venal electors. A voter who would have no hesitation in breaking his promise to his landlord or creditor may generally be trusted to give the stipulated consideration for a bribe. It would not suit his purpose to destroy, by a breach of faith to the purchaser, the value of the commodity in which he deals. When he finds that the commodity in which he has dealt is unmarketable, he will be at liberty without direct fraud to consult his own opinions or prejudices. The sanctity of caprice, of ignorance, and of passion is an article of faith with the indignant censors of corruption.

The whole question has lost much of its practical importance through the large increase in the number of voters. The fifty-thousandth part of a constituency is not worth any appreciable price in the market. There are probably some politicians who persuade themselves that purity is promoted by any cause which renders votes unsaleable; but absence of opportunity for sin is but an unsatisfactory form of innocence. A hundred years ago, when the traffic in seats was public and notorious, it might be doubted whether there was moral guilt in conforming to general custom. In those days denunciation of a neighbouring man of fortune for "nursing" a borough, as it has since been called, would have been scarcely intelligible. The counties, which have never been accused of pecuniary corruption, have not assumed to themselves on that account a character for superior virtue. It is true that county voters shared largely in the distribution of places by the patronage Secretary of the Treasury; and they still have a claim to appointments under the Postmaster-General, which are up to the present time avowedly employed in rewarding partisans. The anomaly is almost interesting as an isolated survival, and does little harm. Only a small section of an average constituency can wish or hope for employment at a post-office. The Man in the Moon has become extinct, partly through the efforts of penal legislation, and also because his bags of sovereigns would be emptied before he had purchased a sufficient number of doubtful votes to decide an election. Candidates still pay their supporters in pledges which are often more unprincipled than the most lavish distribution of bribes. It may be added that it was less dishonest to spend their own money, even for unlawful purposes, than to barter away the safety and welfare of the nation for the selfish promotion of their personal interests. The tortuous wisdom which of old earned ironical commendation mainly consisted in the steward's purchase of advantages to himself at the cost of his employer.

In the United States single votes have never been habitually made subjects of bargain and sale; but nevertheless State and Federal elections cost very large sums in addition to the bribes which are offered in the form of promises of office. Rich candidates are expected to contribute in proportion to their means for the expenses of the complicated machinery which is worked by professional managers. The system is perhaps less morally degrading than the process by which elections were formerly won in several corrupt English boroughs; but, on the other hand, it is more nearly universal, and it promises long to outlive irregular practices which are now almost obsolete. There is probably an admixture of truth in statements which are frequently published in American newspapers, that some speculative capitalist has by corrupt methods acquired the control of a State Legislature. It would be unfair to dwell on exceptional cases in which flagrant corruption of the grossest kind was practised without disguise. The supporters of the notorious TWEED in the city of New York knew that their leader embezzled public money on a gigantic scale; and they justified their action in electing him to the State Senate before and after the public exposure of his frauds on the ground that he was liberal in dispensing to the poor the funds which he had plundered from all other classes of the community. The exploits of TWEED are not likely to be repeated on an equally magnificent scale; but in many or all of the great American cities the municipal representation is regarded by the better class of citizens with profound dissatisfaction. A movement has of late been begun in some places with the object of vesting all civic patronage in the mayor, on the ground that one responsible officer is less likely than a Board of Aldermen or a Council to be influenced by corrupt motives. If Mr. OAKEY HALL'S statement is accurate, four non-official persons control the municipal affairs of New York, and control to some extent the amount and disposal of a revenue amounting to several millions sterling.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL is probably right in attributing any municipal bribery which may still be practised to political motives. The modern practice of conducting local elections on party grounds is deplorable, but it will in all probability become universal as it is already general. Almost the only check on the abuse consists in the division of towns into wards for the purpose of municipal elections. The minority has consequently, except in the scandalous instance of the Birmingham monopoly, a certain share of representation; but the rivalry of various districts probably increases the effect of political considerations. If a Liverpool ward mainly inhabited by Irish workmen sends Nationalist members to the Town Council, their neighbours naturally return municipal representatives of opposite opinions. The present Government is consistent with its general policy in proposing to abolish almost the only high municipal authorities which were independent of party bias. The Corporation of London and the Municipal Board of Works systematically confine themselves to their proper duties, and the Board of Works holds itself so entirely aloof from politics, that if the Chairman had not happened to have a seat in the House of Commons there would scarcely be a member of the Board of whom it is known whether he is a Conservative or a Liberal. Their place is to be taken by a Common Council elected by the ratepayers, who will in their turn be directed by the party managers. The sole supporters of the Bill among the whole population of London are the Radical Caucuses, which collectively form or support the Municipal Reform League. The members of the Board of Works who are for a time to form a part of the Common Council will be oddly contrasted with their new colleagues, who will be all political partisans. It is perhaps as well that the future municipal elections should be controlled by the Corrupt Practices Bill; but there is no reason to suppose that candidates will be specially disposed to bribery.

In some provincial towns there is room for improvement, and it may perhaps be effected by stricter legislation. The Attorney-General's Bill deserves approval, but it will scarcely excite enthusiasm.

PRINCE BISMARCK AND THE SOCIALISTS.

THE debate on the Anti-Socialist Bill in the German Reichstag was in several respects one of considerable interest. The division was awaited with a good deal of anxiety, and its results seem to have been uncertain almost to the end. For weeks the Liberal papers have been discussing, with some acrimony, the question whether the Secessionists pledged themselves to vote against this measure on their fusion with the Party of Progress. On Saturday twenty-five of them proved by their votes that they did not consider themselves to have done so. Dr. WINDTHORST'S proposals seem to have been supported by the whole of the Centre; but they were an attempt at a compromise. They recognized the continued necessity of exceptional legislation; but, at the same time, they aimed at limiting the powers of the Government, for the purpose of gradually returning to a normal state of things after such changes in the penal code had been made as might cover Socialist excesses. In a word, those who supported these amendments thought it requisite for the good of the nation to grant a part, but only a part, of what the Bundesrath demanded; and so, when they were withdrawn, and only the original question, that of simply accepting or rejecting the Bill, was before the House, each of them had to decide for himself whether his dread of the Social Democrats or his distrust of the Government was greatest. The result was that thirty-nine Ultramontanes voted in favour of the measure.

To an Englishman, however, the interest of the debate centres in the speeches of Prince BISMARCK, and more especially on the clear definition they afford of the position he has adopted with respect to the Socialists. The last time he addressed the House at such length it was to argue in defence of the Insurance Bill. He then declared that the Government had not abandoned its earlier and more comprehensive scheme of social reform. It had been found more convenient to submit the single parts to the Reichstag, one by one, but the proposals omitted had simply been laid aside till their turn came. If the present measure passed in any form that the Government could accept, he pledged his word that every effort should be made to extend its benefits to the classes at present excluded; if it were rejected, as long as he remained in office, it would be returned to the Reichstag, session after session, in a modified form, until one had been found that would satisfy the House. Even the smallest point might form a centre from which social crystallization might begin. He then challenged the Liberals to declare their policy frankly. If they thought no further legislation was required, let them say so; that was a point of view he could understand; if it were theirs, it ought to be put plainly before the Empire. If, on the other hand, they agreed with him that reform was needed, but objected to the one proposed, let them make some practical suggestion. It would not be well for them, even in a party point of view, if the country became convinced that they acted as a mere drag on the wheels of the State, and succeeded only in frustrating the more generous wishes of a Government which had made so many concessions to their opinions. In the late debate he repeated these pledges with even greater energy than before, but it was while demanding a prolongation of the exceptional legislation against the Social Democrats which excites a righteous indignation in the breasts of those who entertain a very sincere dislike to every curative proposal that assumes a practical shape.

Thus while Prince BISMARCK is straining every nerve to pass large measures of social reform, he has shown himself ready to make any sacrifice rather than relax the iron grasp which has enforced silence and submission on the advocates of similar schemes who endeavoured to compel the assent of the Government by crime and disorder. In acting thus he is only following out the principle that guided him during the most important part of his career. The democratic movement of 1848 filled him with disgust rather than hatred, and his later experience led him to transfer no small portion of this feeling to the Prussian Parliament. Whether its members were blind or unpatriotic was a matter of comparatively small importance to him; it was enough that they either could not see or would not understand the signs of the times. But this distaste for the forms that the Liberalism of the day assumed did not render him incapable of perceiving the true source of the discontent he regretted. There were evils that must be remedied, a great policy that must be adopted, and it was he who presented to Germany the two chief objects of her desire, a united Empire and a national Constitution. But these came as a free gift from the Throne, not as a concession wrung from a "squeezable" Government. The result is what we see—a great, quiet, Conservative nation, which abides by the law and respects the rights of its neighbours. And it may be doubted whether the Imperial CHANCELLOR has not done as much for Europe as for Germany by his bold, unwavering policy. Let any Englishman ask himself what the present position of his own country would be if the centre of Europe, instead of being ruled by the moderate counsels of the greatest statesman of the age, were still a mere aggregate of semi-independent principalities, or a Republic governed by eloquent lawyers and professors of a transcendental morality.

It is true that not only the observance of diplomatic forms, but the very nature of his plans, imposed silence on Prince BISMARCK before the unity of Germany was secured; but there were periods in the history of the conflict when a few words from him might have conciliated many opponents. With that clear insight into the future and disregard of the present which is the characteristic of the statesman of true genius, he refrained from uttering them. As he stood before the Liberals then, he stands before the Socialists now. He perceives that they have a real cause of complaint, but rejects their nostrums. Whether his plan will succeed or fail we cannot venture to guess. But of this we are sure; if it succeeds, none of the noisy quacks of the market-place will be able to claim any part of the credit.

As the CHANCELLOR himself suggested, it will be something even to have failed in such a cause and in such a way. The social question is forcing itself into the foreground in every nation of civilized Europe. We in England are beginning to feel that the poor can no longer be left to rot in the holes and corners they have hitherto called their homes; and perhaps Radical politicians may some day be taught in an unexpected way that Englishmen with hearts and consciences consider this a matter of more importance than the extension of the franchise or municipal reform. To other countries the same problem presents itself in somewhat different forms; and wherever the disease appears, the quack is ready with his patent medicine, which is generally an irritant poison. To such the politicians who are eager only for applause are too apt to lend an ear. It is characteristic of Prince BISMARCK that he has constantly and almost ostentatiously disregarded them. He has never, as the demagogue does, endeavoured to obtain fame upon credit in order to discount it for immediate popularity.

IRELAND.

IT was to be expected that the dexterously managed and dramatic intervention of the Parnellite party at the last moment in the Vote of Censure division should revive in the minds of politicians of more than one kind the unpleasant apprehensions which have been often felt and expressed as to similar conduct on the part of an enlarged Parnellite party in the future. It is one of the curiosities of politics that the conduct of the Irish party, who unquestionably hate Mr. GLADSTONE very much, has probably done more than the efforts of his own followers, or the mistakes of his political opponents, to keep him in power. If there is any reluctance in the country against a dissolution, it is as much caused by the spectre vert of eighty or ninety Nationalist Home Rulers as by anything else. It is not, perhaps, particularly demonstrative of the general prevalence of political sanity at the present moment that the chief idea in the minds of Liberals, and even to a certain extent in the mind of Conservatives, appears to be to conjure the spectre on homœopathic principles. The existing Irish franchise having sent to Parliament members who do their utmost to make Parliament helpless, the current notion appears to be to alter the franchise so as to send still more such members. On the part of Liberals this notion, if silly, is at any rate consistent. Their principle is "that voting instructs in the "use of the vote," that the best thing to be done with a thoroughly bad citizen is to make him an elector, and the best thing to be done with a constituency of thoroughly bad citizens is to refresh it with a contingent of citizens worse still. This is madness, but it is madness of a sufficiently methodical kind. But the irresolution which, as it is pretty loudly whispered, caused the collapse of Mr. CHAPLIN'S amendment, admits of no such qualified description. A Conservative as such is under no delusions either as to the right of a man to a vote or as to the beneficial effect of a vote on a man. He is in political matters a disciple of experience, not a supernaturalist; and the fact that pursuing a certain course has brought things to a very bad pass is to him no proof that pursuing it further will bring them to a better. Any hesitation on the subject of the Irish franchise and of redistribution as applied to Ireland which is felt by members of the Tory party must be due to one of two causes—faint-heartedness on the one hand, or a very ignoble and short-sighted desire to outbid Radicals in Radicalism on the other. The latter, it may be believed, exists in very few cases; the former, it may be feared, exists in not a few. The pitiful doctrine of the inevitable, which seems to be becoming more and more popular in politics, would seem to have established itself here also.

Yet the faint-hearted have not here the excuse of being able to plead that faint-heartedness may lead to some practical, if not too honourable, good. No rational being who looks on the state of Ireland to-day can discover in it any signs of approaching reconciliation to England on the part of the malcontents. There are not, for the moment, any very open or frequent outrages, and the authorities are slowly following up the traces of not a few outrages of the past which have hitherto remained mysterious. The sharp discipline of last year's executions has had its effect. Rents are paid after a fashion, and Sub-Commissioners under the Land Act have not much exceeded the twenty-five per cent. limit, though they occasionally relieve their feelings, as in Lord ORMATHWAITE'S case the other day, by reading impertinent lectures to their victims. The war has been transferred from Ireland to England, and the most interesting inquiries into Irish crime at present are held at Birmingham and at Woolwich, not at Kilmainham. The dispute between the tenant-righters and the land-nationalizers has weakened the National League, and the disapproval of the POPE, despite the contumacious fashion in which it has been received in some quarters, has undoubtedly had some effect on the Irish Roman priesthood. With fair seasons, and trade, as far as Ireland is concerned, reasonably good, there have been no immediate stimulating causes of disorder. But this is the utmost that can be said. Land is practically unsaleable; and it is pretty certain that, unless the much talked-of Government scheme for purchase is grossly unfair to the landlords, or else unduly burdensome to the State, it will either remain a nullity or be violently resisted. Isolated, but significant, acts of violence show that the spirit of outrage is by no means at rest. But the agrarian side of the question is, as it has always been (and it is the first and greatest misfortune of all that the fact has been persistently overlooked by Englishmen), only of subordinate importance. Those who have thought that by flinging sops to land hunger they could cure Irish discontent have mistaken the matter wholly. That there has been no connexion between the Land question and the Irish rebellion question is, of course, not to be said; that even the complete solution of the Land question would not solve the Irish rebellion question every one knows who knows anything about the matter. Irishmen themselves are under no delusion on this point, from the DAVITTS and the DEVOYS to the comfortably endowed persons who talk veiled treason against England in English rectories and English public offices. The favourite Irish talk, little noticed or known in England, about "West Britons," a "West British" party, and the like points straight to the centre of the question. By nature and law, by the result of history and the result of logic, the English realm is composed of Great Britain and Ireland—that is to say, Great Britain and West Britain. The malcontents, not exactly agreeing among themselves on the precise form which the severance shall take, are all resolved that Ireland shall not be West Britain any longer, and the Irish loyalists that it shall. Geographically, indeed, there is little hope for the former, at least it would appear so; but geography is only a natural science, and for such they care little. Politically, they think they can achieve the feat, though the means may vary between the entirely indefinite Home Rule which would satisfy Mr. SHAW and the very definite Irish Republic which would satisfy Mr. DAVITT.

If Englishmen in general understood this aspiration, and understood that probably a numerical majority of the inhabitants of Ireland are foolish enough to join in it, there would be comparatively little danger in the situation; though in that case they would hardly make trouble for themselves, as they are doing, by giving votes to the inhabitants of Irish cabins, and leaving them, roughly speaking, five members for every four to whom they are entitled. But a reckless act of which the consequences are understood is one thing, and a reckless act of which the consequences are not understood is another. It is nearly certain that in this case the consequences are not understood. That even a numerical majority of the inhabitants of Ireland is a very small numerical minority of the inhabitants of the realm geographically, politically, and historically one and indivisible, which it is proposed to dismember, is forgotten by Liberals because their pet commonplaces obscure it, by Conservatives because of the inglorious reluctance to recognize unpleasant facts or troublesome facts, even if they are not unpleasant, which is the parasite and curse of Conservatism. What this apparent majority, this really insignificant minority, wants is persistently ignored on both sides, and it is in this ignoring that the real danger lies. Even the Government plan of enfranchising Ireland to its hurt, and giving it new institutions of self-government to its wounding, would matter little if it were clearly understood that under no conceivable circumstances short of a victorious invasion will England allow the kingdom of Ireland to sever herself from the body corporate, any more than she will allow the kingdom of Kent or the kingdom of Northumbria to do so. Every now and then some vague statement to this effect is made by English journalists or by English statesmen. But there is a not inconsiderable party in England which protests against its being made, and what is of still more importance, every fresh concession is interpreted in Ireland, and in England too, as a concession to the protest. Every concession of the kind now advocated strengthens the hands of those who aim at dismemberment. If Englishmen, recognizing what the party calling itself Irish really wants, feel inclined to let it have more members of Parliament, more members of local governing bodies, more magistrates, and so forth, to carry out its views, they can of course do so. It is odd, unless it is done on the same humane principles as those on which the organizers of the Coup d'état gave the Parisians every facility for getting themselves in a convenient state for being shot. But it should at least be done knowingly, and there is too much fear that, with Radical claptrap on one side and Conservative unwillingness to put the foot down on the other, it is being done anything but knowingly.

FINDING THEM OUT.

THERE are two handles to everything, says EPICTETUS, one by which they will bear being taken up, and another which may not be quite so convenient. Mr. FORSTER'S conduct in speaking against the Government may be lifted by two handles. We may seize the performance with triumph, and exhibit it to amateurs as a fine example of straightforward eloquence not debased by the influence of party. Or we may take it up (gingerly) by the other handle, and regard it as an odd and rather uncomely piece of political bric-à-brac. How in the world, we may ask, did Mr. FORSTER come to distrust a man to whom he owes so much (whatever the debt may be) as he does to Mr. GLADSTONE? Mr. FORSTER made it plain, in his speech on the Vote of Censure, that he did not absolutely believe in Mr. GLADSTONE. Now how is this apostasy possible? Mr. FORSTER has sat beneath the same rafters, and even on the same benches, as the PREMIER. For years he was the associate of that unambiguous politician. He trusted him, he pinned his faith to him, he nailed his colours to the Gladstonian mast, and now, behold! he unpins the faith, and he strikes the flag. He says Mr. GLADSTONE "can "persuade most people of most things, and can persuade "himself of almost anything." This is not a trustful and confiding way of talking about Mr. GLADSTONE; yet Mr. FORSTER, as his old colleague, knows how deserving Mr. GLADSTONE is of confidence. Mr. FORSTER'S attitude is, therefore, to the pensive philosopher who takes it up by this handle "a strange and curious moral phenomenon."

We admit that, to ourselves, Mr. FORSTER'S behaviour seems neither very strange nor "very curious and disgust-

"ing," as the old story has it. Do we not continually observe, in the brief hours of our perishable days, that people believe in other people for years, or for a lifetime, and find them out at last? Mr. FORSTER probably believed in Mr. GLADSTONE with a fervent (though rugged) belief for more than half a lifetime. If ever he had doubts, they were solved like those of the nymph who loved the Isosceles Triangle. First, when she hesitated, she marked "his long "limbs trace alternate angles equal at the base"; and, when once more she faltered in her allegiance, "produced "at will, she saw the exterior angles equal still." In just the same way, if ever the chill shadow of scepticism stole over Mr. FORSTER's loving nature, he contemplated the moral perfections of his leader, was reassured, and voted straight. But then a day came when Mr. GLADSTONE's interior angles were no longer equal at the base, and when his exterior angles failed to conform to the rules of moral geometry. There was that peculiar occurrence, which we may not call a Treaty, but which, perhaps, by aid of a term borrowed from Mr. WHISTLER, we may style "An Arrangement in Kilmainham." Mr. FORSTER could not stand Mr. SHERIDAN, of Tubbercurry, and (after having been aimed at by assassins for about a score of times) had his doubts about Irish constitutional agitation. He would not be a party to any "Arrangement "in Kilmainham." He believed there was a Treaty, Mr. GLADSTONE believed there was no Treaty: and the affectionate confidence of years, the faith tried in Bulgarian Atrocities and Education Controversies, was swept away in a moment. After that Mr. FORSTER did not like BARDOLPH's security.

This is not a very rare kind of moral phenomenon. In life—private or public, political, amatory, or what not—there often comes a moment when the trust of years is ruined in an hour. Suppose a gentleman and stockbroker to have had a partner for twenty years, and suppose that partner, and all available securities, to be missing one morning, do we call the deserted stockbroker a curious moral phenomenon because he no longer believes in his ancient companion? Suppose a man has been engaged to a lady for years, and then imagine him to witness the usual conservatory scene of fiction, do we stand amazed because he transfers his confidence from the treacherous fair? Not at all. Well, the same sort of differences occur in politics. Mr. GLADSTONE, of course, has not bolted with the National till, nor coquetted with anything or any one more meretriciously alluring than the PARNELL party. But then Mr. FORSTER (for reasons not wholly unconnected with the instinct of self-preservation) does not love the PARNELL party. Mr. GLADSTONE might have been happy with both Mr. PARNELL and Mr. FORSTER; but Mr. FORSTER could not divide his own claim to affectionate regard. Consequently he does appear to believe less than of old in Mr. GLADSTONE, because, as he says, Mr. GLADSTONE can convince himself of almost anything. The ethical problem involved in this change of mind seems really neither obscure nor unusual. Mr. FORSTER may be in error, but he seems to think that he has found Mr. GLADSTONE and his associates out.

THE HEALTH EXHIBITION.

THE opening of the so-called "Health Exhibition" passed off very quietly, and people who were present thought more of a single episode, not included in the official programme, than of any part of the prescribed ceremonial. The unaccustomed sound of hisses at the downsitting and uprising of Mr. GLADSTONE has already formed a subject of sufficient observation, and need not be further mentioned now; but the uninteresting character of the proceedings in other respects was due, first to the unfortunate absence of the PRINCE OF WALES, and, secondly, to the extremely incomplete condition of the Exhibition itself. It may be found hereafter that people take as much interest in health as in fish. Health, tempered with fireworks and brass bands, may attract crowds as great as any of last year; but experience teaches us that these South Kensington Exhibitions have a dwindling tendency; and those of us who have lived a few years in London will remember more than one "International" show which, opened under Royal patronage, ended by becoming a mere bazaar. There is a good deal of puffing carried on by means of them, and the more satisfactory they are to advertisers, the less they really do for the advancement of science or art. We may, however, in the present incomplete condition of the Exhibition be permitted to hope for the best, and to anticipate much benefit to the health of all classes from the objects shown, and as little injury as possible from draughty galleries and nocturnal concerts.

The special objects of the Committee are set forth in the preface to the Official Guide. They are certainly very wide in scope. To illustrate as vividly and in as practical a manner as possible, not only food and clothing, but "the "dwelling, the school, and the workshop," as well as appliances for school teaching and instruction in science and art, seems to leave very little in the busy round of life untouched. In order to carry out these objects systematically, the whole Exhibition is divided into two main sections. The first relates to dress, dwellings, naval and military sanitation, nursing the sick, and meteorology. The second part relates to education, and is apparently added out of compliment to the City and Guilds Institute, in whose new buildings a considerable share of the Exhibition is contained. As the Guide somewhat simply acknowledges, the educational section "has nothing, properly speaking, "to do with health." We may add, as a corollary, that it has a good deal to do with disease. Technical education is to be put forward, however, as going hand in hand with health, and every one must hope that they may long be united. People who go to the Exhibition in search of health may come away with the seeds of technical education implanted in their minds; and the result, if unexpected, cannot be considered unsatisfactory. Although officially described as "International," the only countries represented are France, China, Belgium, and India. The conjunction of France and China may be of good omen, but the meaning of the word "International" is clearly strained. Why Germany, which has done so much in the study of disease and the promotion of health, is excluded we know not. There would probably have been little to gain by the inclusion of Italy—a country where hygienic science can hardly be said to exist. China is to be represented by a practicable tea garden, and Paris is to have a pavilion to itself, not yet ready, at the south-western corner of the gardens. To these seductions are added cheap dining-rooms, on DUVAL's system: architectural drawings, a collection of seeds; "stuffed specimens of ani-"mals fit for food," which will, no doubt, be objects calculated to arouse great curiosity; and an aquarium. The historical section, still incomplete, will probably, however, prove the most attractive part of the whole show. First comes, in the West Quadrant, near the Albert Hall, a collection illustrating the history of dress. This is very thoroughly carried out, and will prove in itself of the highest interest. Mr. LEWIS WINGFIELD, to whom the designs and arrangements are entrusted, proposes to show costumes of every age from the time of WILLIAM the Norman to that of the PRINCE REGENT. For his purpose he has searched, we are informed, among "contemporary authorities, such as "missals, tombs, portraits in oil, stained glass windows, "engravings, and even caricatures." The authorities at the Tower have supplemented the labours of Mr. WINGFIELD by sending a selection of ancient armour, and from the War Department we have a set of the old and new uniforms of the British army. A long way off, in the south-western corner of the labyrinthine buildings, is the "Old "London Street," a representation from drawings, by Mr. GEORGE BIRCH, of London dwellings of various periods. This feature of the Exhibition should surely have been peopled by the figures of Mr. WINGFIELD. We have almost omitted to mention the appliances for all kinds of sanitation, the sewer pipes, the electric lights, the ventilators, laundries, lifts, and freezing chambers, of which numberless examples are to be found, as well as a pavilion containing specimens of the water supplied by each of the London Companies, with maps of their respective districts. We fail to find tables of their respective charges; but, no doubt, visitors can procure them very easily at home.

It would be impossible to doubt the usefulness of such a gathering of all kinds as this. On the other hand, time only can tell whether it will be popular. It is perhaps a little too extensive, too indefinite. It comprises too many things besides sanitary appliances. The Fisheries Exhibition was almost homogeneous. The regular old South Kensington elements, the "reproductions" which were hateful to our youth, were conspicuously absent. They are very present indeed now, and may deter the great throng of visitors.

We shall see, but in the meantime there can be no doubt of the probable popularity of the dress collections, of the Old London section, and especially of the cheap dinner department.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL AGAIN.

IT is to be hoped that we have heard the last of the Channel Tunnel, at least for some years to come. Both the debate and the division in the House of Commons last Wednesday were decisive against it. The feebleness of the arguments in its favour and the utter failure of its supporters to upset the reasons urged against it were equally conspicuous; and a majority of 138 rejected Sir E. WATKIN'S Bill. Weak as his case was, it was still further weakened by what can only be called the puerility of some of his supporters. One of them "could not see what harm would "be done by this little perforation under the sea." Another called the opinions of military experts on the subject "most "discreditable." A third talked of the "boon" which the Tunnel would be to those liable to sea-sickness. "Were we "to stand still," he exclaimed, "when every other nation "was going ahead of us?" Before dismissing the subject, we hope for long, from our columns, let us once more briefly review the arguments on the subject which everybody interested in public affairs ought by this time to know by heart. In the first place, what good will the proposed Tunnel do? There are three answers given to this question. The first is that it will facilitate commercial relations between England and the Continent. Now even on this, which is the strongest point of Sir E. WATKIN, there are the greatest differences of opinion. In the judgment of many competent persons the Tunnel cannot turn out a profitable undertaking; in other words, people sending goods to or from the Continent will find it better to send them by sea than pay the high rates for freight which the Channel Tunnel Company would be forced to charge. We may regard this, however, as an open question, and say that the chances may be about even whether the Tunnel would or would not be of service to English commerce. Next comes the argument, which can hardly be treated seriously, based on the "horrors "of sea-sickness." No doubt sea-sickness is a very unpleasant thing while it lasts; but the extent of its "horrors" may be measured by the difference in the fares between Dover and Calais, and Folkestone and Boulogne, on the one hand, and between Dieppe and Newhaven, and Southampton and Havre, on the other. Multitudes of people, who are always sick at sea, and who know that they are going to be sick before they go on board, choose the long sea route simply because it is the cheaper. There may be a few invalids to whom even the short passage is enough to prevent them from going abroad at all; but it will hardly be maintained that it is on their account that an enterprise of such vast moment is taken in hand. Furthermore, it is perfectly certain that ships can be constructed which will reduce the chances of sea-sickness to a minimum. The Calais-Douvres is an example of what may be done in this direction; but there is no doubt that in a few years we could have vessels, seaworthy in all weathers, as superior to the Calais-Douvres as the twin-ship is to the packets which twenty years ago used to ply across the Channel. With suitable harbour accommodation on both shores, there seems no reason why the "Channel "Ferry" scheme might not be carried out. But in whatever way or ways the problem may be eventually solved, it is perfectly clear that the amount of sea-sickness which exists, and to which, we must confess, we attach very small importance, can and will in the course of time be very greatly reduced. What is left will be such as no one can seriously take account of.

There remains the third argument—namely, that the Tunnel will promote free intercourse, and therefore good feeling, between France and England. But of this there is not a particle of proof. The mere proposal to make the Tunnel, and the discussions which have followed thereupon, have assuredly not tended to promote a kindly feeling between the two countries. On the contrary, they have brought prominently forward a latent distrust which might otherwise have escaped notice. Direct communication by rail has no tendency in itself to make people feel kindly one to another. The French and the Germans stand in closer connexion with one another than they ever did before. But now, when it is possible to go through by express train in the same carriage from Paris to Berlin, the French and the Germans like and trust one another no better, but rather worse, than when the whole distance had to be traversed by stage. Nor is there any magic in a tunnel to promote brotherly love among nations. It is certain that France and Italy are more estranged, and more suspicious of one another, now than they were when the Mont Cenis tunnel was projected, or when, some fourteen years later, it was completed. In the case of France and England we are satisfied that, while the advantages of the proposed Tunnel are few and doubtful, the disadvantages are such that no prudent statesman, and, we may add, no enlightened well-wisher to either country, can wish to see it constructed.

There are, to put the matter briefly, three conclusive reasons against the making of the Tunnel—first, the possible danger that it might fall into the hands of an enemy; secondly, the increased military expenditure which this possibility would impose upon the country; and, thirdly, the disposition to chronic fits of panic which even the remote chance of a French invasion would keep alive in the English public. The highest military authorities are agreed that a seizure, by surprise, of the English end of the Tunnel is a possibility. That it is in the highest degree improbable is admitted on all hands; but it is possible. Many things in the highest degree improbable in the history of war have happened, and have determined the fate of campaigns and of empires; and to create such a possibility is a project which can only be explained by that blindness to the interests of their country which comes over persons who embark in speculations for their own profit. Considering the state of our military organization compared with that of Continental Powers, it is perfectly clear that, if an enemy obtained, by treason or surprise, possession of the English end of the Tunnel, the country would be at his mercy. We have not, and, in the present state of public feeling, are not soon likely to have, the military organization which the Continental Powers, with conterminous frontiers, are compelled to adopt. Not one of them, if it attempted to surprise another, and succeeded in doing so, could go far into the territory of the other, even if it entered at all, without finding a large and fully-equipped force ready to oppose it. From the rigorous necessity of being, like Continental countries, an armed nation we are saved by our insular position. To sacrifice this advantage for a doubtful commercial gain, for futile dreams of national brotherhood, and for saving a few people from being sea-sick, is a project that passes comprehension. What advantage can be set against the fact that strong fortifications must, according even to those in favour of the Tunnel, be erected at the English end of it, and that the utmost vigilance must be constantly exerted, especially in troubled times, to see that hostile troops are not smuggled through it? We are to be prepared, say the promoters of the scheme, to blow up the Tunnel as soon as any real danger of invasion presents itself. But who is to distinguish between a mere baseless scare and real danger? Who will take upon himself the responsibility of destroying a work which has cost so much until he has clear evidence that the destruction is necessary?—and then it may be too late. If nobody else gave false alarms, we may be certain that for a long time to come the Irish dynamite party would do so (to say nothing of the danger of their doing worse mischief); and, after a long series of false alarms, the real danger, if it did finally come, might easily escape notice. Were the Tunnel constructed, one of two things would happen—either, realizing the possible danger, the country would be always looking with anxiety towards France; or else, ignoring it, would lay itself open to just such a coup de main as, in the opinion of competent judges, is possible, though not probable. Who, again, is to bear the expense of the fortress at the English end? The cost of such a one as would be necessary has been estimated at three millions sterling, and the maintenance and garrisoning of it would be a heavy annual charge. The Company certainly could not defray the cost, and no Chancellor of the Exchequer would ask the House of Commons to vote the money. From this dilemma there is no escape. If there is one thing that the country depends on and cares for, it is the navy. Many most competent judges hold it to be far below its proper strength. Yet, in spite of all this, and in spite of a widespread uneasiness on the subject, any Government would think twice or thrice before proposing to increase the Navy Estimates by three millions. But, worse even than the possible risk and the actual expense which the Tunnel would involve, would be the perpetual liability to panic which it would produce in England. Till we have a military organization similar to that of the great Continental Powers, it is madness to sacrifice the unique advantage of our insular position. Nothing, again, would tend more to irritate public feeling in England than the constant suspicion that an attack upon us might at any moment be attempted. The French papers ask indignantly, in reply, if France is a country of brigands? By no means. But many things are fair in war which are not fair in other circumstances; and French armies have been known before now to invade other countries without even a declaration of war. That advantage of any serious kind would follow from the construction of the Tunnel is very doubtful. That evils of a very serious kind must follow from it is certain. That our national ruin might follow from it is possible, though not probable. For these reasons the House of Commons has, we trust for the last time, recorded its vote against it. On this point, at least, we believe the present Parliament to be in thorough harmony with the country.

MR. FREEMAN AT CAMBRIDGE.

MR. FREEMAN writing to the Pall Mall Gazette of Thursday last complained of a reference which we made to his speech at Cambridge at the opening of the new branch of the Fitzwilliam Museum. We said:—"Mr. "FREEMAN amused, but did not surprise, his audience by "suggesting that the Elgin marbles ought to be carried back "to Athens, and their place supplied by plaster casts." We added that, by parity of reasoning, Mr. FREEMAN might propose to denude the National Gallery of all but English pictures. With regard to our remarks Mr. FREEMAN says:—"Will it "be believed that all the Saturday Reviewer puts in my "mouth is pure fiction—distinct invention, which cannot "have come of any kind of confusion or misreporting?" Mr. FREEMAN proceeds to quote an extract from the Cambridge Chronicle, in which that paper (which we have not seen) represents him as saying that he is "glad "the statues in the present Museum were all of them "harmless casts, and none of them pilfered or taken (I "think I said 'stolen') from the only places where they "could have their full value." We did not refer to Mr. FREEMAN'S speech on the strength of any newspaper report, but from the evidence of our own ears. The value, indeed, of a report which softens "stolen" into "taken" may be easily judged. And we answer that, to the best of our belief, Mr. FREEMAN most distinctly conveyed to his audience his desire to see the monuments of Greek sculpture, now scattered abroad, back again in Greece. It is true that our sense of hearing, as well as Mr. FREEMAN'S memory, is liable to the infirmities which beset human nature. Whether Mr. FREEMAN used the words "Elgin "marbles" we cannot positively say; but the reference to them was pointed, and was at once understood by the audience.

CARIOLING.

TO the lover of Norway cariole is a pleasant name, having associations as agreeable as its liquid half-musical sound. It is the most fitting symbol of a restful life, still obtainable by the overworked Londoner, in a wild mountainous country, where the population is sparse and the social conditions are as simple and primitive as if the tourist had never invaded its secluded valleys. The cariole is a genuine Norwegian product, the outgrowth of its peculiar physical and social circumstances. In a country where the population is confined to valleys separated from one another by lofty and rugged mountains, where the manner of life is simple and almost rude, and where an extended water-way in the shape of fjords and inland lakes offers excellent facilities for the transport of commodities, the need of modern improvements in the art of locomotion has not made itself felt. Up to a very recent date the only travellers on a large scale were officials. For these special arrangements were made by the Government. The owners of the farms along the traveller's road were required to do the duty of innkeepers by supplying him with horses. A messenger ("Forbud") was sent in advance with the impedimenta, in order to engage the horses. When tourists began to explore the country, they had to follow the same plan. Thus Laing, writing in 1836, tells us that, when setting out on his travels from Christiania, he bought a little second-hand cariole, and sent on a Forbud a few hours in advance. The increase in the number of tourists during the last twenty years has not radically changed this system of travelling, but only developed it. A number of "fast" (that is, "fixed") stations have been added, at which horses are kept ready, so that a Forbud is unnecessary. And the tourist can, and commonly does, obtain not only his horse but his cariole from the farmer, there being a relay of both at the stations. To this it must be added that, within the last few years, new districts have been opened up to the tourist by excellent roads, some of which are triumphs of engineering skill.

The cariole is the Norwegian farmer's gig, a very unpretending vehicle, consisting of a narrow seat supported on a wooden frame by two cross-bars of wood which are fixed in the shafts and serve as rude springs. On this tiny seat the solitary traveller perches himself, his feet stretched out in front of him on the floor of the gig, or planted in two small rests at some depth below the seat. Behind the gig is a horizontal board, on which the traveller's small box or portmanteau is deposited, and where the postboy (Skydsgut) has to accommodate himself. In addition to this cariole proper, or single gig, there is a double one (the Reisekjaerre), often used by travelling pairs. But the cariole is the earlier and better institution. Two persons with the necessary quantity of luggage are quite weight enough to be behind one of the small Norwegian horses on a road which is pretty certain to be rough in places, and to have some sharp declivities. The cariole seems, too, by far the more appropriate vehicle for this wild and solitary country. It is a kind of land-canoe, by means of which one may easily part company with "the madding crowd," and penetrate into the perfect seclusion of primeval nature. For the postboy is, as a rule, given to silence and close attention to his horse, and, being out of sight, is readily forgotten. To one who finds a keen delight in now and then getting rid of customary associations and immersing his mind in wholly new surroundings, hardly anything can be better than jogging along in a cariole on a fine summer day. One soon gets used to the odd bobbing movement of the little vehicle. The small, plump, cream-coloured animal in front of you has a number of distinctly Norwegian traits which are certain to excite a measure of interest. He displays an almost human degree of intelligence in accurately adjusting his actions to the circumstances in which he happens to find himself. Whips being a luxury in the country, and more often than not dispensed with, the shrewd quadruped proceeds at the outset to discover in a thoroughly methodical and almost scientific manner whether his new driver possesses one of these objectionable instruments. He begins by turning his head, which is unencumbered with blinkers, and by this means is able to frame an initial hypothesis. He then goes on to verify his conjecture by a number of tentative experiments, such as stopping short some yards this side of a hill or a gate. He seems thoroughly to understand the conditions on which he is let out to the tourist, and knows his duty far too well to allow himself to be overworked and so rendered unfit for to-morrow's task in his owner's meadows. He will trot down a steep hill at a rate which is calculated to frighten the novice, but strenuously insists on taking every rise, however gradual, at a creeping pace. This is apt to exasperate the ordinary British tourist who has imported the habits of city life into these sequestered regions, and who calculates on getting over so much ground in a given time. But the experienced Norwegian traveller knows better than to make rigid calculations. Here, where time is abundant, and consequently its flux is not noted with scientific precision, where an emphatic "Strax" ("immediately") may express nothing more definite than some point in the adjacent future, the first condition of mental repose is to forego calculation and to be ready to drift on as circumstances allow. And the traveller who has attained to this desirable mental condition can hardly fail to conceive a certain friendly sentiment towards the somewhat opinionated, yet thoroughly shrewd and painstaking, animal behind which he sits. The actions of the postboy, too, will be likely to strengthen this feeling. His whole mind is given to the problem of reducing the amount of wear and tear to his pony to a minimum. He jumps down from his narrow perch on the traveller's trunk at the first indication of sloping ground. If the pony looks uncomfortable and disposed to ease himself by a short pause, he is on the alert, and admonishes you, in a manner suggestive of some great impending evil, to pull up. It is said that tourists not infrequently overdrive these ponies, the normal pace of which is, according to Dr. Nielsen's valuable Reisehaandbog, somewhat under five miles an hour, even on good roads. And the farmers appear, in consequence of such over-driving, to have become more watchful of their valuable little horses. By the postboy, it may be added, is meant—now the farmer himself, now a son, now a wife, and so on. According to our experience, the women are even more solicitous about the comfort of the animals than the men.

But the pony, though claiming a certain amount of the tourist's attention, does not engage it altogether. After a day or two's experience, he learns to confide in these thoroughly competent creatures and to feel perfectly free to inspect the glorious scenery through which he passes. We will suppose him to be driving up one of the many picturesque valleys of the country some sunny morning in August. In the bottom of the valley some distance below the road there rushes a fine mountain stream, its succession of falls filling the valley with a pleasant murmur. Along its course one sees a number of curiously constructed water-mills, the nimble little wheels of which splash the water about in a lively fashion, adding a higher and gayer note to the music of the valley. Looking up to the slopes above the road the eye notes here and there on some prominent knoll a picturesque farmstead, consisting of the main building, gaily tinted in yellow or red, and outhouses in their natural pine stains. More rarely a white wooden church introduces a still brighter feature into the scene. The farmers with their families and dependents are busy cutting the sweet mountain grass and carting it away in light sledges. They answer the traveller's greeting cordially, and seem to take a kind of vicarious interest in their neighbour's passing pony. The odours of the thyme from the newly-cut meadows are varied by the no less sweet scent of the newly-cut pine planks lying by the stream. The sight of a red or blue patch on the bank, indicating a crop of wild strawberries or bleaberries, now and again tempts the unhurried traveller to alight. As the road ascends the higher Alpine scenery comes into view; steep mountain-sides clothed with pines and scrubby birch, above which tower rocky crags, some of a light grey, which, illumined by the morning sun, is hardly distinguishable from the white of the snow that lies about them and in their crevices.

Of course all carioling is not of this agreeable character. The tourist may now and again have to drive for many hours together through pine-woods, gloomy, monotonous, and empty of sound. Yet there is a strange fascination in a pine-forest where man's hand has never interposed to arrest the long process of growth and decay. On all hands may be seen fallen trunks with the rudiments of branches. Some lie obliquely, leaning against their hardy survivors, and some are prostrate on the ground. Many are stripped of bark and bleached by long exposure, resembling skeletons of huge centipede-like creatures. A drive through one of these forests impresses one in a peculiar way with the profundity and range of nature's solitude. In addition to these pine-covered tracts, there are the vast tablelands, or fjelds, which constitute a considerable fraction of the area of the country. Here there is little to delight the traveller's eye in the mountain contours. Instead of fine undulating curves and bold peaked forms, there is a long sweep of monotonous line. Yet, if beauty of form is wanting, that of colour is present in abundance. The mosses and lichens which luxuriate in these higher regions are a delight to the dweller in the lowlands. And the variegated hues of green, ochre, and grey, with which they paint the mountain-slopes, are further enriched by the warm tints of the bleaberry and other shrubs, which towards the end of August are in full autumn glow. It need hardly be added, perhaps, that the cariole offers little protection against the weather. A long, wet drive in one of these vehicles must be admitted to be depressing. The gig is apronless, and the traveller has to exercise all his ingenuity in order to keep his legs dry. The pony dislikes the cold, pelting shower, and protests with unmistakable signs against continuing the journey. The situation is a trying one, and it is hard to maintain a serene temper when a sense of chill damp spreads over the whole bodily surface, when the eyes are blinded by the driving rain and the frequent cascades from the deluged hat above, and when the stiff and benumbed hands refuse to hold the reins any longer. But there is always a remedy in such a case. The traveller can hand over the ribbons to the postboy and take to his feet, assured that he will reach the next station in good time for the meal which his Forbud can order for him. And though the cariole has its drawbacks, the discerning mind will recognize that they are slight enough when compared with the miseries of the crowded Swiss diligence or German Eilwagon. Here on the seat of the cariole you may be parched by a hot sun or benumbed by rain or sleet; but at least your limbs are not stiffened by the unrelenting pressure of your neighbour's, nor are your senses revolted by a cloud of choking dust, or by the fumes of bad tobacco. Whatever its drawbacks, the cariole has this superlative recommendation—that it leaves you free to travel when you like and as little as you like. The frequency of the stations, which are rarely more than ten miles apart, allows the tourist to halt when he is inclined. And if he does not object to plain quarters and diet, he will often find it a real advantage to loiter at some small and unfrequented station. The farmer unaccustomed to guests will give the traveller more than the usual dole of Norwegian hospitality, will show him over his farm, and give him more information about Norwegian life than he could have acquired in weeks passed at more frequented places.

PANSIES FOR MR. GLADSTONE.

SUCH a division as that of Tuesday night, and such speeches as those of Mr. Goschen and Mr. Forster, ought to be "for thoughts" to a much less thoughtful man than the Prime Minister. We are not ourselves very much in the habit of offering him wreaths of any flowers, but on this occasion it seems but charitable to do so. No one who speaks temperately would pronounce Mr. Gladstone a bad man, and no one who speaks with knowledge would pronounce him a foolish one. But it is certain that he has in his life done infinitely more mischief than many accomplished and powerful scoundrels, and that many persons not far removed from absolute foolishness have passed through long political experiences without committing a tithe of his blunders. The cause of this Mr. Forster formulated for the first time on the Prime Minister's side of the House (it has been often enough, and in almost exactly identical words, formulated elsewhere) on Tuesday. It lies in the Prime Minister's faculty of "persuading most people [read perhaps many people] of many things, and himself of almost anything." But the faculty of persuading oneself of almost anything implies, and in fact is almost identical with, the faculty of shutting one's eyes to almost anything; and it is this which Mr. Gladstone possesses in really unapproached measure. Gossip has often said (on what authority we neither know nor care) that this faculty has been of late years encouraged by a practice of which Mr. Chamberlain also boasts, but which we very shrewdly suspect that Mr. Chamberlain does not really carry out—the practice of never reading any newspapers or documents except such as support his own views. If this be so, it is perhaps useless to offer him this humble pansy wreath, but it may be useful for somebody else.

In the first place, there is that awkward business at the Health Exhibition last week. After denying the fact, and then striving to minimize it, the Ministerial papers took the old and obvious line of abusing the hissers as luxurious Londoners corrupted with metropolitan immorality, enemies of reform, personal haters of Mr. Gladstone, and so forth. We have nothing to say about this, for every man who wrote it, except perhaps the mere saute-ruisseau attached to the lower provincial papers, knew at the time of writing that it was absurd, and, moreover, that no audience is by nature so averse to any private expression of feeling as such a London audience as that of Thursday week. But what is really curious is the "puzzled, surprised, and chagrined" air which not merely published accounts but trustworthy eye-witnesses attribute to Mr. Gladstone. We have not the least doubt whatever that Mr. Gladstone's surprise was genuine and profound. He has been so accustomed of late to be spoken of or to as a kind of minor (and not so very minor) divinity, to have the Particular Baptist Synod of Llanpumpsaint kissing his shoestrings, and the Liberal Twenty-two of Little Pedlington mumbling his finger-tips, to lead a Cabinet of not undistinguished statesmen into the wildest or the meanest enterprises at his pleasure, to make war and be blessed for making war, to run away and to be extolled for magnanimity in running, that by this time he has probably lost all idea of how it really strikes a contemporary. True, he hears unpleasant truths in Parliament. But then he is quite sure (as he naively told the world on Monday) that this is due to nothing but the desire of office on the other side. Out of Parliament it is extremely probable that he never hears the truth at all except in such rare, unusual, and unpleasant forms as that which it took on Thursday week. And we should be very glad if we could think that Mr. Gladstone was as wise a man as Beatrice was a girl; that he went home and said to himself, "What fire is in mine ears?" and began to wonder whether after all it is judicious to take the Particular Baptist Synod of Llanpumpsaint and the Liberal Twenty-two of Pedlington as perpetual oracles and indices of public opinion. The speech of Monday makes it but too evident that he did nothing of the kind. Yet here was a pansy, and a large and striking one, offered him if so be he would notice it.

Here is another. With intense and no doubt fully sincere indignation Mr. Gladstone asked during the debate what Sir Michael Hicks-Beach meant by dishonouring him, Mr. Gladstone, in the eyes of the country? We say that this indignation was quite sincere, and we are ourselves sincere in saying so. But not a man in the country, not even the newspaper writers who (in back parlours, according to Mr. John Morley) support Mr. Gladstone, is unaware that the dishonour had been publicly done days and weeks before by the publication in official despatches of the story of the Gordon mission. That story, as it presents itself to ninety-nine men out of a hundred—to nine men out of ten who speak and vote and write for Mr. Gladstone—is simply this. Some one standing on the bank of a dangerous river has, under stress chiefly of the opinion of bystanders, sent another man into the stream to rescue certain valuable or valueless property. The salver is promised every assistance, and the man on the bank makes himself responsible for his safety. When the salver gets to his work he signals for a rope; the man on the bank replies that he acknowledges every responsibility for his safety, but a rope is just the thing that he can by no possibility allow him. A plank floats by, and the salver requests that his employer, who has every means of doing so, will push it towards him. The employer, with much politeness, signals that planks are things not to be thought of, and with his boathook gives it a dexterous shove in the other direction. At this the salver waxes indignant, and declares the accomplishment of his mission impossible. "Then why don't you come out?" says the man on the bank, oblivious of the fact that by this time the river is full of floating débris through which no swimmer can get. The bystanders exclaim at this conduct, and the man on the bank, with much fervour and some indignation, lays his hand on his heart, declares that he makes himself fully responsible for his agent's safety, and asks what more they want. Finally, the salver, just before the flood and its débris hide him from view, exclaims that he has been deserted, the bystanders echo the cry, and the man on the bank, more indignant than ever, accuses them of dishonouring him and of having underhand motives. Now this is—feature for feature, stroke for stroke—the view which almost every Englishman who has read the published telegrams has formed to himself of the conduct of the Government. Not a hundred men of the majority of Monday night would, if they were taken into a corner, accuse it of exaggeration or over-colouring. But Mr. Gladstone does not see it; does not believe that any one else sees it, and is left considering the grass blue and the sky green, while all the rest of the world considers the grass green and the sky blue. Here is another remarkable pansy.

It may be followed up by a whole bunch—a bunch by no means of heartsease for Mr. Gladstone. It would be too much to ask him to correct his perspective by the speeches of Mr. Forster, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Cowen, or Mr. Laing, bad men who openly dissented from him, enemies of his own household, who of course deserve nothing but his forgiveness as a Christian, and his remembrance as a man. But let him get his son or his secretary to take Tuesday's and Wednesday's Times from the file and read over quietly the speeches of his independent Liberal supporters—of the good men who rallied to him, not merely with a silent and shamefaced vote, but with valiant voice. For ourselves, we can imagine no more utterly disheartening, and at the same time enlightening, course of reading. There is, to begin with, Sir George Campbell. It can never be a subject of any great exultation to any man that he is supported by Sir George Campbell; but to be supported by Sir George Campbell in such a fashion as that of Monday must indeed be painful. Sir George disapproves of our being in Egypt at all—that is to say, he disapproves of the whole policy of the Government for two years past. He disapproves of the mission of General Gordon—that is to say, he disapproves of the principal move of the Government in Egyptian policy during the present year. He disapproves equally of General Graham's expedition. The one thing that he approves of is the fact that the Government have abandoned General Gordon—that is to say, he endorses Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's proposition at the very moment that he gives his voice against it. From such a friend we can find it in our charity to pray that even Mr. Gladstone may be saved. Then there is Mr. Buxton, who follows Sir George a little more explicitly and more clumsily. He (textually) thinks the Government "made a mistake in sending Gordon," and "very near a mistake" in sending Graham. This is backing your friends! He thinks General Gordon's opinion—the opinion, be it remembered, of the trusted Plenipotentiary of the Government—is "absolutely untrustworthy" (Mr. Buxton said unreliable, but we prefer to write, as well as to think, like Englishmen). He is himself of opinion that the Government ought to consider such and such interests before the interests of General Gordon. That is to say, he agrees with Sir Michael Hicks-Beach that Gordon's interests have not been consulted, and thinks all the Government policy wrong. From such a friend—but it is unnecessary to repeat the whole refrain of our Litany. Then there is Mr. O'Connor Power—a convert, an Irish convert—an Irish convert who has not yet had anything "done for him." Here, if anywhere, backing might be expected. Mr. Power backs his best, and the best comes to this, that he accuses Mr. Gladstone of "a grave crime" in the bombardment of Alexandria, and disapproves of "domestic interference in the affairs of Egypt," which has been going on, clumsily indeed, but still going on, from the bombardment of Alexandria to this day. (Refrain.) Then comes Mr. Arthur Arnold. Mr. Arthur Arnold "wishes with all his heart that General Gordon," the chosen Government agent, the agent who, according to Mr. Gladstone, has been entrusted with the amplest powers, and supported with the warmest seconding, "had remained at Jerusalem." The Government have, according to Mr. Arnold, committed "a series of errors." He is very doubtful about the omission to send an expedition to Berber; but is "not inclined to bear hardly on the Government for inattention to Gordon's telegrams," which have therefore, by admission of this supporter of the Government, been treated with inattention. (Refrain.) And last of all comes Mr. John Morley. Mr. John Morley apparently thought that the time had come to speak of many things, and every one will acknowledge that Mr. Morley speaks cleverly and pleasantly about anything. Of the comparative position of himself and his colleague as representatives of the feeling of Newcastle, of the general election of 1880, of restrictions on the importation of cattle, of the "calamitous events to the eve of which" Mr. Gladstone's Government had brought England (good backing this!), of the unpleasantness of voting against one's friends, of the paltry character of newspaper writers who write in back parlours, Mr. Morley discoursed in excellent style. He did his duty to his friend Mr. Chamberlain by saying some unpleasant things about his friend Mr. Chamberlain's enemy, Mr. Forster. He criticized General Gordon with much freedom—forgetting, apparently, the admiration which the Government expresses for General Gordon. But not one single word did he say traversing the assertion of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach that the Government have not taken steps to assure General Gordon's success; and every word he did say tended to show that he supported them precisely because they have not taken such steps.

From such friends we, of our charity, pray that even Mr. Gladstone may be saved; and we pray, further, that he may take the lesson of their friendship to heart. Unfortunately there is the very faintest chance or possible expectation that he will do anything of the kind.

CRICKET.

SOLVITUR acris hiems—the winter is past, the cruel winds have ceased to blow (to be sure, as these words are written, the weathercock is pointing due east), and after the storm of last Monday one feels almost tempted to say the rain must be over and gone. As the Roman sailor wheeled his well-dried keels again to sea, so now the cricketer takes down his trusty bat and inspects its well-oiled surface with loving eye, looking carefully to its proportions, lest haply they should offend the renewed vigilance of the law. The umpire bestirs himself—poor fellow! it is no holiday task that lies before him—and all things are in trim for one of the busiest seasons cricketing England has ever known.

The Marylebone Club has held its general meeting, and also an extraordinary one, for the purpose of considering the revised laws, and especially that one concerning bowling on which so many wise and unwise words have already been written and said. The general meeting showed as usual that the affairs of the famous Club are financially most flourishing; and, though a little breeze of unpleasantness seems to have blown through the pavilion on that Wednesday afternoon, it was not such as to affect in any way the prospects of the game, or to have much interest for the general public of cricketers. The extraordinary meeting, held on April 21, was of more importance. Lord Harris carried his amendment to Law 48 by a large majority. The practical meaning of his victory is that the umpire, whon at all suspicious of the fairness of a bowler's delivery, is to reverse the principle which in other matters holds good all the world over, and has hitherto held good in cricket, the principle of giving the offender the benefit of the doubt. A bowler now must be as free from all suspicion as Cæsar's wife; if not, the fatal word must be spoken. It is extremely unlikely, for many reasons which have already been threshed to death, that this new rule will have the effect desired, or indeed any, save possibly that, not at all to be desired, of promoting much squabbling and not a little bad blood. Indeed, Lord Harris himself is clearly not hopeful, for he allowed that the new law would probably do little more than bear witness to the fact that in a certain year the Marylebone Cricket Club recognized the existence of unfair bowling. Why, then, pass a law which its most thorough supporter owns is little likely to check the abuse against which it is aimed, and, as every one must see, is very likely to open a door to others which charity may make us unwilling to anticipate, but only folly can suffer us to ignore? However, the law is passed; remonstrance is now unavailing, discussion idle. Perhaps, as the question put by Sir George Chetwynd to the Stewards at a recent meeting of the Jockey Club, concerning an unholy alliance believed to have been formed between certain members of the racing community, is considered likely to serve its purpose by warning the offenders that eyes are on them, so it may be with Lord Harris's new law. The offenders—whoever they may be, of which no two persons seem to be certain—may take the warning and mend their ways in time. If they persist, it is but little that the umpires will do, little perhaps that they can do, to stop them. The speaker who spoke most to the point on that Monday afternoon was he who said that the unfair bowler must be treated like the unfair whist-player, and banished from the company of the fair.

This was the most important point settled. Mr. I. D. Walker proposed to amend the law relating to substitutes, by refusing them for the absent. This was lost by only two votes, which was, we think, a pity, though here again the good sense and spirit of players may be stimulated by the fact of the proposal and the number found to vote for it. The new rule that all the "one-day matches" should be decided by the first innings, if not played out, is a good rule. It has long been practically law outside the Marylebone Club, and it is well therefore that formal sanction should thus be given to it. In such matches, too, the "over" may now consist of five or six balls, as the players shall determine, instead of the legitimate four. This is a practice, we fancy, not unknown on some provincial grounds, and doubtless increases the chance of playing out the game. A proposal to reduce the width of the bat, which some believed might also reduce the superiority of the batsman, was not discussed owing to the absence of the proposer. It would not have been carried, so it was well no time was wasted on it. The batsman beats the bowler to-day, partly because of the great improvement in our cricket-grounds all England over, and partly because we happen at present to be very poorly supplied with good bowlers. But it is right that bats should not exceed the lawful width, and many have been found to do so. Most of the Australian bats, for example, were so found last Monday in Sheffield Park, and pared down accordingly to the proper limits, which were even then found a great deal too wide for our bowlers. Those limits—4¼ inches—are narrow enough in all conscience for a bad batsman; half an inch less would not stop a good one from scoring.

A busy season indeed it will be, if only Jove will stay his hand. The Australians are among us again, and have begun their golden march through England by very sadly beating the Eleven Lord Sheffield got together to play them on his own pretty ground in Sussex. To be sure there were only three or four first-rates among the Englishmen, and a terrible lack of bowling. But the defeat was complete enough, and one can only hope it does not foreshadow too many more to come. The best of our visitors of 1880 and 1882 are here again. Massie, Horan, and Garrett have stayed at home, and Scott, Cooper—of whose bowling great things are whispered—and Midwinter, two seasons ago one of "the Ground" at Lord's, are in their places. Eight times will they measure their strength against the pick of our players. At Lord's on the 22nd of this month they will meet the Club and Ground, and on the 29th the Gentlemen of England. In June they play the Gentlemen again at the Oval on the 26th, and on the 30th the Professionals at Sheffield. In July they are matched against the united strength of England at Manchester on the 10th, and on the 21st at Lord's; on the 31st they meet the Professionals again at the Oval. On the same ground they play England once more on the 11th of August. Besides these matches, they will play all the best of the Counties and the Universities, and will not play, we are happy to say, any of those sheer "gate-money matches" against unresisting Eighteens and Twenty-twos—exhibitions of incompetence on one side and greed on the other, which were quite as bad for cricket as ever were the meetings at Kingsbury or West Drayton for racing. We will hope, too, that the season will not be stretched too far. Cricket in the mists and damps of autumn, when the ground is sodden and the players stale, is poor stuff, poor to play and poor to watch.

Both the Universities seem likely to be strong; so far as one can tell at present, which is not far, Oxford a little the stronger. The heroes of the Eton and Harrow Elevens of last year, Marchant and Greatorex, are both, it is true, at Cambridge, who seem also to have got a smart bowler in Milner, who learned his cricket at Wellington. But Oxford seems unusually rich in capable Freshmen. Cobb, from Winchester, Buckland, from Marlborough, Higgins, from Westminster, O'Brien, who played well for Middlesex more than once last year, and Key, from Dulwich, who has already won laurels for Surrey, besides Nicholls and Whitby, who have as we write played excellently against the Australians, are all promising players, while Money-Wigram and Pemberton seem likely to renew their ancient fame. Let us hope the promise will have blossomed into performance by June 30.

The Counties are much as they were last year. Surrey is said to have found a wicket-keeper to take Pooley's place, and Gloucestershire that long-desired boon, a fast bowler, in the person of one Gregg. He bowled fairly well against Yorkshire last week at Moreton-in-the-Marsh, but his county suffered a most inglorious defeat, scoring only 43 runs out of the 85 wanted to win. The great Doctor, who has already topped the hundred twice in local matches, did not "come off," and he stands to Gloucestershire as Rome, according to the Venerable Bede, stood to the world. Kent has begun well, beating Somersetshire in one innings, though they got very much the worst of it with a Marylebone team, thanks to the brisk hitting of Messrs. Shuter and Charles Studd. Sussex, too, has won its first match against the Club, though by only one wicket. Every one would be glad to see these two counties resume their old pride of place; indeed, Kent, under the stimulating, if somewhat Spartan, rule of Lord Harris has within these last years done more to deserve success than almost any other county. Nottinghamshire will not play Lancashire this year. The heroes who disport themselves on the banks of the Trent like not the deliveries of Crossland—a dislike shared probably by all who have felt them; for, whether he be a fair bowler or not, there is no question that he can be a mighty dangerous one. However, the Lancashire captain is the last of men to bend before a storm, and Crossland will probably continue to shatter wickets and shins for another season at any rate. As we have said before, there are many worse offenders than he, but then they are more gentle in their offences. It is perhaps a feeling that the voice of reform cries only when it is hurt that tends to make that cry so unavailing. But, however all these things may be, from now to the close of August, if only the skies will be propitious, there will be cricket enough, and of quality enough, to satisfy the veriest glutton. And besides such as we have already indicated, there will be new candidates for honours in the field, a team from Philadelphia, who, among other matches, are to play the Gentlemen of the Marylebone Club at Lord's on June 16th. America, if Mr. Warner and his young eagles will permit us to say so, is commonly believed to be less supreme in cricket than in other things; but no doubt this belief, too, will be proved erroneous, as have been so many other of our ideas concerning that great and intelligent country. All good cricketers must pray for such summers as we know in the years gone by—

> Ah, what days were those, Parmenides,
> When we were young!—

days when we were all younger and a little quicker in the field than we are now.

SUPPRESSED PASSAGES IN THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF POPE PIUS II.

AMONGST the men of the fifteenth century none is more interesting than Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini. Beginning his career as a poor lad in Siena, he managed to reach the lofty dignity of the Papacy. He owed his success in life to his readiness and versatility. Nothing came amiss to his hand. If oratory were needed, he was a fluent speaker. If a theological treatise was required, he could dress up the arguments of the schools in attractive Latinity. If a patron wanted a poem, the verses readily flowed. If a delicate matter demanded a supple diplomat, no one could display greater adroitness than Æneas. He made himself useful wherever he went. He gained an assured position in a humble sphere, and then used it as a means of rising into a more important region of activity. Feeling at the beginning of his career that nothing was to be gained at Rome, he went to Basel and made himself a personage in the Council. When he saw that the Council's Pope was doomed to failure, he dexterously transferred his experience to the Court of Frederic III. of Germany. When he found that Frederic III. was feeble, he set to work to reconcile himself with the Papacy by carrying to Eugenius IV. the obedience of Germany. Then secure at Rome, he worked his way to the Cardinalate and so to the Papacy. Political dexterity has rarely been crowned with such complete success.

Moreover, Æneas was not consciously an adventurer. His whole nature was so susceptible of outward impressions that he saw how things were going, and floated readily on the surface of the flowing tide. The world was moving, and Æneas thought it a duty to move with it. He had no belief in inconvenient principles. He had no wish to be a martyr to any opinions. He would not set himself up as wiser than his fellows. He admitted the right of the majority, and thought that true wisdom consisted in being on the winning side. This absence of prejudice gave Æneas perfect frankness of expression. He was well satisfied with himself and had nothing to hide. He was only doing what every one wished to have done, and he was glad that he did it so successfully. He took almost greater pleasure in recording his achievements than he did in performing them. We cannot define the literary charm of Æneas more accurately than by saying that he was his own Boswell.

The mass of the writings of Æneas Sylvius is very large, and he touched on almost every subject. His own life and character is amply shown in his letters, his various works on the history of his own time, and especially in his "Commentaries," in which he gave a detailed account of the events of his pontificate. Yet, though much has been published, something still remains. The Librarian of the Chigi Library at Rome, Signor Cugnoni, has just published from the MSS. under his charge a considerable volume of gleanings which have escaped the notice of previous editors.* These consist of seventy letters, a few speeches, a sketch of the history of Venice, some Latin poems, and an amusing theological dialogue, which touches every conceivable subject, but is supposed to be in favour of the Donation of Constantine.

We do not propose to discuss the value of this new material, which for the most part throws light on small points connected with the career of Æneas Sylvius and the history of his times. But there is one portion of this volume which is of general interest for the information which it gives of the state of society in Italy, and the details of the private life of Pius II. The most valuable of the works of Pius II. is his "Commentaries," which was left in manuscript at his death, was revised by his friend Campano, and was not published till 1584, a hundred and twenty years after the Pope's death. It was then issued under the name of Johannes Gobellinus, a German priest who had acted as coprist of the MS. which was sent to the press. We know, however, from the letters of Campano and of Cardinal Ammannati, another literary friend of Pius II., that the "Commentaries" was the work of the Pope himself. Indeed the internal evidence would have been sufficiently convincing if there had been no external testimony. However it appears that the editor of the edition of 1584, Archbishop Francesco Bandini de' Piccolomini, was a cautious man. Not only did he try to repudiate the authorship of Pius II. himself, but he also exercised his editorial right of suppressing passages which he considered to be too outspoken. These passages were, however, collected by some one who saw the sheets as they were passing through the press. They were stored among the Chigi MSS., under the title "Supplementum ad Commentarios Pii II. . . . . earum videlicit rerum, quas in impressione consulto omisere, et in codice manuscripto reperiuntur." There can be no doubt about the authenticity of these suppressed passages. They bear the stamp of Pius II.'s pen in an unmistakable manner. Some of them were known before—notably the amusing account of the proceedings in the Conclave which elected Pius II.

It is a piece of rare good fortune that these fragments have been preserved, and have been put together. After a lapse of four hundred years personal gossip becomes material of the highest historical importance. It enables us to enter into the life of the past, and judge the characters of men by a more intimate knowledge of their surroundings. It was quite right of the editor of Pius II.'s 'Commentaries" to exercise his discretion, and keep back many of the racy stories, the remarks on the characters of princes and cardinals, the little utterances of petulance which flowed naturally from the Pope's pen. But nowadays no one can be hurt by the venomed shafts of Pius II.; and his account of the intrigues of his cardinals will be read good-humouredly, as a contribution to the study of human nature, and will not be used as materials for a polemic against the Papal Court. It is well worth while to consider what lessons are to be learned from these suppressed passages of a quick-witted and keen observer of mankind.

We find, as might be expected, that expurgation has been exercised chiefly on unfavourable judgments and scandalous stories. The writings of Pius II. do not contain much praise of any one. His career had been a kind of single-handed fight, which left little room for large-mindedness or generosity. Though Æneas was of a kindly disposition and had some staunch friends, he was free from enthusiasm, and had a keen eye for human weaknesses. In this he was like the whole class of the Humanists, who could use fulsome eulogy or violent denunciation, but were so immersed in themselves that they had no capacity for discriminate judgment. For their patrons no laudation could be too lofty; for those who did not take them at their own estimate no abuse could be too vile. They did not content themselves merely with disparaging criticism, they attributed every conceivable crime to the men whom they disliked. In the early days of the revival of letters this copiousness of vituperation belonged to literary men, and was employed in literary squabbles. But it tended to pass on into popular language, and ultimately found its way into history. It is difficult to know how far the misdeeds attributed to the men of the fifteenth century were meant to be seriously believed. We feel more certain of the corruption of the age because such charges were made than because we are convinced of their truth in individual cases. Pius II. shows us how the blackening of personal character was turned from rhetoric into historical fact. The suppressed fragments consist largely of portraits of the Pope's political opponents. Sigismondo Malatesta, Lord of Rimini, was especially troublesome to Pius II., and the Pope has not spared him or his father. The abuse which he lavishes upon him is untranslatable. He exults in excommunicating him after an inquiry into all his crimes. "No one," he exclaims, "hitherto has gone down into hell with all the solemnity of a canonization. Sigismondo shall be the first to enjoy this distinction; by the Pope's decree he shall be enrolled a member of the society of hell, a companion of the damned and of devils." No doubt Sigismondo was unscrupulous, irreligious, and sometimes violent. But we know that he governed Rimini with mildness, that he was beloved by his people, that he was a patron of art, a friend of learned men, and that he was capable of a genuine attachment to the Lady Isotta. We cannot accept the Pope's picture of a man wallowing in every kind of licentiousness and undistinguishable from a beast.

Similarly Borso of Ferrara, who did not show the Pope the respect which was his due, is represented as eaten up by vanity, a prey to astrologers, and caring for nothing but the pleasures of the chase. Sigismund of Austria, Count of the Tyrol, had an ecclesiastical quarrel with Pius II., and is consequently credited with every form of tyranny and immorality, charges which are not repeated by Austrian authorities. A picture which bears more stamp of truth, though greatly exaggerated, is that of the old enemy of the Popes, Count Everso of Anguillara. "Tenacious of his own, greedy of what belonged to others, heedless of God and religion. He asserted that the world was made by chance, and that the souls of men were mortal like those of brutes. He was blasphemous and cruel, thinking as little of the slaughter of a man as of an ox. He invented most terrible tortures for his captives whom he hated. He nourished by rapine and theft such of his subjects as chose to serve in arms. The rest he oppressed beneath a stern rule; when wearied by six days' labour in the fields, that they might earn enough to pay his taxes, they were compelled to work the seventh day for him. It was well called the Lord's Day, he said, because it belonged to their lord—namely, himself. He carried off their wives and daughters at his will. He often struck his own sons and attacked them with the sword. He wasted the goods of churches. He was timid in meeting those who were bold; he was bold against those who were cowardly. When need was, he could endure toil and privation." We recognize in this a highly-coloured sketch of the lawless baron who made the approaches to Rome unsafe—a man like the German Raub-ritter, who lived by plunder, and whose oppression was tempered by a rough geniality.

Pius II. had a sort of cynical contempt for the current state of morality. "Such are the morals of Italy," he says, "that almost all its princes are bastards." But it must not be supposed that this general depravity was confined to Italy. Jean V., Count of Armagnac, lived in incest with his sister, and actually applied to three Popes for a dispensation that he might contract a legal marriage with her. The story is told by French authorities, but Pius II. gives a circumstantial account of Jean's dealings with the Papacy in this abominable matter. Nicolas V. refused his application with scorn; but the Bishop of Lectoure was sent to Rome to renew it before Calixtus III. When Calixtus III. was on his deathbed a papal secretary, John of Volterra, gave him a hint:—"If any of your friends want an unjust or discreditable job performed, now is your time." The Bishop of Lectoure at once promised him a large sum of money if he could get the dispensation signed, and he undertook to do so by means of Cardinal Borgia. John of Volterra drew out a dispensation for the fourth degree of consanguinity. When it was signed he erased the word "fourth" and substituted "first." But he kept the dispensation till he had received his money, and the Count of Armagnac complained to Pius II. of John's attempts at extortion. Pius II. investigated the matter, condemned the Bishop of Lectoure to perpetual imprisonment, handed over John to the secular arm, and imposed a penance on the Count of Armagnac. There was one consolation to Pius II. in this matter. He records with some complacency that the Count of Armagnac said, "I have been opposed to Charles of France, but I never dreaded his armies so much as the Pope's tongue, which is like a sharp sword." This story serves to illustrate the way in which moral depravity invaded the officials of the Papal Court, and the scandalous way in which current business was conducted. During the remainder of the century we meet with many cases of the punishment of officials who forged on a large scale dispensations and indulgences. If the Popes themselves were lax in granting privileges, their subordinates were still more lax. When so many documents had to be signed, they could not all be properly examined. The moral indignation which gave force to Luther's protest probably rested upon a broader basis than the Popes were aware of.

We have said that Pius II. was not a very generous critic of others. He remarks of his predecessor that "Calixtus III. was a Spaniard, ignorant of Italian ways, destitute of friends, and in the hands of his cardinals." He was sure that Calixtus III. did not make him a cardinal at his first creation, when he chose two nephews of his own and a youth of the Royal House of Portugal, "all of them so young that the three together had scarcely years enough for one; so that it was clear that they were created, not to serve the Church, but that the Church might serve them." Of two of the five cardinals created at the same time as himself, he says "one was under the power of an impudent mistress, the other was under the power of his physician." Even Cosimo de' Medici did not please him. He regretted that Florence was not wedded to a lawful husband, and had no ruler but a tyrant who oppressed the people. This was because Cosimo did not visit the Pope when he came to Florence, saying that he was too ill. On a second occasion Cosimo made his appearance, but was so crippled with the gout that he could not kneel to kiss the Pope's toe. "It reminds me," he said, "of two of our Florentines who, coming from the country, met in the market-place and tried to kiss one another. But they were so fat that they could get nothing to meet except their bellies. What they could not do through their corpulence, I cannot do through my gout." Cosimo was not sorry to give the Pope a specimen of the bluntness and homely wit of a Florentine citizen.

Pius II. was pleased with himself and wished others to be pleased likewise. He was careful of his dignity, and was sensitive of slights. In spite of his large experience of the world, he was not strong enough to override opposition, and relieved his feelings by writing down little spiteful remarks. He was delighted with anything tending to his own glory, and was proud of his own cleverness. When he fixed upon Mantua as the place of a European Congress, he bethought himself of a prophecy (which he probably invented):—"Virgil of Mantua sang of Æneas of Troy; Æneas of Siena enriched the country of Virgil." Once when a Sienese lady implored him to use his influence to ask a young man not to persecute her with his addresses, Pius II. remembered a story of Boccaccio in which a confessor was used as a go-between. He told this story to his disconsolate suppliant, and dismissed her with a rebuke for her anxiety in trying to enlist a Pope to help her in her loves. We wonder if Pius II. was not over-clever in this case. We should like to have the lady's account of the interview.

The greatest troubles which beset Pius II. arose from his cardinals. They were difficult to manage; they laughed at the Pope; they thwarted his political plans; they even spoke and wrote against him. The influence of the ideas of the Councils of Constance and Basel remained in the desire of the cardinals to act as a check upon the authority of the Pope. The Pope wished to free himself by making new creations; the cardinals strongly opposed every increase to the College. It required all the dexterity of Pius II. to overcome their opposition. On his first creation of cardinals he resolved to proceed with a high hand, and gave the cardinals a good scolding:—"You yourselves are the cause that the dignity of your office is not sufficiently esteemed. You live so that you seem to have been chosen, not for the government of the Church, but for the enjoyment of pleasure. You do not avoid the chase, or games, or the society of women. Your banquets are too magnificent; your raiment is too splendid. You abound in silver and gold; your retinues are excessive. If the dignity of cardinal were marked by abstinence and holiness, fewer would seek it. But we cannot withstand the customs of the time, nor keep back candidates. Do you make choice of fit persons, we will consider the number to be chosen."

Then the Pope named a list of candidates. The haughty Cardinal Scarampo exclaimed, "I am ashamed of being a Cardinal. The office used to be given to men illustrious by birth, wisdom, or holiness. You have named many whom I would not care to see in my kitchen or my stable. There are already enough cardinals. I do not think any of these whom you have named worthy of the dignity." Pius II. laughed, and said, "If my predecessors had adopted your standard, either you would not have been a cardinal or you would have had very few companions." Then he left the Cardinals to deliberate. They tried to have their own way by pressing the Pope to create one of his nephews. Long negotiations followed, but at the end the Pope created six cardinals, of whom his nephew was one.

The next creation, in December 1461, was still more difficult to manage. Pius II. seized the opportunity of his negotiations with Louis XI. for the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges to urge on the cardinals the political expediency of gratifying the French King by new creations. He thought it best on this occasion to negotiate with the cardinals individually, and he gives a delightful account of his own dexterity in securing a majority. He used alternately "entreaties, exhortations, promises, and threats." First he won over the avaricious Cardinal Estouteville by the offer of the rich bishopric of Ostia. This promotion created a vacancy in the bishopric of Porto, which he gave to Cardinal Carvajal, and so secured his vote. Similarly he gained Cardinal Bessarion, by granting him several petitions. Cardinal Alain of Avignon was strongly opposed to the creation of the Bishop of Arras. Pius II. reasoned with him, and convinced him of the expediency of securing the French King by rewarding his favourite, though he fully admitted that the Bishop of Arras was both an unworthy and a dangerous man. Cardinal Orsini refused to consent, though the Pope offered to include amongst the new cardinals an adherent of the Orsini, the Bishop of Corneto. When Cardinal Orsini was obdurate, Pius II. changed his tactics, and won over Cardinal Colonna by undertaking not to nominate his foe the Bishop of Corneto. The Pope found Cardinal Tiballi so stupid that he dismissed him as being out of his mind. Cardinal Cusa alone raised any considerations of the good of the Church. He pleaded with the Pope the decrees of the Council of Constance limiting the creation of new cardinals. "I cannot flatter," he proceeded. "If you can bear to hear the truth, I approve of nothing which is done in the Curia. No one does his duty; everything is corrupt. Neither you nor the Cardinals care for the Church. There is no observance of its canons, no reverence for its laws, no diligence in divine service. All are given to ambition and avarice. If I ever speak about reform I am laughed at. I am of no use here; let me go away; I cannot endure these customs; I am an old man, and need repose. As I cannot be of any use to the Church, I will try to live to myself." Then the austere and honest old man burst into tears. Pius II. was not much moved by this sincerity. He answered with plausible excuses, and reproofs of Cusa's overweening self-confidence. About the decrees of Constance he made a remark of some importance for canonists. "We have read the manuscript containing these decrees. Never during the session of the Council of Constance was any ordinance promulgated about the creation of cardinals. There were many deliberations, and many things were committed to writing as aids to memory; but they never received the form of a decree." Cusa went away almost heart-broken. He was too honest to assent; he could do nothing by opposition. He saw the need of a sweeping reform of the Curia, and he saw its hopelessness. He mourned till the end of his days over the evils which he clearly saw and was helpless to cure. He was the last survivor of those who had hoped to reform the Church from within.

We will give one more extract, which shows the purely human side of the life of Pius II. He had a little puppy dog of eleven months old, which he called Musetta. "She was white, but not very pretty, yet clever and affectionate, with winning ways." One day as the Pope was sitting in the Vatican garden transacting business, Musetta in her rambles clambered up the sides of a water cistern and tumbled in. The Pope's ear caught the piteous tones of her bark, and he sent his attendants to look after her. They arrived just in time to save her life, and she came back to the Pope with demands for his sympathy. Next day, in the same garden, a big monkey broke loose and almost worried Musetta to death. The Pope prophesied that his favourite was not destined to enjoy a long life. His prophecy was soon fulfilled. Ten days afterwards, the luckless Musetta was looking out of an open window, when a wind suddenly arose and blew her over. She fell from a considerable height and was killed. The Pope moralized to his attendants, "Let men learn from the fortunes of beasts. We may escape twice, but the third peril is fatal. Amend your lives before the third call comes."

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.—III.

THERE has been more grumbling about the present exhibition at the Royal Academy than we remember to have heard for many years. The public in general, the artists, the critics, and even, it seems, the House of Commons, are dissatisfied. The Academicians, it is universally allowed, have exhibited the greatest failures. Sir Frederick Leighton's "Cymon and Iphigenia" excites little or no interest, though, artistically speaking, it is a good picture. Mr. Alma Tadema's "Hadrian in England" is by far his weakest, as it is his largest, work. It may be described as a group of onions, below a mosaic background, and with a border composed of human figures. The composition is singularly unfortunate, and the key of colour very low. Yet, among the inferior works by which it is surrounded, it stands out well for its careful drawing and for the marvellous fidelity and correctness of its archæological details. Mr. Calderon's "Night" is inexpressibly beautiful; but from other Academicians we have such dismal, and even ridiculous, performances as Mr. Millais's "Idyll of 1745," Mr. Herbert's "Treasures of Home," Mr. Crowe's "School at Rouen" and "Fish Market," Mr. Colin Hunter's cast-iron sea in "As They Roar," Mr. Leslie's poor, pale "Benson Ferry," Mr. Cole's "Oxford," Sir John Gilbert's "Agincourt," Mr. Wells's "Old Crone," Mr. Sidney Cooper's pictures—one of them of gigantic size, representing humpbacked cattle—Mr. Goodall's "Flight into Egypt," Mr. Herkomer's "Pressing to the West," Mr. Frith's "Beatrice," Mr. Horsley's "Hide and Seek"—pictures of which it may safely be said that, had they been the work of unknown men, they would either not have been hung or would have been skied. This is the critic's grumble. The general public grumble because, for one thing, the Council have made such a strange choice in two of the three pictures—all, it is said, by Scotchmen—which have been purchased out of the Chantrey Fund. The first of these is Mr. Pettie's "Vigil" (359), a knight in armour, with an immense amount of empty canvas about him, kneeling in an exceedingly stiff attitude, and holding the cross of his sword before him. Mr. Pettie has done worse work than this, some of it in the present Exhibition, and also better; but there is nothing in the picture to warrant the purchase, and the fact that Mr. Pettie is himself on the Council which makes the selection does not mitigate the public displeasure. The second work selected is Mr. Seymour Lucas's very effective and dramatic "After Culloden" (882), a valuable addition to the Chantrey Gallery. The smithy, the stalwart smith, the soldiers entering, the glowing horseshoe on the anvil, are well drawn and painted, and the whole picture deserves the recognition it has received. But the third purchase, "My Love has Gone a Sailing" (928), by Mr. David Murray, is calculated to puzzle the visitor. We confess to having endeavoured impartially to study this work, and another of the same painter, in search of latent beauty, and to having failed. There is no use in mincing the matter. The painting is not worthy of a place beside Mr. Colin Hunter's "Their only Harvest," Mr. Poynter's "Venus and Esculapius," and Mr. Orchardson's "Napoleon on Board the Bellerophon," in the room appropriated to these purchases at South Kensington. If the visitors this year grumble on this account, artists also, and especially those foreign artists who have honoured us by contributing, have the strongest reasons for displeasure. Never before has so much poor work been hung on the line, and so much good work skied. For example, M. Fantin's noble portrait (357), which was one of the boasts of the last Salon, is hung so high as to be only visible with an opera-glass. M. Tito Conti's "Lady of the Court of Louis XIII." (280) is just under the ceiling, and quite invisible to ordinary eyes. M. Willem Geet's careful and minutely finished "Martyr in the Sixteenth Century" (826) is high up over M. Schmalz's "Too Late!" so that it is not only skied but killed. The worst example, however, and one which the authorities ought even yet to remedy, occurs in the Sixth Room. The well-known Belgian painter, M. Emile Wauters, has sent the magnificent picture "Cairo from the Bridge" (606), which has won him such applause on the Continent wherever it has been exhibited, to say nothing of two gold medals, if we mistake not, in his native land. This splendid work, crowded with minute figures, and painted in the most delicately graduated tones, is placed as high up on the wall as the cornice will allow, and has in consequence been only noticed by people who knew it before. Even an opera-glass will not help a visitor to see this remarkable picture, and nothing but a change in its position will meet the exigencies of the case. By way of adding insult to injury, the artist's name is given as "Emily Wauters," and that, too, in the revised edition of the Catalogue. Below M. Wauters's masterpiece is a picture of nearly the same size, which would be improved by a more elevated and unobtrusive position; for certainly there is nothing in Mr. Smythe's "Field of the Cloth of Gold" (614), a very crude and spotty landscape, to justify its place on the line. Of other good works also skied we may notice Mr. Claude Calthrop's "Little Venetian" (49), which is invisible to the average naked eye; Mr. Robert Fowler's "Artists" (24), which seems to be a pleasing and highly finished work, representing two classical figures, and Miss Mabel Green's "Exmoor" (50), which may also be an excellent picture; but in room after room all the smaller and more highly finished landscapes have been systematically arranged along the very top of the wall. This is especially true of Mr. George Lucas's "Harvest Time" (263), which, however, is sufficiently powerful to be partly visible at its great altitude. "A Curious Fish" (363), by Mr. Tom Lloyd, is harmoniously coloured and highly finished, but can hardly be made out from below. Mr. Alfred Parsons has sent "After Work" (404), a beautiful landscape with figures, full of good and careful painting, but hung much too high, and killed by Mr. P. R. Morris's gaudy "Sweethearts and Wives" (403). Mr. Henry Schäfer's "Il dolce far niente" (419) is almost out of sight. Miss Bertha Newcombe's "Last Load" (634) seems to be a fine and carefully studied river scene, but is hung beyond the reach of ordinary vision. Mr. Henry Gore's "Calm before a Storm" (668) appears to have great merits, but is completely skied, as is Mr. Arthur Bell's "Honfleur" (663). One of the worst examples of this kind of treatment is afforded by Miss Annie L. Robinson's clever and scholarly work, quaintly entitled "Danae" (864). It represents a young and beautiful country girl, wearing a sun-bonnet, and standing close in front of a bank on which the furze is in full blow. The sunny effect, the light and shade, the depth and luminous quality of the shadows, and the charming expression of the face, raise this picture to a high level of merit; but the Hanging Committee, not content with putting it near the ceiling, have, as in the case of M. Wauters, added to their fault by entering it in one edition of the Catalogue as "Don't"—a reading which has proved an insoluble puzzle to the critics—and in another edition as "Danx"—a reading which has at least the merit of being unmeaning. Close to "Danae" is a very comic piece of work which may as well be noticed here. It is also skied, but is probably none the worse. It is called "Primrose Day" (856), by Miss Emily Merrick, and is very funny indeed. A crossing-sweeper, aged about ten, has his ragged button-hole decorated with a bunch of primroses by a flower girl, aged about eight. His strut of complacent self-satisfaction is very well given, but otherwise the painting does not do justice to the subject.

There are of course a few pictures in this year's Academy which are worthy of more than passing mention. In an exhibition which abounds in portraits Mr. Ouless's "Henry Whiting, Esq." (490), is perhaps the best; but Mr. Millais's smooth and well-finished likeness of Mr. Henry Irving (372), painted as a present to the Garrick Club, runs it close. There is much disappointment expressed with Mr. Sargent's "Mrs. White" (788). This young American artist has earned a great reputation in Paris; but, had we only this picture and the very similar portrait of Mrs. Lagh (203) in the Grosvenor Gallery, we should form a very mistaken estimate of his great powers. A little head, "Culaudine" (609), by Mr. Catterson Smith, will be admired for its colour and look of life, merits shared by another very small portrait by Mr. Philip Steer,

"Fantaisie" (472). Mr. Weedon Grossmith's likeness of Miss Fortescue (483) is very pretty, but too pale. The portraits this year are more numerous than ever; but some of them, like M. Aublet's "L'Enfant Rose" (316), a glowing canvas; Mr. P. R. Morris's "Quite Ready," a child in white satin; Mr. John Collier's "Daughters of Colonel Makins" (136), four young ladies playing with a hamper of wild flowers; and Mr. F. Morgan's "Besieged," a girl surrounded by dogs, are more or less subject-pictures first and portraits in a secondary degree. "H.R.H. the Prince of Wales," by Mr. Holl, is painted for the Middle Temple, and is a very dignified and stately picture. Mr. Perugini's "Idle Moments" (15) may not be intended for a portrait; but it is a single figure of a young girl of uncommon loveliness, with a peacock's feather in her hands. The background is a marble white, the dress is grey, and the face and hair are pale; yet this does not give at all the impression of being a colourless picture. Mr. Long's "Judith" (28) is fine, full of expression, and—disagreeable. Mr. Marks sends several studies of single figures, of which we like his "Entomologist" (526) the best; but a monk trying to clear the pipe of a latch-key (45) is irresistibly comic. "Did You ever Kill Anybody, Father?" (67) looks like a portrait except for the sad and anxious expression of the child which holds its father's sword. Another single figure is Mr. Boughton's splendid study of "A Field Handmaiden in Brabant" (80), one of the few pictures by an Academician which deserves its place on the line. Mr. Fildes has painted a single figure of a "Venetian Flower-Girl" (747), which is very sweet and delicate in the face and hands, but unnecessarily gaudy in the dress and accessories. Both in this and his great picture "Venetian Life" (390), where the same girl appears with others more beautiful by far, it is to be feared, than any Mr. Fildes can find in Venice, or indeed in Italy, he has made the mistake of thinking that bright colours make bright colouring. The "Venetian Life" is inharmonious to the last degree. There has been a good deal of absurd talk about it. A scarlet fan, which serves by its intense and staring crudity of colour to subdue some of the intensity and crudeness of the competing colours, is said to "bring the picture together." The obvious reply to such a remark is, of course, that no pictures should require such a violent remedy for its discordant tints. Lovely as are the faces, we cannot like this picture. Mr. Van Haanen's "Afternoon Coffee" (721), although almost as full of different colours, is thoroughly harmonized. It represents a number of dressmakers, who have left off work for a few moments while an old woman dolos the coffee out to them. Similarly brilliant and good is Mr. de Blaas's "After Church" (423), a picture of the same modern Venetian school, representing a handsome, but thoroughly Italian and rather coarse-looking, nurse leading a pretty child down the steps, various other groups being in the background. Another after church picture is Mr. Calthrop's "After Mass at San Giorgio, Scuola degli Schiavoni, Venice" (551), which is painted with his accustomed force and skill, and is badly treated, like so many other good works, by the Hanging Committee.

Mr. Briton Riviere is a little disappointing this year, though he sends as many as four pictures. "The Eve of St. Bartholomew" (52), a lady kneeling and clasping the neck of a bloodhound, is too evidently only the portrait of a dog. "The King and his Satellites" (88), a lion followed by jackals, is not interesting. The lion is very large and very clumsy; the attendants are, however, very full of individuality and character. "Actæon" (315), torn by his own dogs, although placed in a noble landscape, is a disagreeable subject. The best, the most cleanly painted and the most interesting of the four pictures by this really great artist represents the hero of a fairy tale entering "The Enchanted Castle" (437). A knight in full armour advances boldly though a pair of tigers stand waiting for him in the entry. As his mailed feet clank over the pavement, selections of the most hideous animals from the new Reptile-house hurry away into the dark corners. Mr. Goodall sends two good and pleasant works to balance his very large and empty "Flight into Egypt" (619), a picture to be condemned wholesale, so to speak. It is, in fact, beyond or below criticism. But "A New Light in the Harem" (235), a negro girl playing with a healthy-looking baby, while the happy and handsome mother looks on, is full of the air, light, and colour of the East. The lattice-work, and the brilliancy of the view seen through it, are among the best things in the present Academy. "The Sword of the Faithful" (568) shows an ordinary street scene in Cairo. A bazaar boarded overhead, an Arab on a camel—the camel is too pink—choosing a weapon, various groups in picturesque robes, a descendant of the Prophet in a green turban, a man cutting some remarkably yellow tobacco, with the mosque of Mohammed Nasr in the background—these are the elements which go to make up a very striking and brilliant, though far from faultless, picture. Mr. Yeames contrives to handle a good subject very badly. His "Toast of the Kitcat Club" (332) shows the little Lady Mary entering the room where Addison, Marlborough, and other great men of that day are assembled. The "Queen Anne" possibilities of such a picture are taken no advantage of; and it is rather the name of the artist than his work that will attract the eye. Mr. Mouat Loudan won the Academy prize in the winter with his "St. Peter denying Christ" (457), and the picture certainly seemed among the competitors to be well worthy of the distinction accorded to it. Here, however, it is disadvantageously hung, and has very uncongenial surroundings. Mr. J. D. Linton continues, or completes, his set of war pictures. This is the "Declaration" (498). The turbaned Turks are defied by an angry prince, who is supported by courtiers, a man in armour, a priest, and some clerks or secretaries who are studying a plan of the campaign. There is a smooth and even finish, with which it would be distinctly wrong to find fault, but whether for this cause or some other the picture is uninteresting. The "French in Cairo" (516), by Mr. Walter Horsley, shows some soldiers affixing the name of Napoleon to an ancient Memlook building, while the natives look on complacently. The figures are capital, but it is not very easy to identify the view. A tower of the mosque of the mad Hakeem is in the background. Mr. Waterhouse has never done better work than in "Consulting the Oracle" (559). A group of frightened women sit at one end of a room while a "medium" places her ear to the mummied lips of a decapitated Egyptian. The accessories are carefully subordinated, and, if we have a fault to find, it is only that the picture gives us no clue as to where the scene is laid. The head has an Egyptian appearance, which is not kept up in the other "properties." Another romantic subject is attempted by Mr. Macquoid, "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (345). A half-nude fairy and a mediæval knight could hardly, it might be thought, be so treated as to look perfectly commonplace; but Mr. Macquoid has accomplished the task to perfection. Mr. Frith's "Cruel Necessity" (353), a poor imitation of Delaroche, should not have been hung, or, if the Hanging Committee could not refuse it, they might have advantageously skied it, and placed on the line the marvellous portrait by M. Fantin (356), already mentioned, which hangs just above. Another Academician's picture, "Site of an early Christian Altar" (410), by Mr. Pettie, hangs on the line in the Fourth Room; and Mr. Alfred Parsons's "After Work" (404) is almost skied in favour of a caricature which the Hanging Committee might surely have refused as calculated to bring religion into contempt. In the Fifth Gallery Mr. Armitage's absurd "Faith" (463) should have been declined on similar grounds. It is a relief to come to Miss Montalba's fine portraits (489 and 496) in the same room. In Gallery VI. Mr. Laslett Pott's view in Ashburnham House, entitled "Disinherited" (693), shows an angry father with a weeping daughter under the fine columns at the head of the staircase, and the outcast descending among the startled servants. This is a good work, well thought out, and, if a little pale in colour, is bright and airy. An enormous amount of space is wasted in Gallery VII. to hang Mr. Prinsep's "Saturday Dole" (810), a number of life-sized figures, painted so heavily and composed so carelessly that it is difficult to remember that the same artist painted the little girl reading at the Grosvenor. Mr. Albert Goodwin's "Enchanted Palace" (900) is fine, but too extravagant. In the last gallery there are a few very good pictures. Among them we must notice, besides landscapes, which are unavoidably omitted for the present, Mr. Bridgman's café scene at Cairo (1566); a little "property" piece (1599), of high finish, by Mr. Handel Lucas; the "Drawing-room at Aston Hall" (1601), a fine chamber, with good light and shade effects; Miss Edith Hipkins's "Hickory, Dickory, Dock," a prettily-dressed woman holding a child up to look at a tall clock; and, lastly, "My Nannie's Awa'" (1643), by Mr. Watson Nicol, a fiddler playing with all his might.

Of the Water-Colour Room there is really nothing to be said. There is not a single figure-picture which calls for notice, but we may return to the landscapes at a future period, if we can find any worthy of mention. Meanwhile it is announced that additional space is to be provided for water-colours at the Royal Academy, and we can only hope, if the rumour is true, that some attempt will be made to secure representative works. Mr. Orane, Miss Greenaway, Mr. Tristram Ellis, and Mr. Clifford, all of whom occasionally exhibit here, are absent this year.

We have endeavoured to pick works out for praise, except where, as in the case of too many pictures by Academicians, the line is occupied by the worst examples, and on the whole, after a careful survey, the verdict we gave at first must stand; if this is not the poorest exhibition held within these walls, at least we do not remember a poorer. It would be difficult, setting aside the landscapes, to name half a dozen works of importance, and the enumeration would include probably three pictures by one artist.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

SOME time ago we called attention to the formation of a Society in Liverpool for the prevention of cruelty to children. The novelty of the venture, the great difficulties in the way of working such a Society, which, if the laws were sufficient, ought not to exist at all, and the extreme courage of people who proposed to interfere with the domestic arrangements of Englishmen, made the proceedings of the Society of great interest. To say the truth, we thought that excellent people, overcome by pity and indignation, were going to throw themselves against the stone walls erected by the law and by social customs as strong as law, only to fall back discouraged and disheartened. The first annual meeting of the Society has now been held and a report has been presented, which, allowing something perhaps for a little zeal in the cause, shows what seem to us surprising results. One difficulty which occurred to us was the definition of "cruelty"—"savitia" in the Divorce Courts has always been hard to interpret, and it is somewhat curious to note the acts which have been held not to be savitia. This difficulty, however, has been easily overcome by the Society, who have provided no less than eight definitions of the word "cruelty" in the rules by which their proceedings are guided.

We have not space for all of them; but when we say that "cruelty" includes "all treatment or conduct by which morals are imperilled or depraved," it will be seen that the interpretation is sufficiently comprehensive. The interpretation clause of the rules is, indeed, such a model of comprehension, in the proper sense of the word, that it can hardly fail to arouse the envy of any Parliamentary draughtsman who may read it. For, not only have we the eight definitions of cruelty, but there are seven definitions of "prevention"; and the term "children" is to be taken "to mean boys and girls of tender age, but may, in case of need, be extended to include all young persons who are unable to protect themselves." To judge by these rules, the Society intended to start with a very ambitious programme; and it might occur to the ordinary mind that, what with the police, the Sanitary Inspectors, the School Board Visitors, and this Society, the boast that an Englishman's house is his castle would be a vain one in Liverpool at least. But the Society appears to have gone to work in the main judiciously, and not to have resorted to the punishment of parents except in extreme cases of actual violence; but the odd part of the thing is that the parents described as among the most degraded of mankind have not resented their punishments or even the interference of the Society; and, whereas the School Board Visitors are frequently received with rough language and threats, and occasionally something more, it would appear that the officers of this Society have not been subjected to this kind of treatment, but have gone amongst the roughest specimens of men and women without any disagreeable consequences. This says something for the cruel parents; and it may be that in their hearts they are ashamed of the treatment they give their children, and that in most cases the cruelty is brought about by hasty temper, drink, and thoughtlessness, but not by malice. But there is also another explanation. The Society receives support from the Town Council, the School Board, the police, and the magistrates. The Town Council has passed a by-law "That no child whatever under nine years of age shall sell anything in the streets, and that no child under thirteen years shall sell or offer any article for sale after nine o'clock in summer and seven o'clock in winter" (we are quoting from the Mayor's speech at the annual meeting), under, we presume, a penalty; so that the Society has simply to report these cases to the police, and they are dealt with by the magistrates. There is, therefore, a combination of tremendous power against offenders. The greatest difficulty the Society had to contend with, as it appeared to us, was the removal of the children from the custody of parents who had been punished; for it would seem probable at least that, if the child remained under the parent's roof, the parent would sooner or later take revenge for his punishment on the child. But this difficulty is met in one or other of the following ways. The parent is either induced to consent that the child be sent to a "home"; and among the poor, with a multiplicity of children and a lack of money, this consent is not difficult to obtain; or the removal is brought about by a prosecution before the magistrates by the School Board, and the child is sent to an industrial school or reformatory for five or more years, an order being made on the parent for a contribution of so much a week to its support. In theory, this plan is admirable; the child is removed from immoral, filthy, or cruel surroundings, is well clothed and well taught, subjected to discipline not too severe, and is under the influence of teachers and others who, at the worst, are infinitely superior to the society it would frequent if at large, and who are frequently excellent people, setting the best examples; and it does not return to its parents until it can to some extent fend for itself and resist evil influence and example. But there is another side to this picture which should not be lost sight of. Every child committed to an industrial school costs 20*l.* a year, or 100*l.* for the five years. In the great majority of cases nothing can be got from the parents. Imprisonment is the only alternative to not paying, and many will rather go to prison than pay. Others cannot pay, and magistrates have a natural reluctance to imprisoning a man when nothing can be got out of him; for this, amongst other reasons, that the remainder of his family come on the rates while the bread-earner is locked up. But all that is not paid by the parent is paid by the public in one form or another, so that if any great number of children were thus disposed of, an immense burden would be thrown upon the people. Again, this course of dealing with the child may operate rather as inducement to cruelty (as defined by the Society) than otherwise, for the child is taken care of, free of expense, during the years when it can earn little or nothing, and is sent back to the parents when its earnings are valuable. And it is found in practice that the parents are quite alive to this, and will not consent to part with the children when they come back from the industrial school, in order that they may emigrate or be otherwise provided for on account of the value of the earnings they may bring in. It would, therefore, appear that committals to industrial schools cannot be multiplied indefinitely; but if societies like the Liverpool Society, dotted all over the country, they must be increased enormously, and it is a question whether the public would or ought to bear to be heavily taxed because parents refuse to do their duty.

We have a strong opinion that the usefulness of this Society depends upon the power of removing the children altogether from the society of their parents, but that at present the law does not allow, and it is too great an enterprise for any private society to undertake. It is difficult to see why parents who have neglected all their duties to their children should have the right to their custody, and it would be no invasion of liberty that could be seriously objected to if Parliament were to provide for emigration in lieu of, or as an adjunct to, committal to industrial schools. In connexion with legislation on this subject, it may be mentioned that in the matter of the duties of parents to their children the code of the State of New York, an extract from which is published with the report of the Liverpool Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, has much more stringent provisions than any which have been even suggested in England.

The extract is too long for quotation, but, we may state shortly some of its provisions. For example, any person having the custody of a minor who permits its health to be injured or its morals to become depraved, is guilty of a misdemeanour. Any boy under sixteen or any girl under fourteen found begging or not having a home or proper guardianship, or frequenting the company of reputed thieves, or people of immoral character, or living in a disorderly house, or frequenting "concert-saloons," and like places without being in charge of its parent or guardian, may be brought before a magistrate and committed to a charitable institution or reformatory, or treated as a vagrant, truant, or disorderly person. Employing children as rope-dancers, or acrobats, or in begging is a misdemeanour. We have heard it whispered, but we hardly know whether the statement can be made with any authority, that these enactments are not put strictly into force, and that their stringency is confined in a great measure to their wording. The New York democracy apparently see no objection to an amount of State interference between parent and child which we in England have not thought of. But, if laws are made in New York, like the celebrated wooden nutmegs, to look well, but not for use, the democracy may well be indifferent to their provisions.

This Society in rather less than twelve months has "dealt with" (to use the words of the report) 218 complaints of cruelty. It should here be mentioned that the Society has established a well-managed Shelter, admission to which is not confined to the victims of cruelty. One or two extracts from the "specimen cases" attached to the report will better show the method the Society has of dealing with cases of alleged cruelty than any description; for example, Case 49:—"A boy of nine had a strange liking for sleeping out at nights, and this led to his stopping away from school; became what is called a 'mud-lark' down at the edge of the river, picked up coppers also by standing on his head or reciting in public-houses; was received into Shelter, and remained for some weeks, when his behaviour seemed to warrant his being returned to his parents. The parents also had their duty pointed out to them, especially on the point of sobriety, and the case is being followed up by the Ladies' Temperance Association. Boy calls at Shelter from time to time to report himself, and appears to be doing well." It is doubtless much better for the boy to be in the Shelter than sleeping in the open air, standing on his head, or reciting in public-houses, and we hope the parents will benefit by the admonitions of the Ladies' Temperance Association, but we entirely fail to see the cruelty in this case. Let us take another case; No. 91.—"A girl, superior of her class, aged thirteen, was cruelly assaulted by her stepfather for speaking in defence of her mother, whom the man was beating. She was sent to the Shelter by an officer of the School Board, arrived in rags and filth, and with a black eye. The stepfather was summoned twice, and then brought before the Stipendiary on warrant; the girl meanwhile was sheltered, and by this means truthful evidence secured, which, with the testimony of the superintendent, resulted in the man's getting twenty-one days' imprisonment with hard labour. The girl was placed in the Catholic Home, Shaw Street, for emigration to Canada." We do not doubt that the stepfather richly deserved his punishment, and in this case, as the girl will emigrate, the action of the Society can hardly be anything but beneficial. Case 122:—"Girl of eight sent in on a soaking wet night; her only clothing was an old frock and jacket, which, being full of vermin, had to be burnt. She seemed to be very thankful for her bath and clean clothing, and astonished at the transformation. Her mother was dead; her father—a low, villainous man—was living with an equally depraved woman. The child in this instance, as in many others, appeared to become very dear as she was slipping from the father's grasp, but the real trial was the stoppage of his gains by her begging. He came in a very abusive manner to the Shelter in a condition very unfit for the custody of a child. He was told that the child would be produced in Court next morning, and he was invited to appear and claim it. He did not, however, put in an appearance, and the girl was committed by the Stipendiary to St. Anne's School for eight years." It is difficult to believe that such a parent as the man described would contribute anything to the charge of the girl while at school; the public, therefore, would have to pay 160*l.* for her, and at the age of sixteen, if her father chose to claim her, she must go back to him.

Many other cases showing the working of the Society are given, and many heartrending details which it would be interesting to quote if we had space; and, as we have said before, there is evidence that the Society has on the whole proceeded judiciously. If, however, there are many cases like that of the boy who stood on his head, in which there is nothing to show that the parents were to blame, the Society can hardly be acquitted of fussiness. The most difficult cases to deal with are evidently those of "neglect," which are hard to prove, and which often arise from poverty only. The aims of this Society are excellent, the Shelter seems an admirable institution, and we regard the co-operation of ladies, particularly in the visiting, as of the utmost importance. If the rules and the report are written in a somewhat pedantic tone, the earnestness of the writer and of those who do the work of the Society is evident. It is impossible not to have sympathy with any movement which may make happier and brighter the lives of street children; and, backed as it is by the authorities which are most dreaded by the unthrifty poor, the Society may do much in that direction; but whether the movement is one which should be extended all over the kingdom must depend upon results ascertained after a much longer time than that during which the Society has been in existence.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE programme of the second Richter concert was remarkably good and varied. The inevitable Wagner was represented by but a single piece, the well-worn "Vorspiel" to the third act of the Meistersinger, which was re-demanded, and which Herr Richter was ill advised enough to play twice over. All the rest was music which, while too old to be merely fashionable, is young and good enough to be universally acceptable. The first number was Mendelssohn's brilliant and beautiful Italian Symphony—a work not played so often as others by the same composer of less technical interest and not nearly so much imagination and charm. It gives us Mendelssohn at his brightest and best, both as an artist and a poet. The first movement, Allegro vivace, is perhaps a little long; the last, Saltarello, Presto, is possibly a trifle too obvious in sentiment. But the admirable Andante con moto, the Mozartian third movement (Con moto moderato), so rich and varied in material, so exquisite in accomplishment, are works to be, not criticized, but merely enjoyed. Herr Richter, who was in splendid form, did Mendelssohn full justice, and was immensely applauded. As finely given and as heartily welcomed was the incomparable overture to the Zauberflote, with which the first part of his programme was concluded. The Symphony was Beethoven's Fifth, the C Minor, the "Hamlet Symphony," as it has been called, the symphony in which, as the master himself has said, "So pocht das Schicksal an die Pforte." This mighty work received a really magnificent interpretation. Never, that we remember, has Herr Richter presented it so brilliantly and well.

In striking contrast with this programme and with the performance in which it was realized were the performance and the programme of Monday last. It is certain that Herr Richter is a great conductor; it is also certain that in composing a concert his genius sometimes deserts him, and he contrives to stand revealed as a man with an idiosyncrasy. These two programmes are a proof of it. To contrast and remember them is to understand what is Herr Richter's strength and also what is Herr Richter's weakness. In the first we have Mendelssohn, Wagner, Mozart, and Beethoven—a certain amount of the music of the present, that is to say, and a good deal of the music which is for all time. In the second we have some Wagner, Brahms, Schumann, Mackenzie, and M. Jules de Swert—a selection, that is to say, of music merely novel and romantic, pure of the classic taint, untouched of the eternal and unfashionable. The effect was disconcerting; the concert was extremely dull. It was all masterly, strenuous, poetical in no mean degree. But one longed for Haydn; the thought of Beethoven set one criticizing and comparing; for a strain of Bach, an inspiration of Gluck—the gavotte from Armide, for instance, or the march from Alceste—one would have given a great deal.

Wagner was audible in the popular "Vorspiel" to the Meistersinger; Mackenzie, in his "Ballad for Orchestra," La Belle Dame sans Merci, which was certainly the success of the evening. It was exceedingly well played, and it won the composer the honour of a double recall. It was preceded by a concerto for the violoncello by M. Jules de Swert, which was played by the composer in person. M. de Swert is an admirable executant. His tone is exceptionally good; his technique is masterly; he is a musician, and his emotional capacity is considerable. His concerto, however, is not more than workmanlike—is sound, but not particularly interesting. Concertos for the 'cello are not plentiful; but there are enough of them to make his choice of one of his own composing seem not altogether felicitous. Another novelty (M. de Swert has not hitherto been heard at these concerts, nor has the Belle Dame sans Merci) was Herr Brahms's Gesang der Parzen, a choral and orchestral setting of the incomparable lyric—which Herr Brahms has arranged, in the Wagnerian manner, for a six-part chorus—dramatically, that is to say, and with an orchestral accompaniment replete with dramatic intention; so that his work may be described as a choric declamation supported and strengthened by a running commentary on the orchestra. It is hardly to be ranked with his highest achievements. The choral parts are excessively difficult; the melody is too careless of form and too ambitious of dramatic significance to be instantly impressive; the orchestral argument, at once gloomy and vague, at once indefinite and intense, bewilders at first, and fatigues in the end. The words of Goethe's song—

Es fürchte die Götter das Menschengeschlecht—

Sie aber, sie bleiben
Im ewigen Feste.
An goldenen Tischen.
Sie schreiten vom Berge
Zu Bergen hinüber—

are found to go better and to be more impressive alone. The symphony was Schumann's Third in E Flat—"known in Germany," says Mr. Barry, "as 'die Rheinische' ('The Rhenish') from the fact that it was inspired by the impressions which Schumann received on beholding Cologne Cathedral for the first time." It is long (it has five movements), eloquent, scholarly, admirable—everything but moving. It was an appropriate ending to a rather tedious and uninteresting concert.

On a selection of this sort—serious, novel, but, on the whole, unsatisfying—the concert of last Monday was an immense improvement. There was some Wagner, of course—the Siegfried Idyll, to wit, and the well-known "Probe-Lieder" from the Meistersinger, very gracefully and vigorously sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd. But the first part opened with the magnificent piece of programme-music which Beethoven made as an introduction to Goethe's Egmont, closed with Weber's immortal overture to Oberon, a masterpiece of musical romance, and included besides a very pleasing rendering of "Love in Her Eyes Sits Playing," the lovely air from Acis and Galatea, so fresh in sentiment, so perfect in form, so chaste and simple in design, so delightful in effect; while the second part consisted merely of Herr Brahms's new Symphony, the third, in F Major, which in its way was most interesting of all. This noble work was written in the summer of '83, and produced, under Herr Richter's direction, at Vienna so late as the first week of last December. Fully to understand its significance and apprehend its structural import and design is on a single hearing impossible. The ideas are too lofty; the scheme of development is too elaborate, and the orchestral matter too inventive and surprising. For the present we must content ourselves with noting that the opening movement, while a model of construction and conciseness, seems rather strenuous than strong, rather grandiose than heroic; that the second, an Andante con moto—exquisite in idea, original in treatment, finely imaginative in expression—is delightful from the first bar to the last; and that the third and fourth, Poco allegretto and Allegro, alike in sentiment and style, in their melodic inspiration and the instrumental effects of which they are compacted, are only to be ranked with the highest masterpieces of modern music. It is greatly to be hoped that Herr Richter will see his way to a speedy repetition of this admirable work, and, for that matter, of the composer's other symphonies as well. If nothing but latter-day music will serve our turn, it is as well at any rate that we should have the best of it.

THE NAVY.

IT seems now to be virtually admitted that the construction of our ironclads in the dockyards is much too slow; that in consequence the vessels cost more than they ought to cost; that the method of estimating the tonnage built is erroneous and may produce very misleading results; and it is admitted by implication that the French ironclad fleet built, or building, is as strong, or wellnigh as strong, as ours. This is not a pretty picture, but, at all events, it is well to know the truth. The country would not give heed to the alarmists and panic-mongers who strove so hard to draw attention to disagreeable facts, fixos oculos aversa tenebat; but now that a representative of the Admiralty lets it be seen that things are not as they should be, and scarcely attempts to deny that our amiable allies are succeeding in that rivalry which is of course purely friendly, and due to love of peace and good-will, it is not easy for the veriest Philistine to remain willingly and contemptuously ignorant, and to believe that, because we had complete naval supremacy two generations ago, we must perforce enjoy it now. The two debates on naval matters which have taken place since Parliament has met have done much to enlighten men as to the real state of our naval defences, more perhaps than any previous debate, owing to the fact that officials have been so much more candid; and it is difficult to believe that the public will refuse to believe what, against their interests, its own servants tell it. Indeed, there are signs already that foolish and ill-based confidence is giving way, and that the altered condition of armaments is being slowly recognised.

Very much altered, indeed, are they since 1830, when, as Admiral Edmond Paris has pointed out, the English navy was more than equal to the navies of all the other European Powers combined, or, for that matter, since 1850, when we had a great fleet of sailing-ships; and unfortunately it seems evident that there has been of late no real effort to arrest the steady decline of comparative strength, and that, while rivals have been active, there has been much tardiness and procrastination at the dockyards, and that the work promised has not been done. These bitter facts official avowals make abundantly clear. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, who indulged in the usual optimist statement last year when introducing the Estimates, admitted with engaging frankness in the second debate on them that of iron and steel vessels we were building 100,000 tons and the French 150,000. This year he seems to have entered completely dans la voie des aveux. In the debate of March 21st he was at pains to explain fully that what is called a ton in the Navy Estimates is not necessarily a ton of weight, but a unit determined by the proportion between the estimated weight of the ship and the estimated cost of labour. He quoted a passage from Sir Robert Hamilton showing that, when a ship is designed, the number of tons weight and the amount of labour required are calculated. The money value of the labour divided by number of tons gives the cost per ton in labour, and the progress of a vessel is measured by the amount expended. When wages equivalent to so many tons have been paid, she is said to have progressed by so many tons. Frequently, however, the original estimate as to labour is wrong, and then a statement of this kind is misleading. Having kindly given this explanation in the first debate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman proceeded in the second to show that with a vicious system there had been error. The First Lord, he said, was so struck by "the doubtful quality of this unit" that he thought of making some corrections in the expense accounts of the year, but he found that to do this correctly he would have to state the errors of several years until he got to the time of the late Administration. Unwilling apparently, with a kindness which is the more touching because it is distinctly rare with the present Government, to wound the feelings of his predecessor, and unwilling, very naturally, to show that mistakes had been made under the present Board without showing that mistakes had also been made under the previous one, he came to the not unprecedented conclusion that it would be best to leave things alone. An erroneous system of computation therefore remains; but it is well to know that it is erroneous, and to be assured on the best official authority that the Estimates have been, are, and will be inaccurate.

Another fault, of a far graver nature than this, as it tends to keep our navy weak and to increase cost, was seemingly admitted by the very straightforward Secretary of the Admiralty. The long time which our ironclads take in construction and the frequent changes made during construction have often been spoken of and contrasted with the briskness shown in private yards. In last week's debate this just complaint was reiterated with great weight by Mr. W. H. Smith, who pointed out that, of three ironclads laid down five years ago, one was not yet complete in the sense of being fit to go into action, and another as yet unfinished, while the third was still far from completion. There is no reason for supposing that these are exceptional cases, and it is obvious that, when so much time is taken in constructing ships, the cost must be very great. Mr. W. H. Smith showed that it might actually amount with the ships now in the dockyards to 50*l.* a ton for wages alone, an amount which would certainly ruin any private constructor who built ironclads. It so happens, however, that private constructors do build ironclads, and build them without figuring in the Gazette; and a very good example of what can be done has been given of late, as an ironclad constructed for a foreign Government by a private firm has recently been completed. This vessel is the Riachuelo, of 6,000 tons displacement and 6,000 horse-power, built by Mr. J. A. Samuda for the Brazilian Government, which made her trial trip some little time ago. In that trip she attained the speed, said to be unprecedented for an ironclad, of from 16¼ to 16¾ knots an hour, and she has, it is also said, a larger coal endurance than any other ironclad afloat. She is built entirely of steel, has steel-faced armour from 11 to 7 inches thick, and carries four 20-ton guns, six 70-pounders and fifteen machine and torpedo guns; and, so far as can be judged, seems an admirable war-ship of the latest type. Apart from the putting her guns on board, it took two years and five months to build her. This shows what can be achieved when work is carried on steadily, and when there is no change of design during construction; and it is very difficult to suppose the Riachuelo worse, or in any way whatever an obsolete vessel, for having been built without change in design. She may or may not be so well put together as the ships built in the dockyards. On that point only a high expert can speak; but assuredly there must be great superiority in construction if it is to compensate for five years or more employed in constructing a vessel as against two and a half.

Of course the Admiralty could hardly be expected to admit that a private firm had in some respects done better than they had in constructing a war-ship; and, very naturally, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, when speaking from the Treasury bench, said nothing with regard to that vessel. With consistent candour, however, he stated that he entirely agreed with Mr. W. H. Smith, and said truly enough that, if constructors went on changing and altering the original design, they ultimately produced a vessel of which the main design might be obsolete, and which was not so effective an instrument of war as if it had been taken and finished in time. This seems a complete and unsparing condemnation of the system which has been pursued for years past, but of course Mr. Campbell-Bannerman went on to explain that some improvements might well be made in course of construction, and said that necessary alterations accounted for all, or nearly all, the delays complained of. The excuse, however, seems very faint and conventional, when compared with the vigorous condemnation of variations from the original design. What was contended was that there should not be such constant tampering with a ship as had led to twice the proper period being required for construction. That this is wrong appears now to be practically admitted by the representatives of the Admiralty; and it is therefore necessarily conceded that there has been of late years a certain waste of time and of money, and necessarily also that the navy is not so strong as it might have been had a different course been followed. Who is to blame it is perhaps impossible to say. Mr. W. H. Smith suggested hanging a constructor as an appropriate means of putting a stop to the altering of designs; but, though this novel and striking proposal has the merit of simplicity and originality, we doubt whether the proceeding suggested would prove so effective as appears likely at first sight. For very possibly the constructors are not really responsible in any way for the many alterations, and probably they have been glad to the fussiness of various Boards and officials who have hampered and worried designers, and whose struggles to reconcile contradictory conditions and to get more than money's worth for money have ended as such struggles usually do, in more money being spent than was needful.

In any case, however, it may now be hoped that the mistake will be made no more, and that it will no longer be thought necessary to pay six years' wages for the construction of an ironclad which ought to be built in three. The result of the recent debates—which we may observe were of considerable importance—has been a free admission of errors, and it may be hoped that there will be an attempt to avoid them in future. Whether there will be an attempt really to bring our navy up to anything like its proper strength is not very easy to say; but certainly the money now voted, even if used with true economy, will not be sufficient, or nearly sufficient, to do this. With regard to the grave question of our comparative naval strength, which grows more and more serious every year, the same frankness as was shown about dockyard management was hardly to be expected from officials. They could not well contradict statements made not long ago, and say that France was nearly equal to us in strength. In such a matter as this, however, silence is fully equivalent to an admission that the critics are right. When a representative of the Admiralty declines to make comparisons between our armament and that of a friendly Power on the ground that it is improper to do so, we may fairly conclude, without any imputation on his honour, that he is only using a form of words; for no sane man can doubt that, if the Admiralty could set forth a statement which would reassure the country, prove their critics to be wrong, and give lustre to themselves, they would not be deterred by idle etiquette from making facts public. The absence of any attempt whatever to repeat the comparisons of last year shows that it is now thought hopeless to attempt comparison or to deny that the French ironclad navy is rapidly approaching equality with ours. That it would equal or surpass it has for a long time been obvious to all unbiassed inquirers. We do not desire now to enter into any detailed examination of the strength of the two navies. This has been done again and again in our and in other columns, and always with the same result. It is true that the critics have made some mistakes such as are always made in dealing with questions of considerable intricacy; but that in the main they were right no longer admits of a doubt—indeed, it is hardly disputed; and there has been of late proof that their strictures are at last felt to be just, and that but one interpretation can be placed on the silence of the Admiralty.

THE PANIC IN NEW YORK.

THE long-continued fall in American railroad securities has at length brought on a panic in New York. In a single day two banks, seven stockbroking firms, and several individuals suspended payment, as well as three banks in the interior. On Thursday two other firms of stockbrokers failed, and a bank in Illinois. And other failures are expected. The immediate occasion of the panic was a run on the deposits of the Metropolitan National Bank, one of the largest in New York, induced by the reports of the vast and unsuccessful speculations of Mr. G. G. Seney, the President. Mr. Seney was reputed to be immensely wealthy, and he had made princely gifts to New York hospitals and colleges, but he was before everything a speculator. The Syndicate of which he was the head a few years ago constructed the so-called "Nickel Plate Road" to compete with one of Mr. Vanderbilt's lines, and sold it to Mr. Vanderbilt for a fraction of the nominal capital. Since then the Syndicate has speculated disastrously in the South-West. Apparently Mr. Seney involved the bank in his speculations and those of a firm of brokers, consisting of his son-in-law and two sons, with the result that on Wednesday it had to close its doors, though it has since been enabled to resume business. A Brooklyn bank, connected with the Metropolitan, also suspended payment. And there was a run on a third bank, which, however, met the demands upon it. So complete and general was the distrust that at one time as much as one per cent. was charged for loans for the day, being at the rate of over 300 per cent. per annum. And the panic was at length allayed only by the announcement that the Secretary of the Treasury would at once cash two millions sterling of bonds called in for redemption, and, if necessary, would call two millions more; and by the decision of the Clearing-House banks to support one another, and to help all solvent banks in need of assistance. The panic, which was partially renewed by Thursday's failures, is the necessary result of the fall in the prices of securities that has been going on for nearly three years. At the end of last year it was commonly estimated in New York that the depreciation in the value of the securities quoted on the Stock Exchange of that city amounted to about two hundred millions sterling, or nearly twelve per cent. of the total aggregate value. This was the average depreciation, including Government, State, and Municipal stocks, as well as other securities which had not fallen at all. If we confine our attention to the fall in railway securities it was very much greater than stated. Indeed, the fall was mainly in railway securities and in securities somehow connected with railway property. Between the middle of 1881 and the end of last year there was a fall in the preference stock of the Wabash Railway Company of about sixty-six per cent.; two-thirds, that is, of the market value of the stock in the middle of 1881 had disappeared by the end of 1883. In Texas and Pacific shares the fall was fifty-five per cent., or more than one-half; in Louisville and Nashville shares, again, it was fifty-five per cent.; in Central Pacific, thirty-three per cent., or one-third; in Northern Pacific preference shares, forty-nine per cent., or nearly one-half; and there were few cases in which the fall did not reach at least twenty per cent. Since the end of last year there was for awhile a considerable rise in the prices of American railway securities. Over some of the worst Companies receivers had been appointed; and there had been failures of many speculators, the most conspicuous being that of Mr. Villard, who a couple of years before was reputed to be worth three millions sterling. It was supposed that the worst had then been experienced, and that a recovery had set in. But the recovery has proved very short-lived, and another fall soon set in, which has carried prices lower than they have ever been known to be before. On the last day of the old year Central Pacific shares were quoted in New York at 63¾; on Monday—that is, two days before the panic—they had fallen to 41¼. Again, Denver shares on the last day of December were quoted at 24¾: on Monday they had fallen to 10¾; Erie shares have fallen from 26¾ to 14¼; but what is still more remarkable is that the fall quite recently has been very heavy in the very best class of American railway securities. New York Central shares, for example, which in the middle of 1881 were selling in New York at 155, on Tuesday had fallen to 109¾. Illinois shares, again, which on the last day of December last were selling in New York at 132, have since fallen to 124; and Lake Shore shares have fallen from 95 to 92¾. We have often pointed out how a heavy fall of prices such as this leads, both directly and indirectly, to difficulties in the business world. All investors who are obliged to sell find a large part of their capital swept away by the depreciation. Speculators who have bought stocks with borrowed money are called upon to find fresh security, and very often, after exhausting all their means, see the securities they have lodged sold to repay their debts to their bankers. Furthermore, commercial men are rarely able to carry on business without borrowing; and one of the most convenient ways of raising money is by giving stocks as security for their loans. When, however, a stock falls from 96, as in the case of Wabash preference shares, to 14¼, the holder of such stock practically finds himself without the means of borrowing. And, even where the fall is much less than this, the credit of the holder of the stock is greatly impaired. Nor is this the worst. Capitalists are rendered uneasy by the persistent depreciation; they fear that some great catastrophe may be impending; they are unwilling, therefore, to give credit, and the whole of the commercial community is, in consequence, straitened.

The cause of this protracted and ruinous fall in American railway securities is the over-construction that went on between 1879 and 1883. In four years over 35,000 miles of railway were built; and, unfortunately, many of the new lines were not only not needed, but were built for the purpose of levying "black mail" upon older and more prosperous concerns. All the length of the way from New York to Buffalo a line has been built parallel with the New York Central line, and often within sight of it, although the New York Central had been fully capable of doing all the business of the district. It, however, had paid very large dividends, and the constructors of the new line hoped to take away from it a portion of its traffic. In other directions there has been the same building of lines in competition with other lines which previously had been prosperous, and as to the capacity of which there was no complaint. A large proportion of the new lines, moreover, have been built in unsettled parts of the country where traffic can grow up only gradually. The result is that for the present the carrying capacity of the railways of the United States is greater than the amount of work to be done. The condition, in fact, is precisely similar to the condition of the shipping trade here at home. The difficulty would perhaps have been got over without disaster had it not been that there has been a complete change in the grain trade of the world. For a series of years, ending with 1880, there had been a succession of unprecedentedly good harvests in the United States; and, at the same time, there were exceedingly bad harvests in Europe. In consequence there was a great demand for the agricultural produce of the United States, and the railway traffics therefore were enormous. But in 1881 there was a partial failure of all the crops throughout the United States, and since then the harvests have not been good. Simultaneously the harvests in Europe have improved, while India and Australia have begun to compete with the United States in the wheat markets of Western Europe to an extent that a little while ago was quite impossible. The Americans had persuaded themselves that they could fix the price of wheat in Europe as they chose; and speculators therefore bought up not only wheat, but Indian corn, and kept it back from market in the hope that prices in Europe would thus be compelled to rise. Prices, however, have not risen. The principal result has been to hand over the markets of Western Europe to the competitors of America. The American railways have thereby suffered heavily; for, while their carrying capacity has enormously increased, the traffic over them has, both by natural and artificial means, been greatly restricted. Even on the old and well-established lines there has been therefore a considerable falling off in earnings, and it is natural to expect diminished dividends for some time to come. On the newer lines, which have not yet acquired a large traffic, the falling off of earnings is so great that several of them have already been placed in the hands of receivers, and it is feared that many more will be unable to pay the interest upon their debts. For all these reasons a very considerable fall in prices was inevitable; but the fall has been aggravated by artificial causes. The constructors of the new lines hoped that as of old they would be able to borrow largely in the European money markets. European investors, however, had become thoroughly dissatisfied with the system of railway management in the United States, and they refused to lend, with the result that the constructors have been so embarrassed that some of them have become bankrupt, and most of the others have been obliged to sell all the good and readily saleable securities they possessed to fulfil their contracts. At the same time the presidents of the old-established lines, in their desire to ruin their new competitors, have provoked "wars of rates," which have artificially reduced earnings and have alarmed investors generally for the security of their properties. It is generally believed, too, that many of these presidents have for stock-jobbing purposes cooked the accounts of the lines, speculated in their own stocks, and generally manipulated markets for their own purposes, to the disadvantage of investors. As a natural consequence investors have become alarmed, and shares more particularly have fallen quite into disrepute. Speculators have seen their opportunity in all this, and they have sold, therefore, in immense masses securities which they did not possess. The Americans speculate to an extent far beyond European experience. In 1880 and 1881 they ran up prices in an exaggerated way, and since 1881 they have been forcing them down similarly. Taking advantage of over-competition, of the falling off in the demand for American produce in Europe, of the dissatisfaction at home and abroad with American railway management, and of the depression in trade, they have so manipulated the markets that for the time being there is no possibility of resisting them. Lastly, the drain of gold from New York, by depleting the bank reserves, has forced the banks to call in their loans, and thereby precipitated the crisis, since insolvent bankers were compelled to avow their inability to fulfil their contracts.

The first feeling in London was that the panic of Wednesday would bring to an end the slow liquidation that has been dragging on for three years, and in consequence there was a sharp rise of prices on Thursday. We doubt the correctness of this view. When all the banks in the Clearing-House Association felt it necessary to pledge one another support, and to promise help to all others who might require it, it is very evident that the danger to the banking establishments of the country was both real and great. But a community does not speedily recover from a serious shock to credit. The recovery will, however, be hastened if there is no attempt to bolster up rotten institutions. The law enjoins upon the Comptroller of the Currency to institute a rigid examination into the condition of all national banks whose solvency or good management he has reason to doubt. If he performs his duty without fear or favour, the insolvent concerns will be wound up. It is to be presumed, too, that the Clearing-House banks will not endanger their own safety by succouring banks unable to meet all their obligations. If many failures should thus be brought about, the crisis would be prolonged; but the assurance that the worst was known would after a while restore confidence. Whether there are other banks virtually insolvent or not, there can be little doubt that several of the Railway Companies are in difficulties, and after such a shock to credit they will not find it easy to borrow. It is not improbable, therefore, that receivers may be appointed in not a few cases. And there is a danger that the failure of brokers and bankers who had been the New York agents of banks and Railway Companies in other States may plunge these latter into inextricable embarrassments. But while we do not look for a speedy recovery, holders of American railway securities would be very unwise to throw away their property now. The prospects are by no means as bad as they are made to appear. Trade, though somewhat depressed, is yet very large, and seems to be increasing. The reports respecting the coming harvest are most favourable; and the managers of the railways everywhere are exerting themselves to the utmost to cut down expenses. During the years of inflation they had allowed extravagances of all kinds to grow up; but, now that they have become seriously alarmed, they are reducing wages and enforcing retrenchment in every direction. To a large extent, therefore, it will be found that the falling off in earnings will be counterbalanced by savings in expenditure on the old and well-established lines. On the new lines, also, there will be considerable retrenchment, but some of these will have to wait some years before population and wealth grow sufficiently to give them traffic enough to live upon; while others are so circumstanced that very soon they will enter upon an era of prosperity. The probability on the whole seems to be that the depression will last for a while yet, and that there will be no recovery until after the harvest at the soonest; but, if the crops are then good, and the general economic condition improves, recovery may be expected to set in.

CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

THE programme of Mme. Essipoff's recital at St. James's Hall on Friday was more representative of many styles of music than remarkable for important or unfamiliar examples. It included Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (the Appassionata); Schumann's Romance in A and "Grillen"; Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue, and a Fugue by Handel, both in E minor; the Schubert-Liszt valse, "Soirée de Vienne"; besides excerpts from Chopin, Rubinstein, Silas, and Schütt. With the exception of the compositions of the last named, most of these items are tolerably well known; they admirably served, however, to display the pianist's versatility and remarkable endowments—her range of expression, executive power and brilliance, the significance and character of her touch. In the Chopin examples, in an Etude by Schütt, and in other passages, the piquant individuality of her staccato style was very striking. The rendering of Beethoven's sonata was full of interest. The august and solemn adagio was most expressively interpreted; and the final movement was a tour de force in point of execution, though the excessive prestissimo with which it was given, marvellous and brilliant in effect, is scarcely sanctioned by the composer. The two fugues were played with masterly precision and lucidity, and throughout the recital the distinction of the pianist's style, untouched by affectation or mannerism, was manifested in the freshness and felicity of the most varied interpretations.

At the Prince's Hall on Saturday Mme. Viard-Louis held her third meeting of the chronological rendering of Beethoven's pianoforte compositions. Progress in a scheme so comprehensive must necessarily appear deliberate, and the first stages of relatively slight interest, comprising as they do works that are very familiar, and but little characteristic of the composer. It is well, perhaps, that Mme. Viard-Louis's enterprise did not comprehend the orchestral works of Beethoven, particularly if the report that two long-lost cantatas of the composer have recently been unearthed in Vienna should be authenticated, for one such discovery frequently leads to others. The two pianoforte sonatas given on the present occasion (Op. 10 in C minor and F major) are too well known to require comment, and are, in addition, among the least interesting of the series. In the execution of the three sonatas for piano and violin (Op. 12) Mr. Holländer assisted Mme. Viard-Louis in the place of Mr. Carrodus, who had been announced, but was indisposed. These three compositions are of great biographical as well as technical interest, and were adequately interpreted by the executants; the beautiful Allegro con brio in the No. 1, and the exquisite second movement of the No. 2, with its suave and simple Cantabile, the last touch of Haydn's influence, were most admirably rendered. A selection of songs from Op. 82 and 83, including the characteristic "Hoffnung," was entrusted to Fraulein von Hennig.

Miss Margaret Wild made a successful début as a pianist in a recital given at Prince's Hall on Monday. The programme was sufficiently diversified and exacting to form a stern test of capacity, and the performance was full of promise for the young pianist's future. Excellent discrimination and taste, genuine artistic perception, and an admirably expressive style distinguished the execution of works so distinctly dissimilar as Beethoven's Sonata in E Flat (Op. 31) and Schumann's highly ornate and complex "Etudes sinfoniques." Miss Wild possesses one of the most precious gifts of the artistic organization—the power of giving full expression to her subject through a naturally fervid sympathy, without which the most perfect technical accomplishment, though it may surprise the hearer, leaves no lasting impression. The colour and multiform character of Schumann's work, the subtly interwoven rhythms, so capricious and involved, were rendered in a style that showed how thoroughly the performer was en rapport with the music. In Bach's "Fantasia Chromatique and Fugue" Miss Wild was scarcely so successful, and a little deficient at times in force and in crisp precision of touch. In the pieces mentioned, however, in Liszt's "Tarantella," and in her playing of Chopin—the Nocturne in E Major and the Polonaise in C Minor—the pianist acquitted herself with success and distinction. The programme was further varied by Miss Carlotta Elliot's excellent singing of F. H. Cowen's "Fantasia" and "If Love was what the Rose is" and Gounod's "Au Printemps."

At the Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening Miss Cowen gave a Dramatic Recital which comprised several poems and extracts, very effectively given, of which the best declaimed was Rossetti's "The King's Tragedy." This dramatic ballad was interpreted by the reciter with well-sustained power, with appropriate gesture, and a fine rendering of the pathos and horror of the climax. In "The Tetterbys," from Dickens's The Haunted Man, and in the scene of Henry V.'s courtship from Shakspeare, very diverse humours were illustrated with an art that was admirable, refined, and subdued in expression; the recitation of Miss Ingelow's "High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire" was, on the other hand, somewhat over-coloured and ambitious. In this poem the speaker is an old woman, and it is scarcely likely she would give the milking-song of her "son's wife Elizabeth" as Miss Cowen gives it, which, effective as it is as mere elocution, is a dramatic impropriety; it is the voice of the young girl that is heard, and not the old woman's imitation of it. Miss Cowen's powers are such that she may well dispense with over-wrought effects when, however clever, they do not accord with the impersonation. In the course of the evening Miss De Fonblanque and Mr. Bernard Lane sang several songs by Mr. F. H. Cowen, who accompanied.

REVIEWS.

DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA.*

IN the magnificent volumes before us the late Sir William Stirling-Maxwell has left a legacy to English literature which will secure to him an enduring name among the historians of his age and nation. Something of assumption must be allowed to underlie the remark that few countries besides our own could have produced such a book; for wherever literature and art are cherished, there are usually to be found some representatives of research who at least aim at completeness. But it is at all events rare that the patron and the student are combined as they were in the author of Don John of Austria, and it is certain that, while love of learning cannot often enjoy such opportunities as were his, no country can boast many historians who would have made so admirable a use of them. For it would be in the highest degree unjust to regard the wealth of historical and artistic detail offered by these volumes as their chief title to commendation, or even to treat the book as the elaborate monograph of an accomplished dilettante, a description which might not unfairly be applied even to Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's Cloister Life of Charles V. The life of Don John, as a brief review of its principal features will suffice to call to mind, forms an integral part of the main current of modern European history in one of its most momentous epochs; the gallant son of a great father, though not himself a man either of genius or of commanding strength of character, he stood in the van of the two chief conflicts of his century—that of Christendom against Islam, and that of Rome and Spain against the liberties of both princes and peoples. Only an historian of a high order could deal with such a theme, as Sir William Stirling-Maxwell has dealt with it, competently and in many respects exhaustively; and we have little doubt but that this work, of which, we believe, a smaller edition has already been issued for popular use, will be valued by many readers unable to possess themselves of it in its more attractive form. Meanwhile it is fitting that a life of Don John of Austria, illustrated with generous abundance and tasteful splendour, should at last have been achieved by so eminent a representative of the northern land of which it was his ardent ambition to share the throne. The hero of Lepanto has long waited for his biographer. In his own day Brantôme, though not an eye-witness of the great battle ("hélas! je n'y estois pas"), included among his lives of illustrious foreign contemporaries that of Don John of Austria, never, as he tells us, having known any man but him "approchant des vertus bien universellement à feu monsieur de Nemours, Jacques de Savoye," the paragon, as another French writer calls him, of all our paladins. But since Brantôme celebrated Don John's praises in his own discursive way, and with an appetite for scandal which found food in manifold rumours as to both the birth and the death of his hero, and since early in the seventeenth century the Belgo-Spaniard Vanderhammen compiled his more laborious biography, the life of the most illustrious of all the imperial and royal bastards of whom modern history has to tell had met with no memorable treatment. A useful German biography by the late Professor Havemann, which Sir William Stirling-Maxwell appropriately describes as "a sensible book drawn from well-chosen sources," was reviewed in these columns many years ago (May 13th, 1865); and, of course, some of the most interesting portions of Don John's personal history are woven into the narratives of brilliant modern historians, and notably into those of Prescott and Motley. Sir William Stirling-Maxwell had their works at his command, and of Motley, at all events in the most thorny part of the story of Don John's career, he has made liberal use. In addition, he was aided by the researches of Gachard, more especially in the early part of the book, which contains the miserable episode of Don Carlos, of Mignet, and of many lesser men; and he fortunately lived long enough to be able to utilize in full the revelations of the Simancas archives, as well as the Belgian, Dutch, Venetian, English, and other records. We do not think that he makes any reference to the archives of the Vatican, with whose promised aid a complete history of the Holy League, which in the main could only redound to the honour of the Papacy, may still be written. On special parts of his subject Sir William, as a most accomplished Spanish scholar, was able to make special studies. Thus his account of the Morisco War is mainly based upon Marmol and Mendoza, whose characteristics as historians he describes in an interesting note. To the devotion of an indefatigable student he was able to add the resources of an eager collector and vigilant connoisseur of books, engravings, and other illustrative materials. These volumes supply a whole gallery of portraits of Don John and his contemporaries, among which few students will fail to find much that is new. We have no space for directing attention to individual portraits, but the reader need not go far into the book without experiencing the pleasure which fine portraiture adds to historical study. Don Luis Quixada, the governor of Don John in the Prince's boyhood, looks what indeed he was, the soul of honour and the type of rigid droiture, who when his house was on fire saved his wife from the flames, but not till he had first saved the boy committed to his charge by his sovereign. A little further on we have (from a Dutch print) an inimitable portrait of the Prince's tutor, Honorato Juan, "a miracle of genius and learning," who has left nothing behind him either to perpetuate or to undo his fame, and who, by the way, was anything but successful in implanting a love of books in his pupil. The early part of the first volume likewise contains a portrait of Don Carlos which might almost be said to furnish a sufficient key to the true history of his doom; and a reproduction of Lorch's woodcut of Charles V. in his decline, age and tribulation round his lips, but in his eye the piercing intelligence altogether absent from the lack-lustre countenance of his son. No doubt Philip, as, according to the well-known anecdote, Don John retorted upon Don Carlos in their student days, was an inferior personage to the Emperor. Besides a most interesting series of portraits and of numismatic and similar illustrations, these volumes also contain much historical and antiquarian lore on which it is frequently difficult for the student to lay his finger. Thus, above all, the chapter on the fleets of the sixteenth century, with its clear account of the galleys and galley-slaves of the Spanish, Venetian, and Turkish navies, forms a short monograph of almost unique value on a subject in its details hardly more familiar to most modern readers than are the manners and customs of the Egyptians as navigators of the Red Sea. Here, again, Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's account, largely based on the Venetian relazione, is judiciously supplemented from other sources, among them "the excellent description of galley life" in our old friend Guzman d'Alfarache. We need not add that in Don John, as in the earlier writings of its author, the style is that of a scholar susceptible of enthusiasm, but not prodigal of phrase. Occasionally he displays a graphic power resembling Motley's, without that hankering after picturesqueness which the American shares with the most popular English historian of the great struggle against Spain and Rome. The picture of "the little fiery-faced infidel" Sultan Selim II. would have engraved itself on the reader's mind even without the aid of the reproduction of Domenico Zenoi's striking print. Elsewhere a lucidity of statement, which is a rarer gift among modern historians, enables the reader to understand matters so complicated as the Genoese Constitution, with its old and new nobility, of which we cannot remember elsewhere to have seen so perspicuous an account, except in the Histoire de Gênes of M. Emile Vincens.

The researches of Sir William Stirling-Maxwell and his predecessors have not left unsolved many problems connected with the biographical history of Don John of Austria. To one or two such questions we may, however, briefly advert. They can hardly be said to include any reasonable doubt as to his origin. The taunt launched against him by his mother, and taken up by his political adversaries, that he was not the Emperor's son, must have been a mere invention of spite; nor can there be much doubt but that on her side Barbara Blomberg was entitled to the honour of his parentage. "Madame Plomber," as one of the Venetian Ambassadors calls her, or the widow Kegel, as was her proper, though prosaic, designation in her later years, was precisely the sort of person whom it would have been only too gratifying to the Spanish Court to be able to ignore. She showed herself more than a match for Alva when he endeavoured, on his master's behalf, to remove her from Flanders to Spain, in order, if possible, there to immure her in a nunnery, where a rein would be put upon her expenditure; nor was it—curiously, though intelligibly enough—till after the arrival of her son, whom she had never seen since his infancy, that she was prevailed upon to migrate. In Spain she kept up her extravagant habits to the last, surviving her famous son, between whom and herself there seems to have been no superfluity of affection. Though nothing is recorded to the credit of her character, there is no reason to throw doubts on the respectability of her descent; assuredly Motley had no warrant for describing her as a "washerwoman of Ratisbon," for even Brantôme mentions the washerwoman legend only in order to reject it. Curiously enough, by the way, the present biography of Don John begins with the rectification of a rather serious error fostered by numerous predecessors. He was born in 1547, not in 1545, as even Havemann persists in stating, though he actually cites the inscription on the Lepanto medal (1571), which refers to the conquering hero as in his thirty-fourth year. A curious piece of sculpture is said to be in existence at Vienna, furnishing a further corroboration of the later date. There is, perhaps, nothing specially noteworthy in the fact that a tradition designating them as the birthplace of Don John should have persistently clung, not only to the ancient hostelry of the "Golden Cross" at Ratisbon, but to a particular room on its first story.

One may, if one likes, suppose Don John to have inherited from his South-German mother a certain lightsomeness of disposition and joyous confidence of spirit which were to stand him in good stead in many an hour of difficulty and danger, until at last they were extinguished by the bitter disappointments amidst which his life closed. There is something attractive in the gaiety of heart which he exhibited in his younger days—in such an escapade as his attempt in 1565 (the year after King Philip had solicited for him a cardinal's hat) to run away to the fleet over which only two years later he was, as General of the Sea, to hold the supreme command; and in the part played by him immediately before the fighting began off Lepanto, when admiral-in-chief of the Christian armada:—

> When the fleets neared each other, and the Christians were all prostrate before their crucifixes and friars, and no sound was heard on their decks but the voices of the holy fathers, the Turks were indulging in every kind of noise which Nature or art had furnished them with the means of producing. Shouting and screaming, they bade the Christians come on "like drowned hens" and be slaughtered; they danced, and stamped, and clanged their arms; they blew trumpets, clashed cymbals, and fired volleys of useless musketry. When the Christians had ended their devotions and stood to their guns, or in their ordered ranks, each galley, in the long array, seemed on fire, as the noontide sun blazed on helm and corslet, and pointed blades and pikes with flame. The bugles now sounded a charge, and the bands of each vessel began to play. Before Don John retired from the forecastle to his proper place on the quarter-deck, it is said, by one of the officers who has written an account of the battle, that he and two of his gentlemen, "inspired with youthful ardour, danced a galliard on 'the gun-platform, to the music of the fifes.'"

He was, however, wholly free from that kind of lightheartedness which in a commander means ruin to armies or fleets; even Brantôme commends his readiness to take advice; but the natural bonhomie which was not wholly wanting in Charles V. himself combined with a contagious spirit of lofty ambition to make his illegitimate son, though not a great, at least a popular and successful leader of men. But for him, the Holy League might possibly never have found a suitable commander of its allied but not united armada; but for him, that armada would certainly have dissolved itself into its component parts before the victory was gained to the chief glory of which he is thus in more senses than one entitled. While, however, he could conciliate, he could not permanently control, the allies of Spain and Rome; it is open to question whether, even in the battle of Lepanto itself, the wary Genoese admiral, Giovanni Andrea Doria, did not at first play a waiting game; and it is well known how a few months afterwards the consummate selfishness of the Venetians secured to them a separate peace, of which the inevitable consequence was that Don John had to haul down the flag of the Holy League when its task was at most half done. An alliance was thus ended in the hour of success which had at no time been based upon mutual goodwill; for, if Venice had deserted Spain at the last, Spain had been jealous of Venice from the first, and without the fiery energy of Pope Pius V. the League would never have been brought to pass at all. Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's narrative of these transactions is remarkably clear, and leaves it no longer difficult to understand why the victory of Lepanto was in so large a measure wasted. We agree with him, however, that neither was the League formed nor the battle fought altogether in vain. The power of the Turk had not been broken, but his progress had been for the first time effectually checked; and even Venice, though at the cost of territorial losses and a humiliation such as she hardly would have submitted to had her power not been already declining, had secured a peace with her arch-foe which lasted for seventy years.

The victory of Lepanto was the climax of Don John's greatness. Glory had come to him, as is at times her usage, not indeed otherwise than easily, but never without manful and loyal endeavours on his part, which deserved success even when seeming to command it. The account given in the present biography of the Morisco rebellion and its dolorous end, which is full of interest even after Prescott, certainly leaves no impression of great deeds accomplished by the Spanish commander-in-chief. In the course of the campaign he frankly confessed to the King that both Requesens and himself were not only short of troops, but also wanting in experience; his most signal exploit was the capture of Galera, long remembered as a dearly bought success, and, moreover, according to the account of an eyewitness, marred by a cruelty not generally characteristic of Don John's habits of warfare. After Lepanto, a crown which seemed only to require a little putting together—that of Greece or of parts of it—was offered to the conqueror; and not long afterwards a Tunisian royalty might perhaps have satisfied a facile mood of his ambition. In 1575 the Venetian Ambassador Lippomano reported in a very interesting despatch, here printed, that Don John was expected to be made Vicar-General of Italy; and it is known how he dreamt of and schemed for a kingship both solid and independent, aspiring to rule Scotland and England by the liberated Mary's side. But, in truth, the years of his life which followed upon his great victory were spent in a succession of hopeless tasks. He loyally undertook the ungrateful labour of helping to settle the affairs of Genoa, though he thereby ran the risk of offending the Pope (Gregory XIII.), from whom he hoped for a crown; but it cannot be said that the settlement arrived at was satisfactory to any of the parties concerned. His generous if sanguine Tunisian policy was thwarted by the narrowness and niggardliness of King Philip, and by the jealous caution of Granvelle. It was, however, in the Netherlands that his star was to pale and set. He arrived there in the doubly unfortunate character of a messenger of peace both belated and suspected. His instructions were to consent if necessary to the departure of the Spanish troops from the Netherlands, as if there had been no modus pacis but this; and while making this concession, Philip was "planning the conquest, from Belgium and by Belgian resources, of England, the ally and protector of his Belgian rebels." Don John devised the expedient of combining both ends by removing the troops by sea; but William of Orange at once frustrated this manœuvre. The removal was in the end unskilfully enough accomplished by land, and by assenting, however unwillingly, to the Perpetual Edict, Don John hoped at last to have saved "religion and obedience." But Orange, who had not expected that the Governor-General would sign the edict, hereupon (as Sir William Stirling-Maxwell well expresses it) began to "tack," and Don John had to engage in the absolutely futile endeavour of seeking to conciliate him. Queen Elizabeth was, notwithstanding the Spanish Governor's fair words, well aware that he was "cherishing" Her Majesty's rebels; and thus, more especially as the fears of Don John had prompted him to secure a series of fortresses, while he had been frustrated in his design of seizing Antwerp, it was easy for Orange to prevent the acceptance of conciliatory offers which might at the last moment have averted the renewal of the war. Then came the last humiliation, the invitation of the Estates to the Archduke Matthias, and his arrival in the Provinces. After the war had actually broken out again, and Don John had tasted the pleasure of a victory in arms once more, Philip would have acknowledged Matthias as Governor-General and withdrawn Don John. But it was too late; French intrigue added its complications; and Don John was at least permitted to die at the post of duty, though the laurels of the recovery of Belgium were not destined for his brow, and he passed away, despondent and half heart-broken, his task unaccomplished and his ambition unfulfilled.

No biographer of Don John can pass over in silence the rumour which connects King Philip II. with his half-brother's premature death; but it is to this day a rumour and nothing more. Notwithstanding the suspiciousness and jealousy of Philip's disposition, there seems no reason to believe that during nearly the whole of Don John's career, the King had entertained any feeling but goodwill towards him. He had unhesitatingly approved of his brother's appointment to the command with which his career of glory began; and though he had according to his wont interfered in the conduct of the Morisco war and caused procrastination where it was possible for him to do so, he had shown himself solicitous for Don John's personal safety. The nomination of Don John by Pope Pius as commander-in-chief of the Holy League seems to have met with Philip's ready assent; and though as a matter of principle he received the news of the victory of Lepanto with unmoved countenance, the bearer of Don John's despatches to the King reported that for the first half-hour the latter did nothing but ask "Is my brother certainly well?" and all sorts of conceivable questions that the case admitted. The Venetian Lippomano, though he thought it clear that the King would never give to his half-brother any part of the Spanish dominions as an independent possession, believed that he commanded a high share of the Royal favour. When, after his appointment to the Governor-Generalship of the Netherlands, Don John, notwithstanding the King's peremptory prohibition, came to Spain and secured a personal interview, he was received with kindness and consideration. It is, however, certain that at last the malignant intrigues of Antonio Perez poisoned the mind of Philip against his loyal kinsman. As Sir William Stirling-Maxwell narrates the story, Perez had resolved upon the ruin of Don John and his secretary, Escovedo, before the latter came to Madrid and, by his discovery of the amours of Perez and the Princess of Eboli, incurred the deadly enmity of the ruthless Minister. The whole series of transactions, of which the death of Escovedo forms the culminating point, remains full of difficulties; as our readers are aware, authorities still dispute as to the relation in which King Philip stood to the Princess of Eboli, and in which, therefore, he stood to Escovedo's secret; nor is Mignet's version by any means unchallenged. But there can be no doubt that the intrigues of which the murder of Escovedo closed the first series put an end to all trust on Philip's part in his half-brother. Ten days before Don John's death he wrote to the King, pointing out to him the practices of Anjou, and craving for men, for money, for supplies, but above all for distinct "orders for the conduct of affairs." "Our lives are at issue on this stake," he wrote, "and all we desire is to lose them with honour."

When Philip received this pathetic letter, he drew his pen beneath the words entreating for "orders for the conduct of affairs," and wrote on the margin, "The underlined question I will not answer." When he made this cruel annotation it was already decreed that he was to be troubled no more with such passionate appeals. The hand which had penned the passage was cold in death.

SEVEN NOVELS.*

"WHY this thusness?" is supposed to be a slang question; but it is often a valuable criticism of life, if we may employ a phrase for which we have all the more reverence in that we have never pretended to any but a distant conception of its meaning. With that meaning, as the late Mr. Bagehot tells us, the late Mr. Crabb Robinson used to say of somebody, "We could never presume to be intimately acquainted." But, as far as we can make it out at all, "Why this thusness?" must be a very frequent test-question of the critic of life. Mr. Buchanan seems to have felt that it might be applied to The New Abelard, and he has prefixed a preface to answer it which, after the wont of such prefaces, leaves us considerably more in the dark than we were before, or should have been supposing that we had pursued the more excellent way and read the book first and the preface last. The most definite impression which the book has made upon us is that it is very hard upon Abelard. The author of Sic et Non was far from being a perfect character; but he was an extremely clever man, and there is no evidence to show that he was a snob. By Mr. Buchanan's showing the Rev. Ambrose Bradley was not at all a clever man, and we fear he was a snob. The points of resemblance, or of fancied resemblance, to Abelard are, apparently, that the Rev. Ambrose Bradley stumbled into an unwilling kind of heresy and had difficulties with his bishop; that he behaved very badly to a beautiful and interesting young woman; that he did not get on at all comfortably as a heresiarch; and that he finally recanted, in an odd sort of fashion, while the newest Heloise recanted likewise. The parallel is charitably drawn, and accuracy is a little strained to make it as near as it is. On the other hand, not a single speech of Mr. Bradley's that we have here makes us think that he would have been able to silence the veriest weakling who happened to take the place of William of Champeaux, and we protest very indignantly (though not in the least in the interests of nominalism) against the evening of his conduct to that of Abelard with Heloise. Heloise, according to history or legend—which latter is here the only important thing—knew perfectly well what she was doing—at least she says so in Latin which is less creditable to her sense of propriety than to her affection and her literary faculty. Now Alma Crale did not know that Ambrose Bradley had a wife living, and that makes a considerable difference. However, this is, after all, only a matter of taste. What is a matter not of taste is the eminently unhealthy flavour which Mr. Buchanan has contrived to infuse into his book. Whether he is talking of "Mr. John Cholmondeley," the editor of the "Charing Cross Chronicle"—which newspaper, lest we should make any mistake, Mr. Buchanan informs us, has its office in "Cumberland Street"—and thus trying to suit the modern appetite for personalities, or of the loves of Alma and Ambrose, and of an American medium for Ambrose, so as to satisfy the modern appetite for a kind of sickly passion, this unhealthiness perseveringly makes itself felt. To tell the truth, the appeal of the book lies almost wholly in the way in which it rings the changes on these two motives. It never, except in the case of Ambrose's bigamy, shocks Mrs. Grundy definitely and positively, and it may be hoped that Mr. Buchanan does not intend to fix on the persons whom he transparently calls Mr. Cholmondeley, Miss Combe, and so forth, all the particulars which he attributes to their counterfeits. But still the general character of the novel depends on its personality and on the riskiness of its situations. Whether in such a book there are, or are not, any traits of better import it is scarcely necessary to inquire; they are not considerable enough to be redeeming, and that is the main affair.

It would not be easy to take up a book more different in all points from The New Abelard than Kirby in the Dale. It is apparently the work of a writer unpractised in novel-writing, and it has some of the defects usually observable in novice-novelists more than in any other class of novices in literature. The intrigue is a little complicated and somewhat stiffly worked off; the dialogue is not always crisp enough (long speeches are to be avoided in novels even more than in drama); and the author's digressive opinions on things in general, though always well expressed and generally shrewd enough, may sometimes seem superfluous to an impatient generation. But these are almost wholly matters of practice or want of practice, and they are noticeable in the novels of almost every writer without exception who tries the ordeal of the three volumes for the first time. Making allowance for them (and not making by any means a large allowance), Kirby in the Dale remains a very fair novel indeed of its kind. The story, which turns upon a brace of concealed marriages, and has a due amount of revolutions and discoveries, is fully sufficient in interest to carry the reader through, and it may be particularly observed in its favour that it is dissembled with rather unusual art in the first volume. Generally speaking, the story of every novel of the kind is obvious to the practised reader in the course of the first fifty pages, and that is not so here. As it is not there is no need, but the contrary, to tell it. The writing of the book is throughout that of a scholar and a gentleman—a blessed thing to come across in modern novels, where half the novelists seem to be chiefly anxious to libel their personal friends or enemies without fear of the High Court of Justice, and the other half ("Bedad it's the same half, too," an Irishman might say) are chiefly desirous to quote false French, false Latin, or any other language provided only it be ungrammatical. Mr. Rye's sketch of Yorkshire scenery and manners, the scenery being tolerably recognizable, though mixed, is good, and shows familiarity with the original; and in the before-mentioned digressions, if they are to be called by so harsh a word, there is a great deal of observation, some humour, and a neat faculty of expression. The analysis of a young lady's sentiments when she finds that one whom she has taken to be a maiden companion and social equal of hers is in reality a wife and a mother, and a very possible lady of the manor, may be accused by very silly people of ill-nature—it certainly has (in the French though not the English sense) malice. But, not only for that reason, it is very amusing. There are not a few other things of the kind, and the reader will not have to wait long before he comes on them or some of them. Perhaps some readers may be shocked by Mr. Rye's dictum that modern newspapers do more harm than printing has ever done good. It is heresy, no doubt; but there are heresies which are by no means without something to say for themselves, and this may, perhaps, claim to rank among the number.

There is nothing at all to be said save what is favourable of the get-up and general appearance of the translations of foreign novels which Messrs. Gottsberger are now issuing in America and Messrs. Trübner in England. Neither, in the case of the five volumes before us, is there anything but good to be said of the translator. Indeed, we have not seldom felt rather sorry that a faculty of translation, apparently from more languages than one, so unusually good as this lady's, should not be employed on more valuable and durable work. This judgment must, indeed, be limited by the observation that the Spanish idiom seems to be less manageable in her hands than the German, of which she leaves scarcely a trace on her English versions. But we cannot profess any very lively admiration for the foreign bodies here presented to us in English dress. There is, indeed, but little fear of English novelists being ruined by German and Spanish cheap labour if this be the best that German and Spanish labour can do. All the books are specimens of the historical novel—a difficult kind. Trafalgar, which is the shortest, and perhaps the best, appeals to English readers by the picture it gives of the great battle from a Spanish point of view, and yet with no animus against England, and by the unfamiliar type of Spanish seamen which it portrays. The old salt Marcial, with his nicknames for all the admirals of the day (Nelson is honourably distinguished as "the Senorito" without any comic addition), is very good—is, indeed, much the best person or thing in the book. The story of the battle is told confusedly and without much spirit, but the subsequent loss of the Santissima Trinidad, and the recapture of the Santa Aña, are better. The hero, however, who is a boy-servant to the old Captain, Don Alonso de Cisniega, is not much of a hero, and the whole story is destitute, except where Marcial appears, of the salt and life and personal interest which Marryat and Cooper and the author of Tom Cringle's Log have made Englishmen demand in naval novels. Marcial, however, though one sighs to think how much more Marryat would have made of him, is something of a redeeming feature, and the book is not long enough to be tedious. We do not know that we can say this of Prusias and Quintus Claudius. They are very much longer—allowing for two volumes apiece, for more pages and for smaller type, there must be three or four times the amount of matter in each that there is in Señor Galdos's story—they are terribly learned, like most classical novels, and, as if we should not find it out, Dr. Eckstein takes care to tell us that they were written with an elaborate purpose. Prusias, it seems, is "pitched in a key which is the relative minor to the major of Quintus Claudius," and the motives of the two are elaborately laid before the reader. Furthermore, as if, as has been said, classical novels were not always sufficiently pedantic, the publisher has put the notes, which Dr. Eckstein prudently placed at the end, at the foot of each page. We are sure that the unlearned reader who is thus referred to "Cubiculum, sleeping-room," "Epic, from epos, word, tale," will share, though in a slightly different mood, the exasperation which not altogether unlearned readers will certainly feel. The man who reads a novel does not want to know the derivation of epic if he doesn't know it, or to be reminded of it if he does. He wants a good novel. Now one quality of a good novel these careful, and, it seems, in Germany successful, books lack, and that is readableness. We certainly do not mean to say that it is impossible for those who can read them to derive profit, and perhaps in a certain sense pleasure, from the reading. But for ourselves we find the preliminary process almost insuperably difficult, though we have made valiant efforts. And these efforts qualify us to say that Dr. Eckstein is not the magician who can make the character of Domitian live in modern fiction, or even grapple with the much less difficult task of making a stirring tale out of the not unpromising subject of the revolt of Spartacus.

The two stories (for there are two) which Miss Hance has put into her volume are stories of such extreme youthfulness and obviously harmless intention that it would be brutal to lift a finger against them save in the way of kindness. Perhaps the allowance of incident in The Penalty Paid, which is a story of not quite a hundred and fifty small pages, is excessive. A seduction, a murder—or, at least, an accidental death—and another death at the altar-rails of a church, make a list showing great extravagance on the part of a young writer in such a case. A worse fault is that an unconscionable part of the story, including almost all its most exciting details, is told at second-hand by a gentleman who seems to have had not only (what one of his friends bluntly accuses him of) a fancy for tale-bearing against his clients, but also an extraordinary memory and much power of reporting conversation. In "That Terrible Tuesday," the second tale, there are a few little touches which unkind people may call vulgar, and the donnée urgently requires the attention of Mrs. Fawcett and other promoters of the professional employment of women. It seems that managers of Insurance Companies who employ lady clerks dismiss them because they refuse to give the name and address of gentlemen with whom they have been seen dining in public places. This seems to be a jumble of new and old-fangled ideas which, if it takes place in fact, should be seen to.

"All the snakes in Guiana," says the legend to the delightful frontispiece of The Gold-Seekers, "seem to have met in this place." They do. Independently of two or three pythons, each about the bigness of the mainmast of a first-rate, there are, we should say, five or six hundred other serpents, each with a very forked tongue out of a very widely-opened mouth, and all scientifically occupying the boughs of an overhanging tree to dispute the passage of a river with four bold adventurers in a canoe. It is not easy to live up to such a frontispiece as this; but M. Boussenard has done it very fairly, while his illustrator has kept pace with him very fairly also. There are more snakes elsewhere, and it should be observed that they are not mere casual reptiles, but are under the orders of a snake-charmer, whose music arrays them against the bold adventurers. These latter are, we regret to say, not nearly so good as bold. There is another picture in which "the ascent is extremely severe," and we must say that both here and elsewhere it is very steep. Another is fully and accurately described by the simple words "He cut off his head." Nor let it for a moment be supposed that in writing in this fashion we are scoffing at M. Boussenard and his book. It is a good honest boy's book, with plenty of adventure, with natural history which is reasonably accurate without being in the least pretentious or scientific, with the bad people well punished after intervals of triumph, with no more of the good people killed than the requirements of dramatic fiction make unavoidable. It has got a friendly jaguar in it (we would not give a rap for a South American story-book without a friendly jaguar), and it describes the ingenious insect-and-net torture (it is done though, we think, with ants, not wasps) agreeably, and not in a too harrowing fashion. The good people, however, are unnecessarily disdainful of the gold which the bad people seek. Gold is a very nice thing, whether it be used after the fashion of Prince Seithenyn, or of modern charitable persons, or of Benvenuto Cellini, or in many other ways. If we find, like the Robin family, four parcels of gold worth eighteen thousand pounds each, we give fair warning that we shall not throw them into a pit. That, however, is merely a declaration of private purpose. M. Boussenard's translator has done his work fairly, but we have some objections to placing before youth the phrase "a chevaux de frise," which seems to us deficient both from the syntactical and the orthographic point of view. Neither do we see the use or justice of the word "couleuvres" in an English book. Your viper is a gentleman born in this country, and deserves to be called by his own name.

KADESH BARNEA.*

THE history of Kadesh Barnea is a curious chapter in the story of Palestine topography and identification. The name occurs, not to speak of the Bible, in the lists of Syrian conquests enumerated in the Hall of Pillars at Karnak: among the places mentioned in the Book of Judith as those to which a message was sent by the King of the Assyrians: it is spoken of in the Talmud as "Rekem," a name also applied to the city of Petra: it was supposed by Eusebius to be the name of the great desert south of Palestine; in other words, by that time Kadesh was lost, and it seems to have remained lost until the time of the Crusades, when every ancient name was recovered, somehow or other—Capernaum, for instance, found a site on the shore of the Mediterranean. King Amaury is reported to have gone out to meet the Syrian forces as far as "Kadesh Barnea in the desert," but it is not clear from the account where the place was then fixed or whether it was still regarded as a district. Brocardus speaks of it as a district. Marino Sanuto refers to the "land of Amalek" as extending to the "Tongue of the Dead Sea and Kadesh Barnea." In the fifteenth century Breydenbach thought he had found Kadesh in a place which is apparently that marked on the great map of the Palestine Exploration Fund (Sheet XIX.) as Khan el Hawâdi. Jacob Ziegler, a Bavarian geographer, in 1532 placed Kadesh Barnea south-west of the Dead Sea. About this time there arose the idea, continued to modern times, that there were two distinct places, Kadesh and Kadesh Barnea. Sir Walter Raleigh, Quaresmius, Blaeu of Holland, Spanheim, and others have adopted this view. Shaw, the English traveller, argued in 1722 for Kadesh Barnea near Kula't Nakhl. Bishop Pococke thought it must be sought about sixteen miles N.W. of the convent of Mount Sinai. Seetzen in 1807 came nearer and actually found the Wady Gadis, though he does not seem to have realized the importance of this discovery. Burckhardt contended for the site in the land of Edom, near Petra, in which he was followed by Laborde. Very few travellers up to recent times have crossed the Tih or gone up the Wady Arabah. Lord Lindsay, one of those who did, thought that Kadesh must be sought somewhere on the route to Hebron; Von Schubert placed it near Jebel Madurah; and Count Bertou actually heard the name, which he gives in the form of "Kadessa." The site appears to have been neglected by Volney, Irby and Mangles, Legh, Henniker and Russegger.

We come next to the great American traveller, Robinson, who has done as much, singly, for Palestine topography as all previous travellers put together. Unfortunately, Robinson, always as tenacious of a theory as he was ingenious and quick to see, was so much impressed with the fine mountain scenery of the Wady Arabah that he made up his mind to find Kadesh there; accordingly he fixed on a place called Wady el Jayb, where are certain springs called Ain el Weibeh, as the site of Kadesh. True, the name does not correspond; there are no evidences of an ancient city; and there is no "Sela" or cliff before which Moses and Aaron assembled the people. However, the identification was adopted, and published in Biblical Researches, where it may be found to this day.

It was only just after the appearance of Robinson's first book—namely, in the year 1842—that the Rev. John Rowlands discovered what appears to be the actual Kadesh. With his friend, the Rev. George Williams, he had explored the great wall and rampart, the Mount Haluk, which forms the southern border of the Promised Land. Here they ascertained the existence of a place called Gadis, which suggested Kadesh. At that time they were unable to pursue their investigations further; but shortly afterwards Rowlands made another, and this time a more successful, attempt. What he found, and described, was a spur of solid naked rock, at the base of which issues, like the rivet Sorgue at Vaucluse, a full-grown stream. This stream runs for three or four hundred yards and is buried in the sand. As for the proofs of the identification they are simple. The name exactly corresponds to the ancient name; it lies where, except for Robinson's heresy, one would expect to find it; it corresponds with the order in which the places on the border are mentioned; there is a good road all the way to Sinai, and another to Mount Hor, and there is ample room for a vast encampment. To the discovery there was but one reply possible by those who maintained Robinson's theory. It was that the whole story was moonshine. In short, there was no such stream, and no such place. It is a most remarkable thing that from the year 1842 to the year 1881 Rowlands was actually disbelieved. No subsequent traveller had found the place. In the year 1870 Palmer was especially instructed to look for it. He found a spring called Ain Kusseimeh, and another called Ain Hudeirat, very near Rowlands's site, but not the spring; and, with the exception, perhaps, of the late Rev. F. W. Holland, everybody had agreed to speak of Mr. Rowlands's description as coloured with enthusiasm, to say the least of it. Yet, in the year 1881, nearly forty years after Rowlands had visited the spot, it was rediscovered by an American traveller, the Rev. Dr. Clay Trumbull:—

Out from the barren and desolate stretch of the burning desert-waste, we had come with magical suddenness into an oasis of verdure and beauty, unlooked for and hardly conceivable in such a region. A carpet of grass covered the ground. Fig trees, laden with fruit nearly ripe enough for eating, were along the shelter of the southern hillside. Shrubs and flowers showed themselves in variety and profusion. Running water gurgled under the waving grass. We had seen nothing like it since leaving Wady Fayrân; nor was it equalled in loveliness of scene by any single bit of landscape, of like extent, even there.

Standing out from the earth-covered limestone hills at the northeastern sweep of this picturesque recess, was to be seen the "large single mass, or a small hill, of solid rock," which Rowlands looked at as the cliff (Sel'a) smitten by Moses, to cause it to "give forth his water," when its flowing stream had been exhausted. From underneath this ragged spur of the northeasterly mountain range, issued the now abundant stream.

A circular well, stoned-up from the bottom with time-worn limestone blocks, was the first receptacle of the water. A marble watering trough was near this well—better finished than the troughs at Beersheba, but of like primitive workmanship. The mouth of this well was only about three feet in diameter, and the water came to within three or four feet of the top. A little distance westerly from this well, and down the slope, was a second well, stoned-up much like the first, but of greater diameter; and here again was a marble watering trough. A basin or pool of water larger than either of the wells, but not stoned-up like them, was seemingly the principal watering place. It was a short distance southwesterly from the second well, and it looked as if it and the two wells might be supplied from the same subterranean source—the springs under the Rock. Around the margin of this pool, as also around the stoned wells, camel and goat dung—as if of flocks and herds for centuries—was trodden down and commingled with the limestone dust so as to form a solid plaster bed. Another and yet larger pool, lower down the slope, was supplied with water by a stream which rippled and cascaded along its narrow bed from the upper pool; and yet beyond this, westward, the water gurgled away under the grass, as we had met it when we came in, and finally lost itself in the parching wady from which this oasis opened. The water itself was remarkably pure and sweet; unequalled by any we had found after leaving the Nile.

There was a New England look to this oasis, especially in the flowers and grass and weeds; quite unlike anything we had seen in the peninsula of Sinai. Bees were humming there, and birds were flitting from tree to tree. Enormous ant hills made of green grass-seed, instead of sand, were numerous. As we came into the wady we had started up a rabbit, and had seen larks and quails. It was, in fact, hard to realize that we were in the desert, or even near it.

In this manner has Rowlands at length been justified. A stranger "traveller's tale" could hardly be told, and though Dr. Trumbull has made it the peg on which to write a book of 400 pages, which would seem at first to give too great importance to the site and its history, it must be remembered that Kadesh is of capital importance in all theories concerning the route of the Exodus. It may possibly be that Dr. Trumbull's site will not be generally accepted, though this appears unlikely, but the story, as we have it, is very remarkable and interesting, and Dr. Trumbull's book is certainly a valuable addition to the already enormous mass of Palestine literature. From certain notes made by Mr. Holland during a journey in 1878, and edited by his friend Sir Charles Wilson in the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund (January 1884), it is evident that he also went up the Wady Gadis and found the spring; but Holland does not seem to have been struck with the fact that he had rediscovered the Kadesh of Rowlands. He only says:—

May 14th. Started at 5 A.M. At 5.50 Ain Kadeis just above a turn in the wady, where it becomes narrower. There are three springs; two on the hillside, and one on the bed of the wady. From the lower spring on the hillside a good stream of water flows for about 100 yards down the wady, forming pools, at which the goats are watered; the camels go to the spring. The upper spring on the hillside is a poor one now; it is built round with large rough stones to a depth of five feet, and there is a rude stone trough here and at the lowest spring. The three springs are not more than forty yards apart. The wady, which is stony throughout, has a bed below the springs nearly fifteen feet deep between stony jorfs.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.*

DR. HOLMES is, of all living American writers, the one who may most truly be said to have won the hearts of English readers. Longfellow and Emerson, who have so lately passed away, have had the former wider, and the latter deeper, influence on the feelings and thoughts of Englishmen. But there is no American author now living whose works are more often read, and (which is the best test of their value) more often taken up again, than those of Dr. Holmes. In him wit, sparkling intelligence, wide reading, mature thought, and a sunny kindliness, are so blended that there is not one page of his writings in which some one or more of these qualities do not appear. There is in most cases, it appears to us, something a trifle indelicate in writing the biography of one still living. It is scarcely possible to do so without either rudeness or flattery, or suppression of the truth. A man may indeed write his own. If a strong man, he can and will do so with perfect impartiality. But there are some writers who stand in a relation so peculiarly personal to the public that the reader's curiosity about them is only natural, and not prying or ill-bred, and can be gratified without bad taste on the part of the biographer. Few living writers have had equally with Dr. Holmes the power to make readers who have known nothing at all about him but what they gathered from his works feel towards him as a personal friend. Such writers need not be of the highest rank. They may fail to win as much posthumous fame as falls to the lot of others who have gained but a scanty recognition during their lifetime. But their reward is perhaps as great.

Dr. Holmes, as the writer tells us, was born on the 29th of August, 1809, at Cambridge, near Boston, where his father was pastor. His early training no doubt contributed much to the serious foundation which underlies so much of his pleasantry. He is descended from an English family of the same name, which was represented in America as early as the seventeenth century. The Wendells, from whom his second Christian name is derived, are themselves of old Dutch extraction, the first settler of the name having come to America from East Friesland in the year 1645; and in other ways Dr. Holmes is related to some more of the "best" families in America. "I go in," he writes in the Autocrat, "for the man with the family portraits against the one with the twenty-five-cent daguerrotype, unless I find out that the last is the better of the two. I go in for the man who inherits family traditions and the cumulative humanities of at least four or five generations." Of his imaginative boyhood Dr. Holmes has told the world a good deal in his writings; but he has furnished his biographer with some fresh notes which will be read with pleasure as helping to fill in the picture. After the usual preparatory schooling he entered Harvard University. About the same time a proposal was made to break up the American frigate Constitution, which had won no small fame by the capture of the British Guerrière. This act excited much indignation in Boston, near which town, in the Charlestown Navy Yard, the vessel was lying. To this public feeling the young Holmes gave voice in a spirited little poem, which was published in a Boston newspaper, and thence circulated about the country. The verses are characteristic. The ship

> No more shall feel the victor's tread
> Or know the conquered knee;
> The harpies of the shore shall pluck
> The eagle of the sea.

And, but for the unclearness of two lines elsewhere in the poem, it, might have been the product of later years. The effect of it was so great that the proposal was abandoned. Holmes, as might be expected, was a frequent contributor to college magazines. After completing the usual college course, and then studying law for a year, he turned his attention to medicine, studying first in America, and afterwards for three years in Europe. In 1836 he took his degree of M.D. Three years later he was appointed Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Dartmouth College, which he did not long hold. Finally, in 1847, he was appointed to a similar professorship at his own college, Harvard, which he held for many years. These are some few of the dates which mark the facts of Dr. Holmes's outward life. To the general public, especially in Europe, he is known as the poet, wit, and novelist; but in America his worth as a man of science and a teacher has for many years been widely recognized. Those who have listened to Dr. Holmes's conversation, or, which is much the same thing, read the Autocrat or the Professor, can understand the charm of receiving instruction from him which his pupils must have felt.

This is not the place for any detailed notice of Dr. Holmes's works. Our object is rather to call attention to this little biography, which, slight as it is, may serve to freshen the interest of many readers in its subject. It is, for the most part, a compilation of facts relating to Dr. Holmes, of extracts from his works, and of extracts from what others have said or written about him. About the author we can have no opinion at all to express, except that he has made the compilation with evident pleasure. There is a little too much of Boston genealogy in it—at least for those who do not happen to belong to that city. It is evidently written rather for Bostonian than for English readers, as many names known only to a limited circle are mentioned in a way which implies that everybody is familiar with them. The best, perhaps, of all that is quoted from Dr. Holmes's writings is the poem—which will be new to most English readers—which he wrote on the occasion of the breakfast which was given him by friends to celebrate his seventieth birthday, and the charming poem entitled "Dorothy Q." Both are full of all the best qualities of his verse. It would be putting forward an absurd claim, and one which would offend nobody's taste more than that of Dr. Holmes, to say that he was a great poet. But probably few living writers, in verse or prose, have given more wholesome pleasure to a large number of readers.

BURTON'S HISTORY OF BEWDLEY.*

AMONG the smaller boroughs which escaped disfranchisement under the Reform Act of 1832, the Beau-lieu nestling under its primæval Forest of Wyre, where the Severn enters Worcestershire, had some historical, if it had no very obvious political, right to survive. The manor certainly belonged to the Crown, and the Crown lessee, a Whig baronet, was elected without opposition in December 1832, as the local member, who had held the seat unopposed through the five general elections preceding, "did not choose again to offer himself"; but the method by which the continued Parliamentary existence of the borough was secured was ingenious, not to say Mezentian, in its conception. The constituency still retained the name of Bewdley; but it was made to include the modern and rival town of Stourport, which had arisen in the hamlet of Lower Mitton, belonging to Kidderminster, a few miles lower down the Severn on its opposite bank. The connexion is one exclusively of Parliamentary franchise, the old royal borough retaining in every other respect its separate character. Like all ancient country towns, Bewdley has its endowed Grammar School; and Mr. Burton has set an example which his brother Head-Masters will do well to imitate in collecting and editing the historical records of a community which has held a distinct, and locally almost a prominent, position in the national life of the past. The usual difficulty of local historians is frankly acknowledged in the preface; the literary material collected has been large; the financial provision for its publication small. "The materials for the work, which have been accumulating for several years, would make a far larger book than that now laid before the reader"; but, as the cost of publication was limited by the subscription-list for copies, "it was not considered desirable to increase the price first named." Financial difficulties of this kind may be expected to disappear when the principle is recognized that a good book is as valuable as a good picture, while its enjoyment may be much more widely extended.

"On the summit of a hill overlooking Bewdley is Ticknell House," which, "when the Crown lands of the manor were sold ten or twelve years ago, was purchased by Mr. Tangye, of Birmingham." The house, rebuilt in 1738, stands on the site, and perhaps, in its inner walls, retains some of the fabric, of the Palace of Tickenhill, described by Leland as, "in a manner totally erected by King Henry VII. for Prince Arthur." Tickenhill had been an ancient manor of the Mortimers; and Mr. Burton considers it to have been distinct from Bewdley proper, which lay below on the riverside. A portion of the palace was still standing in 1712, and is represented in one of the illustrations to the book as a substantial "half-timbered" building of the usual Worcestershire type. The situation of Bewdley was very convenient for the seat of the Court of the Marches and for the residence of the Princes of Wales when they exercised actual jurisdiction over the Principality. It was apparently in the Chapel of Tickenhill Palace, "within the manor of Prince Arthur, situated and being near the town of Bewedelay," not in the chapel of the town itself, that the marriage of the Prince with Katharine of Aragon (by her proxy, Roderic de Puebla) was solemnized. Mr. Burton quotes the account of the ceremonial from Rymer's Fœdera. But it was in the chapel of the town that, nearly three years later, the body of the Prince was received as it passed from Ludlow Castle to its burial in Worcester Cathedral. "It was the foulist could windy and rayney day, and the worst way. Yea in some places fayne to take oxen to draw the chare, so ill was the way," which lay through Cleobury Mortimer, and down the steep slope of the Wyre Forest, to "the Chapell of Beaudley there," where the body "was set in the Quire, therewith such lights as might be in that room." The chapel was only a timber building, but it had three chantries, each with its own priest, and the Mass of Requiem, at which "the Earl of Surry officiated" and large alms to the poor were distributed, could be celebrated with fitting ceremonial. "From Beaudley Sir Richard Croft and Sir William Overdale, Steward and Controller of the Prince's Horse, rode before to Worcester." At this point Mr. Burton's extract from a MS. in the College of Arms breaks off, and it is with some regret that we miss the confirmation or correction of a local tradition which marks, as the route of the funeral train, the quiet country road following the western bank of the Severn, through Ribbesford, Areley Kings, and Redstone (where Layamon "read books"), Astley, Shrawley, Holt, Grimley (where the Prior of Worcester had his country house), and Hallow, across the Severn at Worcester bridge. The alternative route, across Bewdley bridge and along the eastern side of the Severn, was probably then as now a better road, though not so direct.

The Severn Valley Railway, branching from the Oxford and Wolverhampton line at Hartlebury, follows the eastern bank of the river to the boundary of Worcestershire, and its Bewdley station is in Wribbenhall, a hamlet of Kidderminster. Mr. Burton has shown, in a clear and careful argument, that Wribbenhall originally included the site of Bewdley itself, and that the name gave place to the Norman Beau-lieu. In the Domesday Survey "King William holds in demesne Chideminstre, with sixteen berewicks," of which one was Gurbehale, i.e., Wrbehale or Wribbenhall. The Registers of the Priory of Worcester record the gift of Wrubenhale to the Church by one Turstinus, for which afterwards several generations of Mortimer paid rent, and which, in 1388, is described as "the manor of Beaulieu." It is worth notice that among these sixteen berewicks of Chideminstre are also found "Ribeford, and another Ribeford." One of these Dr. Nash supposes to be the place where the parish church of Ribbesford now stands; and it is very probable that the narrow strip of meadow land lying under the rugged forest on the western bank of the Severn may have belonged to the lands on the eastern bank, from which it was most accessible. But the Severn Valley had suffered severely from the Danish inroads; the whole demesne of Kidderminster was waste at the Conquest; and although both in Kidderminster and Ribbesford there had been possessions of the Church of Worcester, the Domesday Survey makes no mention even of a priest. Ribbesford became a parish soon after the Conquest, and has a Norman church; but Wrbehale, west of the Severn, never formed a part of it till, under its name of Bewdley, it was united with Ribbesford by an Act of Henry VI. It had reverted in some way from the Church of Worcester to the Crown, and the manor remained Crown land till its sale in 1870. The present Wribbenhall was never separated from Kidderminster.

The existence of Bewdley as a town dates from the opening of the fifteenth century. Its position was such as to command the navigation of the Severn between Shrewsbury and Gloucester, and its inhabitants had used their advantage. The "Severn trows," of which the name as well as the use has been extinguished by railways, originated in Bewdley, where, in 1412, "certain persons having great boats called trowes had confederated themselves togethor for their singular profit, and would let no one pass through the said parts with their goods and chattels except they would hire the said boats." Thus the citizens of Bristol and Gloucester complained, and, in a Parliament held at Westminster, prayed the King "that they might pass Bewdley without hindrance." The merchants of the Western cities had good cause to complain; for at Bewdley they were held completely in a trap, with no help on either hand nearer than Worcester or Bridgnorth; and the piratical monopolists of Bewdley made them "cut in pieces" their own "great flote in the said river, or else they would cut off their heads." What immediate relief they may have obtained does not appear; but soon afterwards Bewdley obtained the privileges under which it became a civilized and very prosperous market town. The Bishop of Worcester granted indulgences to all the faithful who would contribute to the building of a bridge over the Severn; the very questionable "extra-parochial" relation by which Bewdley was united with the National Church (it had a right of sanctuary out of which a chapel had arisen) was exchanged for the recognized status of a Chapelry of Ribbesford, and a charter of incorporation followed in 1472. Subsequent charters enlarged the privileges of the borough, which under James I. sent a member to Parliament, and had its High Steward and its Recorder. The importance and wealth of Bewdley had increased, while that of Kidderminster had apparently declined. Kidderminster had sent two members to the Parliament of Edward I. in 1295, but had never been again represented till the Reform Act of 1832; and Sir Ralph Clare of Kidderminster sat for Bewdley under James I. and Charles I. In later times the Corporation sold the seat, according to the prevailing practice; but they honestly applied the proceeds to purposes of public improvements, and they "still possess 3,000*l.* derived from this source." This payment must have been made in 1814, as at the election of 1819, when the borough returned a townsman of its own, "the" practice was discontinued."

During the whole of the sixteenth century, and till the time of the Civil Wars, Ticknell Palace was used as a royal residence; but the furniture was sold under the Commonwealth, and the house was left to decay. A considerable trade had been established in the town, which especially was a centre for "cappers," or cap-makers, and in the reign of Elizabeth, and later, for tanners. The carrying trade both by land and river was largely in the hands of the inhabitants, and pack-horse trains conveyed the traffic between the storehouses of Bewdley and the inland towns. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the manufacturing industries of Kidderminster were rapidly developing, and the introduction of canal communication might have largely added to the importance and the trade of Bewdley but for the opposition of the inhabitants to the Staffordshire and Worcestershire Canal. Mr. Burton relates the fact simply; local tradition clothes it in the garb of a Society then wealthily represented in the town:—"Friend, take thy gutter elsewhere; we do not want thy gutter here." The "gutter" was accordingly taken along the course of the Stour from Kidderminster, and the new town of Stourport sprang up, and deprived Bewdley of most of its carrying trade.

Bewdley had been naturally Royalist in its sympathies, while Puritanism was strong in Kidderminster, and the dignified little borough in later times rather looked down upon the weaving town. But Mr. Burton's researches have invested with historical interest the memories of commonplace local fights. Forty or fifty years ago it was held as a point of honour that Kidderminster men, eo nomine, were not to cross Bewdley bridge; and so binding was the spirit of the law that when in 1845, for some local festivity, the workmen of a large Kidderminster firm were invited to cross the Severn by Stourport bridge, a formal message was received that "the Bewdley men would stop them." The challenge was as formally accepted; but the match did not come off because, as the case would now be put, the Bewdley captain "could not get up an eleven"; certainly neither party were aware that an ordinance of Arthur, Prince of Wales, had, by anticipation, forbidden the fight. This curious paper is dated 31 Henry VII. Jan. 9, "att the Citie of Hereford, by the Counsaille of Prince Arthur," and bears the "signett" of the Prince and the signatures of the Bishop of Ely, President, and of other members of the Council. The feud between the two towns would seem to have been even then of long standing, as the ordinance provides "for a finall concord, love, peace, and amytie from hensforth" between them, and for "eschuyng all manner grugge, debats, variances, or discords." And "if hereafter shall happen any new grugg or variance," the inhabitants are not "to justify or avenge their said quarrels," "but alwaies to resort to the said Prince and his Counsell," and "to abide obei and fulfill the direction therein taken."

About twenty years after the death of Prince Arthur, Ticknell was repaired by Henry VIII. as a residence for Princess Mary; and the weekly accounts of workmen employed, which in eighteen weeks amounted to 354*l.* 5*s.* 5½*d.*, show that the establishment of the palace was maintained on a somewhat costly scale. Mr. Burton has been careful to supply details of the domestic and social life of Bewdley and its neighbourhood, and of the connexion of the borough with the Court, by printing copious extracts both from the parochial registers and from the municipal accounts, and has thus furnished additional proofs of the historical value attaching to these local public records. He has added brief notices of several parishes adjacent to Bewdley, including that of Dowles, of which he is rector—a small benefice, once an outlying possession of Malvern Priory, the very existence of which was a source of perplexity to the Shropshire county historian. The Tenbury and Bewdley Railway crosses the Severn at Dowles, after descending through Wyre Forest from Cleobury Mortimer. But to see the picturesque old town to the best advantage, it should be approached, not by railway, but by the Severn-side road from Worcester already mentioned. Turning northward along this road, after crossing Stourport bridge, the visitor should not pass without notice the overhanging churchyard of Areley Kings, with its rude but striking memorial marking the grave and recalling the touching story of a real Harry Coningsby. Mr. Burton and his readers are indebted for an excellent drawing of this "Lithologema"—so its legend runs, and so it is—to the pencil of "Cuthbert Bede," in pledge, perhaps, of the "peace and amytie" now prevailing between Bewdley and Kidderminster; but the author's share in the page containing it has not been as accurate as the artist's. The clerical error which describes Sir Harry Coningsby as "an ancestor of the Earls of Essex" is at once corrected by the context; in the preceding paragraph the monumental inscription "Dedicatum sodali amicissimo" by the childless and lonely Knight should have been copied with more care. Sir Harry survived this friend, the Rector of Astley, about five years, dying in 1701; hardly, we think, "in an illiterate age," as Mr. Burton describes it. But this and a few other oversights which occur in the later pages of the book will be easily corrected in a further issue; and Mr. Burton deserves a wider circulation for his painstaking and valuable work than can be secured by means of a private list of subscribers.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS.*

IT would be difficult to count up all the English versions, entire and partial, in prose and in verse, of the Book of Psalms. It would probably be far from difficult to a literary critic to separate those that have any merit that entitles them to preservation from a presumably much larger number that have none. Under these circumstances, it might be considered unnecessary, if not a positive waste of energy, to offer yet another version, especially at a time when we are looking out for one which will be issued by the august company of Revisers of the Old Testament. But the version just published by one of our ripest and most modern Hebraists, Mr. Cheyne, justifies its existence on every page. It should be acknowledged as a safe principle that, over and above the existing or any future Authorized Version which we use in public worship, we may accept as useful any number of private versions, composed with various intent by persons of varying accomplishments, to give a more poetical hue, a closer imitation of the Hebrew rhythm, a revised text, a different arrangement according to chronology, or some other peculiarity. All these have their use, and it will be an evil day for English Biblical studies when these independent versions are discouraged on the plea that we have excellent public ones in the Bible and Prayer-Book. We cannot refrain from mentioning another consideration, which, though seemingly trivial, not unnaturally influences many in their study of a Biblical book. The separate publication of the Book of Psalms in the "Parchment Library," apart from the rest of the Bible, and in an elegant "get-up" of hand-made paper, excellent typography, parchment cover, and gilt upper edge, obliges the reader to regard it as a collection of ancient Hebrew poetry, and to forget for the time the familiar connexion in which he has always seen it as simply a chapter in that one book, the Bible. This new aspect enables him to appreciate its poetical beauties far more deeply, and, far from breaking, does much to render more intelligible its connexion at various points with other books in that library of old Hebrew literature, the Bible. But the Book of Psalms is, on external as well as internal evidence, an anthology of poems from the whole period of Hebrew Biblical literature down to the age of the Maccabees, and may therefore justly be allowed to appear in a separate volume.

* The Book of Psalms. Translated by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne, M.A. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1884. (Parchment Library.)

When we attempt to estimate the value of this new version, we must first look to the foundation on which it is erected. That it is a direct translation from the Hebrew needs not to be mentioned when Mr. Cheyne is the translator. But there are many modes of dealing with the text of an ancient work preserved from age to age by hand-writing; and the canons of textual criticism generally accepted for one language cannot (at least so far as they rest on common sense, and not on some peculiarity in the writing of that one) be rejected without very special reasons in another. The received text, then, presents cases of obvious corruption—instances where it makes nonsense. We find also tangible proof that the existing text is not free from error, in duplicate but varying copies of the same (as Ps. xiv. and liii., Ps. xviii., and 2 Sam. xxii.) And the existence of such errors was acknowledged by Hebrew commentators of an early age, who have appended notes, k'ri, correcting the text, c'tib. The course to be followed by a modern editor or translator is therefore embarrassed by the same difficulties which make all the difference between an edition of a Greek or Latin author according to the textus vulgaris, or by Bekker, Orelli, or Hermann. On this subject Mr. Cheyne observes:—

> Hebrew scholars can be catholic in their literary tastes, and if they lay it down as a canon of translation that sense should generally take precedence of sound, it is not because they are deaf to the charm of rhythmic melody. Nor ought they, at this hour of the day, to be accused of temerity in deviating from the received Hebrew text. The younger school of Hebrew scholars look upon the textual and exegetical traditions much as the Sanskrit school represented by Mr. Max Müller looks upon the exegetical tradition of Sayana, and earnestly as it deprecates the excesses of some isolated critics, will not pretend to translate that which cannot be translated, simply because the frequent irregularities of Hebrew usage make some current rendering, apart from exegesis, not absolutely inadmissible. The present translator is very conscious of his fallibility; but he prefers to offer in such cases a plausible and worthy rendering, based upon some natural emendation, to airing his grammatical acumen at the expense of propriety and connexion. Rather than do this, indeed, he has sometimes left a blank in his version to indicate that the text is perhaps corrupt, and certainly to the translator unintelligible.

This is a bold and straightforward account of a procedure which ought to commend itself to all persons who know anything of textual criticism. The "blanks" here mentioned will (very naturally) be specially distasteful to those who wish to read or to chant their psalm through without interruption; and others will prefer some other version which shrinks not from these doubtful and difficult passages, because it gives them more for their money. Still, the soundness of Mr. Cheyne's principle ought in the end to be acknowledged. Of course, however, the application of these principles must be attended with difference of opinion. Some good scholars may think that a passage which is to Mr. Cheyne "certainly unintelligible" can be understood without straining or violating grammar, and vice versâ. Thus Hupfeld, who discusses at great length all the conceivable modes of understanding Ps. xvi. 3, in the end decides against them all, and would omit it; but Mr. Cheyne retains it, in a doubtful translation which is obscure in signification.

It is impossible in a review intended for the general reader, and therefore debarred from discussing points of Hebrew grammar, to do more in criticism than to note a few of the more important alterations in sense introduced in the new translation, with an occasional expression of opinion as to their merit. Mr. Cheyne fails to recognize as relative clauses many which we should treat as such. Thus in Ps. i. 2 he writes, "But in the law of Jehovah is his delight, And on his law meditates he day and night"; which we would connect with the preceding verse, translating, "But whose delight is in the law of Jehovah, And who meditates on it day and night." So in xi. 4, for, "Jehovah is in his holy palace, Jehovah's throne is in heaven; his eyes behold, his eyelids try the children of men," we would suggest, "Jehovah, who is in his holy palace, Jehovah, whose throne is in heaven—his eyes behold," &c. And similarly in many other passages—the omission of the relative pronoun being a very frequent feature of Hebrew grammar. In Ps. xvi. 5, "Jehovah is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup; Thou wilt be continually my lot," the violent change from third to second person arouses suspicion, and in fact is only introduced into the translation (which in this point agrees with the A. V.) by the verb is, absent from the original; more natural would be, "Jehovah (thou), the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup, Wilt be continually (?) my lot." While we are finding fault, we cannot omit to express astonishment at Ps. ii. 12, where Mr. Cheyne retains "Kiss the Son." The word bar, here rendered son, is not Hebrew at all in this sense, but belongs to the later language called Chaldee. If it be here used in that sense, we should be compelled to place this psalm, which otherwise bears as antique a character as any, among the latest writings of the Old Testament. But the context forbids it; the subject of the following sentence, "Lest he be angry," is Jehovah, who was spoken of in the preceding verse. There is no son in the psalm except the king of Israel, called a son of Jehovah in v. 7; and not he, but Jehovah himself, can be meant in the remaining words of v. 12. Moreover, we have not "Kiss the son" or "his son," but indefinitely "Kiss a son." None of the ancient versions till we come to the Syriac and Abenezra have this translation at all. The LXX. have δράξασθε παιδείας, the Vulgate apprehendite disciplinam, and so others. It may fairly be pronounced impossible, and meaningless in the context. Hupfeld, who discusses it at length, gives as a possible version "Submit sincerely," addressed to the rebels against the King, but also suggests a happy conjectural emendation of the word that causes the difficulty, bar into bo:—"Attach yourselves to him (the King)." Perhaps we shall get nothing more satisfactory than this. A striking instance of what may be gained by conjectural emendation is found in Ps. xlvi. Sense and symmetry both prove this poem to consist of three stanzas, vv. 1–3, 4–7, 8–11, the two latter stanzas having each three verses, and a refrain "Jehovah Sabâoth is with us; our sure retreat is Jacob's God." The first stanza has the three verses, and wants the refrain. The principle of symmetry entitles us at least to try it. It will be found to serve the purpose of the same argument as in the second stanza, and to be equally necessary here to sense and rhythm; "Let the waters thereof roar and foam; let the mountains quake at the insolence therefore:—Jehovah Sabâoth is with us; our sure retreat is Jacob's God." We regret that Mr. Cheyne has not adopted this emendation. Perhaps the asterisks, indicating an omission, in v. 4 of the same psalm, "* * a river, the arms whereof make glad The city of God," are unnecessary, since "a river, the arms whereof" is equivalent to "the arms of a river."

The problem how to deal with names or epithets of God is one of the most delicate that the translator has to encounter. He, as a scholar, must be averse to simply repeating the phraseology of the Authorized Version; and yet, when he regards his function as producer of a version which may enter the domestic circle as a book of devotion or for chanting, he must be conscious that any considerable innovation in the name by which we address our Creator will appear (and not only to the ignorant) an impertinence which of itself might cause the book to be flung away with abhorrence by some sensitive persons. Mr. Cheyne has steered a prudent middle course. That he would not leave "The LORD" (in capitals) to represent the Hebrew Jehovah, and to be identical in sound with "The Lord" which is the Hebrew Adonai, we might be sure. The fact that Jehovah is as much a proper name as Jupiter is of itself sufficient reason for leaving it unaltered; the only question still open was whether its pronunciation was to be retained as Jehovah, or altered into the form which the Hebraists of the present day, with a great consensus of opinion, believe to be the correct one—Jahveh. If Mr. Cheyne were to write a history or a dissertation, we feel sure that he, like Ewald, Hupfeld, and the modern school generally at least in Germany, would write the latter. But he has retained "Jehovah" in a book of devotions, and we think wisely. Similarly he has left the term Shaddai untranslated in Ps. lxviii. 14, and yet has rendered it "the Almighty" in xci. 1. There is also an unfortunate want of consistency in Ps. lxxxix. 8, Jehovah God of hosts, and Ps. lxxx. 4, 19, Jehovah Sabâoth. In the expression Jehovah Adonai, Ps. ci. 21, the latter word might surely have been rendered "the Lord," as it is when standing alone. It is perhaps inevitable that the single English word God should cover the two Hebrew words, Elohim and El.

It is unnecessary to enumerate many passages in which we find ourselves thoroughly in accord with Mr. Cheyne, since we give a general assent to his version; but a few points may be noted. The important and frequent word hasid, derived from a root denoting love, is used specially in a religious sense, interpreted, however, by some actively as "loving God," by others passively as "beloved by God." Mr. Cheyne understands it, rightly, we believe, in the former sense, and translates xvi. 10, "neither wilt thou suffer thy loving one to see the pit," and xii. 1, "Save, Jehovah, for the man of love is no more." Ps. lxxi. 7 is in the Authorized Version as "Their eyes stand out with fatness; they have more than heart could wish." Mr. Cheyne, altering a single letter which restores the reading used by the LXX. and Vulgate, obtains this:—"Out of the caul (i.e. the heart) their iniquity cometh forth: the imaginations of their heart overflow," which justifies itself by the parallelism of caul and heart in this verse, and that of iniquity and imaginations of this verse with pride and violence in the preceding one. An equally happy correction is effected in Ps. xci. 1, 2 (by the restoration of an initial word and altered punctuation of the first word in v. 2, both adopted by Hupfeld), which is rendered:—"[Happy] he that sits in the covert of the most High, that abides under the shadow of the Almighty, That says unto Jehovah, My refuge and my fortress, my God, in whom I trust." In Ps. civ. 2, "He wraps himself in light . . ., he stretches out the heavens" (the third person for the second), no alteration of the Hebrew text is made, and the new translation agrees with the following verses; in v. 5 "He founded the earth upon its bases" is literal, for the faulty "Who laid the foundations of the earth." In Ps. xi. 7, besides the necessary correction of the ungrammatical "For the righteous LORD loveth righteousness" into "For Jehovah is righteous, he loves righteous acts," Mr. Cheyne alters the second clause, "His countenance doth behold the upright," into "The upright shall behold his countenance." After these special criticisms, it behoves us to show how one of the Psalms sounds in Mr. Cheyne's version:—

Be not thou incensed at the evildoers, neither be thou envious against them that work injustice;
For they shall quickly fade away as the grass, and wither even as the green herb.

Trust thou in Jehovah, and do that which is good,
inhabit the land, and cherish faithfulness;
Then shalt thou have sweet pleasure in Jehovah, and he shall grant thee thy heart's petitions.

Roll thy career upon Jehovah, trust in him, and he shall do nobly,
And shall bring forth thine innocence as flic light, and thy just right as the noonday.

Be resigned to Jehovah, and wait on for him;
be not incensed at one whose career prospers,
at the man who brings to pass knaveries.

Cease from anger, and forsake wrath,
be not incensed—it would lead only to evildoing;
For evildoers shall be cut off, but they that await Jehovah—those shall inherit the land.

It remains to be noticed that Mr. Cheyne goes a step further than the Authorized Version in discrediting the titles of the Psalms. In Hebrew Bibles they are printed and numbered as if they belonged to the Psalm itself. The English Bible retains them, but as headings only, in smaller type, and not numbered as belonging to the Psalm. Mr. Cheyne discards them altogether, which is doubtless the best course in a book intended for popular use. His introduction is crammed full of learning, and yet written in a charming style; the examples of poems of the same general character from Assyria and Babylonia being especially interesting. The notes at the end are terse and to the point. The only serious want in an edition which adopts alterations of the text is an apparatus criticus. Without this the scholar can only guess what text the translator adopts; where he reads a new sense into the old words, and where he alters it conjecturally; what his reasons are for discarding the words which he rejects and indicates by asterisks. We suppose these additions were against the rules of the "Parchment Library." If so, it was a sufficient reason against publishing in that collection a book that required them.

THE ORR-EWING CASE.—NEW LAW BOOKS.*

THE "Orr-Ewing case" illustrates the difficulty of uniting separate kingdoms. Mr. Spens, or perhaps we ought to say Sheriff-Substitute Spens, treats of it in a book consisting of two parts. The first is a history of the case as far as it has at present gone, with copious extracts from the many judgments delivered in the English and Scotch courts, and is most convenient and interesting. The second is a statement of the author's views about it, and has the double merit of being at once intelligible and violently one-sided. The reader is confronted at the outset by a somewhat complicated array of facts, and when he has mastered these, he has to deal with such terrifying Scotticisms as "commissariot," "condescendence," "furth," and "multiplepoinding." Whether to this list we should add "recated" and "executry," or whether these expressions merely indicate that Scotch printers are not too human to err, we will not hazard a conjecture. But the story is not really so intricate as it looks.

The late Mr. John Orr-Ewing died in April 1878, leaving in round figures 460,000*l.* worth of personal property. Of this 435,000*l.* was situated in Scotland, and the balance of 25,000*l.* in England. He left it substantially all to trustees, in trust for five young men who were the sons of one of his brothers. Pending the ultimate distribution of the money, the trustees disposed of nearly all the English property, and removed the proceeds into Scotland, so that when the first, or English, action was begun, there was in England no more than 2,700*l.*, and, while that action was going on, this amount, too, was transferred to Scotland. After an abortive proceeding not material to the merits of the present question, the youngest of the five legatees, who was then under age, began an action in the Chancery Division in England, in which the trustees were the defendants, to have the estate administered. The trustees defended the action, and contended, in the first place, that the Court had no jurisdiction over that part of the property which was in Scotland; and, in the second place, that if it had, it was a discretionary jurisdiction, which, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, ought not to be exercised. On the first of these questions Mr. Justice Manisty, sitting for Mr. Justice Chitty, held that he had jurisdiction; and upon the second he held that he had discretion in the matter, and that, since the property was practically all in Scotland, it would be more convenient that it should be administered there, according to Scotch law. He therefore dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed, and the case was heard in the Court of Appeal before the late Master of the Rolls and Lord Justices Cotton and Lindley, who unanimously reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Manisty, and decreed that the estate should be administered in the Chancery Division. The trustees appealed to the House of Lords, and their appeal was dismissed by a Court consisting of the Lord Chancellor and Lords Blackburn and Watson, both of whom, be it observed, are Scotchmen, while the last mentioned is not only a Scotchman, but a Scotch lawyer. The ground of these judgments was shortly as follows:—The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and therefore of the Chancery Division, has always been a jurisdiction not in rem, but in personam. Therefore the Court has jurisdiction over any one who appears and defends an action before it, whatever may be his domicile, and wherever the property in respect of which he is sued may be situated, and will exercise it whenever it has, by reason of his presence in England or otherwise, the means of enforcing its judgments. The only question, therefore, to be decided—it not being disputed that, from the point of view of the plaintiff, it was for his advantage that the estate should be administered in England—was whether the plaintiff had an absolute right to such administration, or whether the Court had, and chose to exercise, a discretion in the matter. Upon this question the opinion of all six Judges in the Court of Appeal and House of Lords was expressed by the Lord Chancellor in the following terms:—

> I cannot agree that, under the circumstances of this case, the Court had such a discretion. When a suit is brought in foro competenti, by a proper plaintiff, against defendants properly amenable to the jurisdiction, praying for relief to which, by the ordinary course of the lex fori, the plaintiff is entitled, it would be error to deny him such relief, unless for some reason sufficient in law.

Before this judgment was delivered by the House of Lords another action had been begun in Scotland. In this action the trustees were the defenders, and the pursuers were the four elder brothers and co-legatees of the English plaintiff. They claimed that the trustees should be forbidden to obey the decree of the Chancery Division, or to remove any of the property or title-deeds to it "furth" of Scotland and Scotch jurisdiction; or, alternatively, that they should be removed from their office of trustees, the property sequestrated, and a "judicial factor" appointed to administer the estate in accordance with Scotch law. This action was tried before Lord Fraser, who delivered, shortly after the decision of the House of Lords in the English case, an exceedingly bellicose judgment in favour of the pursuers. He relied on the surprising assertion that it was "necessary precisely to see how this matter is dealt with, as a point of international law, in other countries than in England, by the Courts of civilized nations. It is perfectly clear that, if the practice of the Court of Chancery in England is inconsistent with international law, no Court of a foreign country is bound to respect it." He qualified the admission that certain "convenient arrangements" had been made for enforcing in Scotland and England judgments delivered in England and Scotland respectively by the boast that "the suggestion of" them "came from Scottish lawyers." He relied on the provision of the Act of Union "that no causes in Scotland be cognoscible by the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or any other Court in Westminster Hall"; and, finally, hurling defiance at the judicature of South Britain, made the order asked for by the pursuers. The unhappy trustees, ordered to administer by the House of Lords, and not to administer by Lord Fraser, appealed from the judgment of the latter to the First Division of the Court of Session, which exalted tribunal gave judgment at great length on the 29th of February of the present year. The Lord President, like Lord Fraser, was disposed to gird at the Southron. He pointed out that the Scotch substitute for administration suits was much more convenient, and that the English practice had no precise counterpart north of the Tweed, observing, "I trust I do not exceed the true limits of a judicial utterance when I add that it is very fortunate for the people of Scotland that it is so." The judgments of the First Division proceeded principally upon the article of the Union already quoted, and upon the case of Preston v. Melville, in which Lord Cottenham held that "the administration must be in the country in which possession is taken and held, under lawful authority, of the property of the deceased." It is to be observed, however, that in that case the property the administration of which was in dispute was situated in England, and the point actually decided was not that Scotch property must be administered in Scotland, but that English property must be administered in England. The Judges in the First Division did not dispute that the decision of the House of Lords in the English action might be correct according to English law; but they held that, whatever the English law might be, the Scotch law was that this particular property must be administered in Scotland, and they expressed the opinion that if their judgment was appealed from to the House of Lords, the House of Lords, sitting to decide a question of Scotch law, would have to affirm their decision, and would thus be in the anomalous position of having pronounced two contrary judgments about the administration of the same property. They therefore ordered that the property should be sequestered, the trustees removed from their office, and a judicial factor appointed to administer the estate. Thus far Mr. Spens. Since the publication of his book the matter has again come before Mr. Justice Chitty, and he, recognizing the probability of the Scotch Court being right in its interpretation of Scotch law, and the possibility of their judgment being affirmed by the House of Lords acting as the Supreme Court of Appeal for Scotland, has ordered a stay of proceedings in the English action, until the defenders in the Scotch action shall have had their appeal to the House of Lords tried.

Mr. Spens, being strongly of the same opinion as the Judges of the First Division, loudly asserts that it is the English law which requires reform, and that the pretensions of the Chancery Division are oppressive to Scotchmen, and contrary to the spirit of the Act of Union. He likewise affirms, we imagine with more ardour than accuracy, that the practice of serving English writs in Scotland, which he declares to be due to the unconstitutional use by English Judges of the powers of making rules given to them by the Judicature Acts, is productive of the most grievous wrongs, and he expresses a hope that all these matters may be speedily set right by legislation emphasizing the distinction between the different systems of the two countries. More might be said as to the inconvenient and retrograde character of such measures than we have space to enlarge upon at present; but anyhow to us "it humbly appears," as the Scotch judges have an odd trick of saying, that Mr. Spens is quite right in his remark that "the next stage of this extraordinary case will be regarded with unusual interest by Englishmen as well as Scotchmen."

Mr. Richard Lowndes has published a most interesting and valuable account of Insurable Interest and Valuations. It was conceived, as the author tells us with a naïveté of style remarkable in a man who is admittedly one of the highest authorities in the kingdom on the subject, with the view of affording instruction and practical suggestions to the members of the House of Commons who will have to deal with Mr. Chamberlain's Merchant Shipping Bill. Mr. Lowndes is very keenly alive to the moral and social dangers of over-insurance, and is, on the whole, much more favourable to Mr. Chamberlain's project than Parliament has hitherto shown itself likely to be. He expresses his general view of the question with admirable clearness and moderation in his Introduction and Conclusion, the intermediate chapters tracing the history of insurance law from its invention in the middle ages, through its introduction into England, down to the present time. For so small a volume the book is wonderfully complete, and we can heartily commend it to all who desire a thorough acquaintance with the rudiments of a most important controversy.

The existence of a third edition of a law book only seven years old is, of course, its own excuse; but it appears to us that if the authors of Messrs. Harris & Agabeg's Principles of the Criminal Law were required to find any other, they might have some difficulty in doing so. The arrangement adopted is nearly the same as that of Mr. Justice Stephen's Digest of the Criminal Law. It is about twice as long as that well-known work, the paragraphs being written with popular looseness of expression, instead of with scientific accuracy, and the examples being left out. It is said to be intended for "students, especially those preparing for the final examination of the Incorporated Law Society," and we daresay it answers the purpose very well.

Mr. T. Cyprian Williams traverses a well-trodden field in presenting to the reader the text of all the Acts affecting conveyancing, from the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, together with much comment, the Rules of Court under the Acts in question, and a reasonable number of forms and precedents. The book is rather big, and the language in places rather fine, as the following example, taken at random, will show:—"From what has been said, it will be seen that the exact meaning of the above section is not likely to be elucidated without judicial struggling. And when reason shall be in travail of the construction of this enactment, who shall say what meaning will be born?"

From an exceptionally formidable title-page we gather principally that Mr. C. L. Samson obtained the Stephen Heelis Gold Medal in 1874, and wrote the ninth or tenth book on the new Bankruptcy Act that has come under our notice ten years later. In the latter task he has been materially assisted by Messrs. H. P. Jones and Arthur Newman, solicitors, of Manchester, and the triumvirate, what with Rules, and a list of the County Courts, and the text of the Debtors' Act, 1869, have produced a very voluminous edition of the Act indeed. This is all the more praiseworthy because they have omitted the usual historical introduction. The notes are full, and the words of decided cases are quoted with commendable frequency.

We are glad to notice that Mr. Cripps's useful and well-written book on the Law of Compensation—an inconspicuous but important branch of our judicature—has reached a second edition.

Mr. Alfred Emden has published another of his convenient little books of the primer kind. This time his subject is the legal position of shareholders, and he treats it as clearly and judiciously as his previous works would lead us to expect. It is very well printed, which is an important matter in a book of this kind. It does not appear to be designed as a treatise for professional use, as authorities are never quoted, but as a handbook for laymen (granting that such a thing is legitimate at all) it will probably be found extremely serviceable.

Of a similar kind is Mr. Beal's Practical Guide to Administration Orders under Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It consists wholly of the collation from other sources of a few rules and forms with the section in question, and probably enjoys the distinction of being the smallest law book extant.

HISTORY OF THE INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.*

It has been said by no less learned and distinguished a Roman Catholic scholar than Lord Acton, in the article with which he closed the Home and Foreign Review, after it had been indirectly censured in a Brief of Pius IX., that "one of the great instruments for preventing historical scrutiny has long been the Index of prohibited books, which was accordingly directed, not against falsehood only, but particularly against certain departments of truth." He adds that it had been used "to keep the knowledge of ecclesiastical history from the faithful, and to give currency to a fabulous and fictitious picture of the progress and action of the Church"; but that this scheme could only have succeeded, even partially and for a time, in an age when every party virtually had its own prohibitive Index to brand inconvenient truths, and none cared for knowledge which could not be made available for argument. The same causes which explain the existence and partial success of the Index will help to explain the curious circumstance that, up to our own day, no tolerably adequate and impartial history of it has appeared. There was indeed one published at Rome in the last century by the Jesuit Zaccaria, which however is not a history but an apology. And a work appeared about fifty years ago by an English clergyman, the Rev. J. Mendham, which is correct in the main as far as it goes, but is too superficial, and too much filled out with the conventional No Popery padding of his day, to be a satisfactory or convenient authority. As a rule Roman Catholic writers have been shy of entering on the discussion of a confessedly ticklish subject, and Protestants have been too contemptuous or too ill-informed about the details to discuss it to much purpose. A very great obligation therefore has been conferred on the literary world in general, and especially on students of ecclesiastical history and divines, by the publication of the exhaustive and lucid work on the subject, the first volume of which is now before us. Dr. Reusch, one of the most learned, temperate, and widely respected of the German Catholic professors who joined the Old Catholic movement after the Vatican Council, is already well known to scholars by some able works in defence of Revelation. He is a man singularly free from any infection of the odium theologicum, and if he has felt bound in conscience to renounce his allegiance to Rome, he has neither taken up his parable against her, nor has he in other respects renounced his allegiance to what he in common with Rome regards as the Catholic faith. He is thus exceptionally fitted, as well by his studies as his antecedents, to deal with the history of the Index, without prejudice or passion, and he has shed upon it the "dry light" of an ample knowledge based on minute and laborious research. To attempt anything like a complete examination of the volume already issued, which comprises more than 600 closely-printed pages, would obviously be within our present limits impossible, but we may give our readers some idea of the salient points and main drift of the inquiry, which may lead such of them as are so minded to make further acquaintance with it for themselves. It seems strange that so little information should have been supplied on this subject by writers who, one might have supposed, would find it lie directly in their way. Thus Hallam says very little about it, though he observes that "Rome struck a fatal blow, and perhaps more deadly than she intended, at literature in the Index Expurgatorius of prohibited books." And Ranke barely notices it in his History of the Popes, though he handles separately the reigns of each of the four pontiffs who, as will presently appear, had the chief hand in its establishment and organization.

In a brief introduction Dr. Reusch gives us a comprehensive synopsis of the subject matter of this volume. There have been four principal editions of the Roman Index, the first of which was issued under Paul IV. in 1559; the second, often called the "Tridentine Index," because prepared by a Commission appointed at the Council of Trent, was published under Pius V. in 1564; the third was prepared and printed in 1590, under direction of Sixtus V., but never formally published, owing to his death in that year, and its suppression by his successors; the fourth, based largely on that of Sixtus, was published in 1596 by Clement VIII. Of this last there have been some forty editions since, with occasional changes, the principal of which are those of Alexander VII. in 1664, and Benedict XIV. in 1758. But in the few years preceding the issue of the first Roman Index by Paul IV. several local "catalogues" of prohibited books had been put forth, as e.g. by the Sorbonne, by the University of Louvain, at Venice, at Milan, and in England under Henry VIII. It may be observed that by the second rule of the Roman Index all writings by heretical (i.e. Protestant) authors on religious subjects are ipso facto forbidden; but many Protestant works not professedly on religious subjects and many works by Roman Catholic authors have from time to time been placed on the Index. It is Dr. Reusch's object to ascertain the principle on which these prohibitions are based, and the result they have produced; and he notes generally that during the sixteenth century the main object of the Index was to combat the Protestant Reformation, and in the subsequent period, which may be illustrated by the edition of Benedict XIV., to suppress heterodox or suspected teaching within the pale of the Church. The earlier editions include most of the books censured, during the middle ages, before the invention of printing, and the establishment of any regular Index, which followed upon it. For it must be remembered that this method of suppressing views held to be dangerous is not only not of Papal but—as Dr. Reusch might have added—not even of Christian origin. Diocletian made it a special object to burn the Christian Scriptures, and Julian sought to attain the same end by withholding from Christians the means of instruction which might enable them to propagate their belief. The early Councils of the Church condemned heterodox books, after which the Emperor destroyed them. Pope Leo I. himself burnt heretical books, but it is curious that the first instance of a General Council ordering books to be burnt is that of the Third Council of Constantinople in 681, which ordered the Monothelite Letters of Pope Honorius to be burnt. There were various heterodox writings condemned by mediæval Synods and popes, but it is noteworthy that, up to the end of the twelfth century, no restriction was placed on reading vernacular translations of the Bible. In the thirteenth century some French local Synods made regulations on the subject, and in England two centuries later Wycliff's version was forbidden; in Spain from the thirteenth century all translations were forbidden, not by ecclesiastical but royal authority. We may so far anticipate as to add here that in 1530 a proclamation of Henry VIII. forbade the reading of the Bible in English without special license, but in 1536 a copy of Coverdale's translation was ordered by Cromwell, the Vicar-General, to be placed in every church. In France translations of the New Testament and the Psalter appeared under episcopal sanction early in the sixteenth century, and a century later Veron and Billuart declared that everybody was at liberty to read the Bible throughout France, Germany, and Holland, and that many bishops recommended it. Meanwhile the Talmud and other Jewish writings were forbidden in the later middle ages, and in the sixteenth century Hoestrat, a Cologne inquisitor, backed by the Mendicant Order and the University of Paris, wished to destroy all Jewish literature except the Old Testament, which led to a vehement protest from Reuchlin, and stirred up a brisk controversy in Germany.

And now, passing over for want of space many previous local ordinances—academical, episcopal, royal, and parliamentary—on the sale and reading of heterodox books, we may note the organization, by a Bull of Paul III., in 1542, of the Roman Inquisition, as a tribunal independent of the bishops for the suppression of heresy and heretical literature, which was vigorously enforced by himself and his successors. But the first Italian list of prohibited books which can be called an Index was issued in 1545 by the Senate of Lucca, under the influence of the Roman Inquisition. It was not till fifteen years later that Paul IV. published in 1559, during the second suspension of the sittings of the Council of Trent, the first Papal Index, in a Bull which opens with the startling announcement that "many of the regular clergy, who thought they could combat the Lutheran and other heretics of the day by studying their works, have so devoted themselves to this study as to have fallen themselves into the errors of the heretics." And accordingly all previous permissions to read their works were cancelled, except in the case of the Inquisitors General and Cardinals expressly authorized by the Pope. The Index itself is alphabetical and adopts a threefold classification, followed in all later editions, of works avowedly heretical, which are absolutely and ipso facto forbidden; works shown by experience to be dangerous, whether for their heterodoxy, or on other grounds, as, e.g. books on astrology and the like; and lastly anonymous works, mostly by heretics, containing mischievous doctrines. This Index, as being the first of the kind which had appeared, naturally attracted very general notice throughout Europe, and in many quarters, on account of its contents, excited great surprise. It was remarked, as Spondanus says, that unlike previous edicts on the subject, it prohibited works not dealing with religious questions at all, works by Catholic writers, and works condemned simply because the printers were suspected. The books ordered to be given up to the inquisitors were generally burnt, though this is not expressly enjoined, but even in Rome it was found impossible to carry out the decree in all its strictness. The second Papal Index, issued by Pius IV. in 1564, is in fact a republication, with some omissions and additions, of the first, and is only called the Tridentine Index because—like the Tridentine Catechism—it was drawn up by a Commission appointed for that purpose at the Council, though not issued till after its dissolution. The chief novelty is the condition, appended for the first time to the censure of several books, of "donec corrigatur," or some equivalent formula. Ten rules however are laid down, generally modifications of previous enactments of Paul IV., which still remain in force, where the Index is received. Of these the most important are, that all original works of heresiarchs are absolutely forbidden; that reading of the Bible in the vernacular is forbidden without express license, which may be obtained from bishops, inquisitors, or confessors, and the same rule applies to all vernacular works or controversies of the day between Catholics and Protestants; that all obscene works are absolutely forbidden, an exception being made in favour of the Pagan classics on account of their elegance of style, but they are never to be used (i.e. these portions of them, such as Martial's Epigrams, &c.) in the education of youth; that all works on astrology, necromancy, and the like are forbidden. It may be added that since the time of Paul IV. Machiavelli's works have been on the Index, and cannot be read without a special license, and that the only book indexed by Paul IV. with the qualification, afterwards so common, of "donec corrigatur" is Boccaccio's Decameron. It was expurgated by a Commission at Rome of the passages held offensive to religion, but not of its obscenities. It is further worth noting that the Consilium de Emendanda Ecclesia, published by a Commission of Cardinals under Paul IV., and including Contarini, Pole, and Sadolet among its members, was on the Index till 1758, when the qualification was added, "cum notis vel prefationibus hæreticorum," but as there is no edition without those appendages, the prohibition remains in force. We may further observe—what bears out Lord Acton's remark, quoted just now—that since the end of the sixteenth century the number of Roman Catholic works on the Index has been largely multiplied. In 1571 Pius V. established a special Congregation of the Index, consisting of four Cardinals and nine Consultors, and this arrangement was confirmed by Gregory XIII., Sixtus V., and Clement VIII. We must pass over our author's detailed and very interesting report of the strange and disgraceful episode of the persecution of Archbishop Carranza, primate of Spain, for heresy, which however is well worthy of careful study for more reasons than one. It shows plainly how little the most saintly life, an unimpeachable zeal for Catholic orthodoxy, and the distinct recognition of it by Popes and by the Council of Trent, could guarantee the victim of base religious animosities against cruel and lifelong ill treatment.

In 1588 Sixtus V. charged the Congregation of the Index with the preparation of a new edition, which was printed in 1590, but —like his edition of the Vulgate—only just before his death, and was withdrawn, like the Vulgate, in a Brief of Clement VIII. so worded as to conceal the fact that they had actually been completed and ready for publication. The truth is that Sixtus had in both cases gone beyond the recommendations of the Commissions, and had inter alia placed Bellarmine's works on the Index, partly from his dislike to the Jesuits, but chiefly from his very exalted notion of the temporal prerogatives of his See, which Bellarmine did not sufficiently uphold. But in substance the Index of Sixtus formed the basis of that of Clement VIII., as it had itself been based on the Index of Paul IV. Sixtus had substituted for the ten Tridentine rules 22 new ones of his own, and many of these were adopted by Clement VIII., who restored the original ten, in the shape of appended Observationes. He included in his "first class" twice as many names as Pius IV., and among them were many of quite insignificant writers, and some of zealous Catholics. The fourth and last chief edition of the Index, issued by Clement VIII. in 1596, was prepared under the auspices of Bellarmine, as "Consultor of the Congregation," and—it is needless to add—does not include his own works. Its most distinctive feature is a new instruction to bishops and inquisitors on the treatment of forbidden books. This is the last Papal Index noticed in the present volume. But Dr. Reusch calls attention before concluding to "the Protestant censorship of the sixteenth century," which chiefly differs from the Roman Index in this respect, that from the want of any uniform organization it could not formally denounce the possession or perusal of forbidden books as a mortal sin, or visit it with excommunication. He refers to the censorship exercised—through the instrumentality of Universities, Theological Faculties, Consistories, or Censors specially appointed—by the civil power in Germany, Switzerland, and Holland. He might have added that in England Convocation censured heretical publications and the Star Chamber suppressed them, while under Elizabeth no printing-presses were allowed except in London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and no "Popish books" could be imported from the Continent without the permission of the Council. In conclusion, while fully admitting the potent influence of the Index in restraining the dissemination of heterodox or otherwise objectionable works, Dr. Reusch points out some important deductions which have to be made from any benefit, or supposed benefit, thence accruing to the Church. In the first place, the authority of these restrictions was from the first virtually circumscribed within the limits of those countries under the control of the Inquisition, and was elsewhere very generally ignored. And in the next place, where its influence did extend, we must remember, judging "from a strictly Catholic standpoint," the very serious attendant drawbacks, of which the author enumerates these six. Both the popular reading of the Bible, and the scientific study of Scripture and the Fathers by scholars, was greatly impeded. So also was scientific culture of all kinds, and the study of foreign literature. Pallavicino again allows that the fear of censorship acted as a serious check on Catholic authorship altogether. And lastly the prohibition of perfectly orthodox works, which did not harmonize with the views dominant just then at Rome, tended of course—as was designed—to manipulate the Roman view of things into the sententia communis; "a result which those alone will consider beneficial, whose ideal is the identification of unity of faith with regimental uniformity of theological opinion, and who wish to transform the Catholic into the Roman Church." That the gravest evils have actually followed from all these causes—notably, we should be disposed to say, from the second, the fifth, and the sixth—is matter not of opinion but of history, abundantly capable of verification. We shall look with great interest for the appearance of Dr. Reusch's second volume. Meanwhile we may observe that he has adopted a judicious division of the letterpress into large and small print; those who wish only to obtain a general view of the subject may, as a rule—there are some exceptions to it—confine their attention to the portions printed in larger type; for students, who wish to gain a thorough mastery of it, the paragraphs in small print, which usually contain a detailed notice of all the principal works indexed, and the grounds of censuring them, will be invaluable. The amount of careful and conscientious labour represented by such a compilation must be simply enormous. The author is emphatically—to use a phrase of Cardinal Newman's—"a man of facts, as a German should be." In his preface, while recording other obligations, he makes special acknowledgment of the assistance, as well by oral suggestion as in many other ways, received from his "highly revered teacher, Döllinger," and above all for having had placed at his disposal the Collectanea which Döllinger had himself prepared for a history of the Index.

ARTISTS' HOMES.*

IT must constantly happen to an architect to have to present to the world as his own conception buildings which are in reality the result of compromise with the taste of obstinate clients. A particular interest therefore attaches itself to designs made by them either for their own habitations or for those of brother artists, with whom it may be presumed that they agree. In the charmingly got-up book before us we have a series of such houses by several of the most prominent living architects, as well as specimens of the work of the late Mr. Burges and the late Mr. Street. The book has been arranged with a view to giving pretty pictures of pretty buildings, but also to be of some practical value. Plans and sections form part of many of the plates, and in some cases the details of the more interesting portions are added. As might be expected, the work represents houses of many styles, a large number of which are grouped along the road recently made celebrated by the residence in it of the late King Cetewayo. Here we have Mr. Burges's magnificent attempt to combine the thirteenth century and the nineteenth century, as well as some very interesting varieties of the Dutch Renaissance. The façade of Mr. Marcus Stone's house, designed by Mr. Norman Shaw, carries us back a little earlier in spirit. The three projecting bays under the three gables, with the heavy cornice running along round the top, has a pleasing flavour of the true Jacobean style. Inside the planning is perhaps too ingenious. Mr. Colin Hunter's house, by Mr. J. J. Stevenson, is most satisfactory, giving a picturesque front which is at the same time both quiet and natural. Sir Frederick Leighton's house, the work of Mr. Aitchison, is heavy outside, and the brick is of a bad colour; internally, however, it is completely redeemed by the cleverly-arranged corridor and Arab Hall, surrounded with Persian tiles of rich colours. The house which Mr. Webb has built for Mr. Prinsep is a good example of how much may be done, even with the simplest materials, by the clever arrangement of masses. The two examples of Mr. Champneys's work, his own house and that of Mr. Holiday, deserve careful study. He has the art of giving pleasing effects by symmetrical grouping, and his use of the Queen Anne style has a very delightful English flavour about it. The set of drawings, however, which will perhaps attract most attention is that of the late Mr. Street's house, one of them being the facsimile of a pencil sketch of his own. These drawings speak for themselves, and fully bear out the great architect's reputation.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

A FATALITY seems to attend the autobiographies of celebrated personages. George Sand and Daniel Stern break off just as the reader begins to really wish them to go on. But no autobiographer has been so unlucky as Heine (1), who, beginning to write his reminiscences at an age when few men have anything to record, keeping autobiography before him as one main purpose of his life, and actually achieving four bulky volumes, ends, if his present editor may be trusted, by bequeathing to posterity the pretty but insignificant fragment now first published, and a single section of his suppressed work, treating mainly of the life of an adversary. The brilliant, if bitterly unjust, disquisition on Börne was, we now learn, an excerpt from Heine's memoirs; and from this the world can form some idea what it has lost in them. We assume that Herr Engel, the editor of the fragment now published, is justified in accepting the positive assertion of M. Zulia, through whose instrumentality it at length sees the light, that it was written to replace a much more important autobiography destroyed by the writer. Against this is to be set the equally positive assertion of Gustav Heine, surviving brother of the poet, that he is himself in possession of the memoirs in question. We must concur with Herr Engel in considering this allegation as of very little weight against the unquestionable fact that Gustav Heine has neither published these documents nor shown them to anybody, and one to be charitably explained by a confusion in his mind between memoirs and correspondence. If he really has the papers, or proofs of their existence, Herr Engel's strictures can hardly fail to evoke them. It is, indeed, true that the whole Heine family seem to have been possessed by a mania for suppressing their illustrious relative. Carl Heine, the cousin, like Sir Timothy Shelley, only allowed the widow a pension on condition that she abstained from biography. Maximilian Heine, another brother, got hold for an hour of the memoirs now printed, and treated them as Jehoiakin treated the roll of Baruch. Hence a hiatus valde deflendus near the beginning. The motive seems to have been concealment of the fact that Heine's ancestors were Jews with no pretence to rank or station; and it is perhaps just possible that Gustav Heine may have preferred the keeping up of a fiction which never deceived anybody to the substantial advantages which he would have derived from the publication of his brother's autobiography. The supplementary fragment now published was written in 1854. It treats entirely of the writer's early life, ceasing with his first flirtations with the pretty Josepha, the executioner's daughter, who evidently inspired not a few passages in his works. A basis of reality unquestionably forms the groundwork of this highly poetical idyl, as also of the other more romantic episodes of the memoir, such as the boy's investigations in the old family lumber-room and the note-book of his adventurous great-uncle, who appears to have exercised a great and abiding influence on the youth's imagination. "Many sympathies and antipathies," he says, "many actions even, little in accordance with my customary way of thinking, I explain by referring them to that dreamy time when I was my own great-uncle." There is probably, nevertheless, quite as much Dichtung as Wahrheit in these reminiscences. To judge by some fragments of the destroyed memoirs accidentally preserved and published here, they agreed substantially with the latter, but are considerably condensed, which may be no disadvantage. The volume is eked out by several other waifs and strays, of no particular value, except the letters from the poet's sick-bed to his friends Mme. Jaubert and Camilla Selden. The latter, the German original being at present unattainable, are retranslated from a French version. Brief as they are, often mere billets of half a dozen lines, they produce all the effect of much more elaborate letters, so charged are they with intense contrasts of feeling, vividly exhibited in a restricted space. They may be compared with Keats's letters to Fanny Brawne, but the general impression, if not less pitiable, is much less tragical.

The late Bishop Gobat (2), "S. Angl. Hierosol.," is remembered principally as a somewhat anomalous member of the episcopacy, condemned, whether by the fault of circumstances or his own, to enact a not particularly dignified figure. His biography, which is partly an autobiography, seasonably reminds us that he was a man of two lives, and that the activity of his earlier life contrasts favourably with the enforced sterility of his latter days. Unlike many others, he gains by being his own historian, for his account of himself proves at least that he was a man of character. The character indeed was not of an extraordinary type, being that of the pious, devoted, intensely narrow and but slightly cultivated missionary who was so common a personage fifty years ago, but whom the culture now required even of missionaries is gradually exterminating. In the middle ages he might have been a saint, for he not only approved himself a zealous missionary, but encountered supernatural enemies like another St. Dunstan, though with weapons less material. Three evil spirits, "whose substance was, as it were, a spider's web," endeavoured to hinder his conversion; and in Paris he had a sharp altercation with the Prince of Darkness himself, who seems to have taken an unhandsome advantage of Gobat's Christian feeling towards him. These hallucinations fortunately wore off before his entry upon active mission work in 1826. The most distinguished part of his life was his Abyssinian mission, from 1829 to 1832, and his second visit to the country, from 1835 to 1837. The purpose of the latter was frustrated by a lingering illness, which at length compelled him to return to Europe. It is impossible to read without sympathy of his hardships and sufferings, and if the immediate results of the mission were not very considerable, it added to our knowledge of the country, and gave a stimulus to the education of Abyssinian and Galla youth. Bishop Gobat's account of himself is always entertaining; the latter part of his life, unfortunately, has fallen into the hands of a biographer whose powers are unequal to the certainly difficult task of enlivening the dull annals of the Jerusalem Bishopric during his episcopate. The monotonous tale is chequered only by divers scandals for which we should be sorry to hold the Bishop responsible, and which are best consigned to oblivion.

The recent considerable accessions to the documentary archives of the Peasants' War in South-West Germany have induced Dr. Hartfelder (3) to write its history as respects Alsace and the adjoining districts, Swabia having been undertaken by another historian. It is a confused story at the best, a general mêlée with few actions or personages of exceptional interest, and more important as a symptom of the diseases of the European body politic of the time than for any effect produced in the way of amendment. There was abundance of blood-shedding, but the patient was not relieved. Dr. Hartfelder treats it lucidly and intelligently, and has made the action as easy to follow as the lack of dramatic unity will allow.

The conquest of Hanover has opened the archives of the House of Guelph to Prussia, which seems to have found not a few documents interesting in connexion with her own history. A specimen is afforded by a little publication of Dr. Ernst Borkowsky (4), which establishes that our George II., in his capacity as Elector of Hanover, was anything but amiably disposed towards Frederick the Great at the time of his aggression upon the Empress Queen, that he tried to stir up Russia against Prussia, and would willingly have partitioned a portion of Frederick's kingdom between Hanover and Saxony. The alliance between France and Prussia had probably much to do with George's sentiments, which underwent a remarkable alteration in the Seven Years' War.

Under the title of "The Red International," Dr. Zacher (5) gives an account of the Socialistic agitation now pervading certain strata of society in Europe and America, in so far as it is connected with endeavours to alter existing social arrangements by physical force. The origin of these ideas, both theoretical and practical, is traced to Karl Marx's work on Capital, where not only is private property attacked, but the necessity of force to effect the desired remodelling of society is recognized. Lassalle expected to prevail by moral suasion, but, according to Dr. Zacher, almost all Socialists at the present day anticipate a physical conflict; although there is still a wide distinction to be drawn between men like Bebel, to whom the necessity is unwelcome, and anarchic incendiaries like Most. The chief defect of Dr. Zacher's book is that it is almost entirely restricted to the Socialistic ferment among the artisans, and takes hardly any notice of the schemes for the confiscation of landed property which in England at all events constitute a more immediate danger. It seems certain that the proletariat of the towns alone would be unable to destroy the social fabric in any country; but an alliance with the agricultural labourers would render them very formidable. Dr. Zacher is not very liberal of advice, though he seems to admire both Prince Bismarck's Socialistic and anti-Socialistic legislation. Probably no better suggestion could be given than to copy the legislation of England as respects operatives, and to follow the example of France in giving as many citizens as possible a motive to protect private property in land and investments in the public funds by making them participators in both.

Dr. Menger (6) complains that the historical school of political economists is getting the upper hand in Germany to an extent which menaces the pursuit of the study as an exact science. The historians, who, according to him, ought to be simply the purveyors of material, insist, it seems, on being themselves the builders. It can hardly be otherwise while political economy is so largely dependent for its conclusions upon statistics, and every statistician is a bit of an economist. Towards the conclusion Dr. Menger's protest degenerates into a personal altercation with his critic Schmoller, who has called him a disciple of the Manchester school, which seems to be a term of opprobrium on the Continent.

Dr. John (7) is both an historian and a statistician, but manifests no disposition to encroach on the province of political economy. The accumulation and registration of facts by Governmental authority is an old trait of human society, older than the decree of Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed. Doomsday Book is a conspicuous instance. But the idea of making these returns the basis of statistical science is modern. It seems to be due, above all men, to the Englishman Graunt, about the time of the Restoration, who first discerned the use that might be made of the bills of mortality. Coming, his contemporary, developed some fruitful ideas. Sir William Petty, a great genius, showed to what account statistical observations could be turned. A Dane, Anchoren, first reduced statistics to a tabular form in 1741. Kersseboom, a Dutch financier, pointed out about the same time the constancy of law in statistical returns, if only the accumulation of facts were sufficiently extensive. Süssmilch, a German pastor, thirty years later elaborated this thought, and made it the corner-stone of his theology. The doctrines of Malthus were admirably adapted to encourage the study of statistics; and so the way was cleared for Quetelet, the real founder of the science, whose epoch-making work was published in 1835, a year distinguished by great events in the intellectual order.

The author of Antinous and Clytia makes a third attempt with an historical novel, this time dealing with the conflict of Goth and Roman, Pagan and Christian, in Germany in the latter half of the third century. If Jetta (8) is less interesting than its predecessors, the cause is not any failure of power, but the difficulty of reanimating a barbarous and obscure period. Compared with the pictures in Hypatia, "George Taylor's" seemed tame, and if Kingsley's Goths seemed overdone, his are deficient in barbaric thew and sinew. They have too clearly passed through the brain of a highly cultivated scholar of the nineteenth century. At the same time Jetta is a work of great merit and interest. It displays the author's approved power of narrative and description; it is full of incident, and the style is admirable. The writer is, however, most successful with the personages least intimately connected with the story, such as the Emperor Valentinian; his own peculiar creations seem somewhat unreal, and even the tragic catastrophe of the sorceress priestess herself, who is devoured by wolves in a forest, leaves us comparatively unaffected.

"Higher Harmony" (9), by E. Juncker, is highly sentimental story, in a style which would be almost intolerable in any language except German, but in that language passes muster by a certain genuineness of feeling and diction which would hardly survive the ordeal of translation. A musical composer and a baroness are continually coming into contact, and continually getting separated by unpropitious occurrences or the conventions of society. At last, when their happiness seems on the point of being secured by a divorce, the lady thinks better of it, and takes poison; the lover accepts the catastrophe with unlooked-for resignation; and all discords are understood to be resolved into "a higher harmony."

"The Pipers of the Dusenbach" (10), a romantic tale, by W. Jensen, is an excellent specimen of its class, being highly interesting as a story, and exceedingly well written. "The House Tutor" (11), by Baldwin Möllhausen, is a fair novel of incident. "The Tax-Gatherer of Klausen" (12), an historical novel, by Johann von Wildenradt, does not rise beyond the ordinary circulating library level; and Karl Frenzel's novelettes (13), though well written, are not very interesting.

Edward von Bauernfeld's novelettes (14), appearing in a little series called "Library for East and West," are, we suppose, not entirely new, but their merit entitles them to special notice. The first, a sketch of Vienna life, is as airy and sparkling as any French story, and is all the better for a good moral. "The Guardian Saints," a mediæval story, makes perhaps too great a demand on the reader's faith, but is still highly entertaining; and "The Last Fairy" is a pretty fanciful tale, not devoid of inner significance. The series of which this volume is a part promises to be distinguished both by merit and cheapness.

Ossip Schubin's novel in the Rundschau (15) takes us this month to Rome, and introduces us to a mixed society of all nationalities. Lively and entertaining, and not without passages of pathetic interest, it belongs essentially to that cosmopolitan type of fiction which increased facilities of intercourse tend to create, and which is particularly characteristic of the two nations especially given to travel for pleasure—Russia and America. Salvatore Farina's "Grandfather" is prettily and humorously sentimental in a manner not usual in Italian fiction. "Athens and Eleusis," by Curtius, is an exposition of the patriotic policy of Pericles, founded on a recently discovered decree respecting the Eleusinian priesthood. Being an oration on the Emperor's birthday, a comparison of Pericles to Kaiser Wilhelm was of course inevitable. There are also the first part of an excellent account of Manzoni, and studies on Faust by Professor Scherer, especially relating to the change of plan which the Second Part seems to have undergone since Goethe's original conception of it in 1800.

The most important contribution to Auf der Höhe (16) is Dr. Eugene Oswald's valuable sketch of the history of Positivism in England, describing the introduction of Comte's doctrine into this country, its slow propagation, its present condition and prospects, and its principal open advocates and indirect adherents. He very justly characterizes it as "a leaven," not calculated to crystallize into a distinct organization of any account, but sensibly modifying the general consciousness of the community. He does not mention the article by Sir David Brewster in the Edinburgh Review for August 1838, nor that by William Smith in Blackwood's Magazine for March 1843, which were, we believe, the first serious discussions in this country of Comte's claims as a philosopher. "Miriam," a story of ancient Babylon, is a not unsuccessful attempt to revive the past. "The Trident," by Pedro de Alarcon, is noteworthy for the photographic truth of its descriptions of Spanish life and scenery.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE third volume of the late M. Lenormant's book on Magna Græcia (1) gives the reviewer yet another occasion for the too frequently recurring expression of regret at the unfinished state of a promising and important task. In the two previous volumes the author had taken his readers with him from Tarentum southwards round the gulf and as far as Squillace along the "sole of the boot." In the present unfinished one he begins to describe the western or Tyrrhenian side of the Bruttian promontory. But time failed him to complete even the first stage of the double journey in the first volume of his projected second part. The sites with which he here deals are much less interesting as regards the history of Magna Græcia at the time when it earned and deserved its name than those handled in the earlier volumes. Nicastro and Monteleone, Pizzo and Mileto, are names which evoke no memories in the classical student; and those older names with which they or their neighbourhoods are connected, Terina, Temesa, Vibo Valentia, Hipponion, represent interests of but a fourth- or fifth-rate kind. On the other hand, the mediæval and modern associations of the small district here discussed are very great. Nicastro itself was a place of great importance under the Hohenstauffen. At Maida, close to Nicastro, Sir John Stuart broke a fifteen-years' tradition of French victory. All round it raged the furious resistance to French tyranny which Cardinal Ruffo excited, and which, with better guidance, might have anticipated the successes of the Spanish guerrillas. At Pizzo took place the last event of Murat's gallant frivolous life—an event, by the way, in which England participated, not, indeed, very directly, but after a fashion not altogether satisfactory. M. Lenormant, mentioning the facts, makes no comment on them; indeed, both in respect to this matter and to Maida he writes entirely without animus, and throughout the book displays a spirit of national impartiality rare among Frenchmen and not perhaps universal among ourselves. The seedy little town of Monteleone has associations with Agathocles and with Cicero. Mileto was long the head-quarters of Count Roger of Hauteville, and one of the centres of Norman domination in South Italy. Of all these things M. Lenormant writes in a miscellaneous but pleasant fashion, and, with ample learning, joining to his lore his experiences of travel. Fourteen little pigs once bodily played the part of harpies to his party as they picnicked; and at this extremity of Italy M. Lenormant felt an astonishment, which his readers will pretty certainly share, at finding cider, and very good cider, the common drink of the inhabitants. Very clever people, remembering what has been said above about Mileto, will doubtless cry all at once, "The Normans!" and it really appears that for once very clever people will be right.

All readers of Rousseau should turn to the May number of the Revue suisse (2). We have been taught to consider "Maman" a lady of somewhat questionable morals indeed, but who had the excuse of a negligent and libertine husband. MM. de Montet and Ritter have ungallantly disinterred from family records the husband's account of the matter, which is decidedly different. M. de Voarrens (as, it seems, we ought to call him; nor was he, still less his divorced wife, long entitled even to this title) gives, in a letter to his brother-in-law, a very long account of the goings on (and goings off) of "ma déserteuse," of "la Savoyarde," as he bitterly calls her. According to this—and it seems to have foundation—she first engaged him in business speculations (Rousseau mentions her mania for "entreprises à diriger"); then involved him in considerable debt, and finally took French leave with a good deal of his personal property. The details are curious enough and not uncharacteristic.

Of three school books which lie before us, M. Barbier's (3) has the most circumscribed and manageable aim. That aim is fairly well attained; but we do not think it wise to open a book with such a statement as that "the French language is merely another name for the Latin language; in other words, it is the Latin language without its inflected terminations." Even young boys are quite sharp enough to reflect that "Homin stab in nemor juxta font" is not the French for "Men stood in a grove by a spring," which it ought to be if M. Barbier's axiom is accepted. M. Delbos's work (4) we like less than some others of his, because the bad plan of giving unnecessary assistance in the notes is here followed. What is the use of telling even the youngest learner that voit is from voir? That is just what he has got to find out. M. de la Molinière's treatise on Prepositions (5) and Idioms is elaborate and careful, and has an occasional quaintness of phraseology and reflection which is engaging. We still doubt, however, whether anything but extensive speaking or reading of French will really give familiarity with French idiom.

M. André Theuriet's studies of provincial life are always welcome, especially when they deal with children, of whom the author has a very much less conventional idea than the average French novelist. We have seen books of his of more absorbing interest than Tante Aurélie (6), but any book from him is a delightful change and refreshment in the present decadence of novel-writing in France.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

COLONEL BRACKENBURY has compiled the first of a series of Military Biographies (Chapman & Hall) intended, according to the prospectus, "to be both popular and scientific, combining the narrative of the most romantic and instructive of human lives with a clear examination of the genius of the soldier." In size, print, and even binding, the series is apparently designed to resemble Mr. Morley's "English Men of Letters" as closely as possible. It begins, appropriately enough, with Frederick the Great:

and Colonel Brackenbury has done his work by boiling down Mr. Carlyle's volumes with some dexterity. He is extremely chary of acknowledging any debt to his predecessor, except for maps and a detail here and there as to numbers; but it is not the less the fact that there is nothing in Colonel Brackenbury's book, except a few passages of commonplace military and political criticism, which was not already in Mr. Carlyle. Readers who prefer to read Frederick's campaigns in a handy little book and in fair War-Correspondent English may be safely recommended to take Colonel Brackenbury as a guide. Considering the source from which the maps are taken, it is unnecessary to say that they are numerous and excellent.

The Memoir of Captain P. W. Stephens, R.N. (Nisbet & Co.), belongs to what is, to our mind, a rather unpleasant kind of book. Captain Stephens was a naval officer who saw some service in the Baltic, in China, and on the coast of Zanzibar, but who has found a biographer in Mr. Heywood because he was a man of sincere, though rather gushing, piety, who took a lively interest in missions and the Temperance movement. The book is consequently full of those religious experiences which, unless they have been felt by an exceptional man, and are told with exceptional literary skill, are apt to look silly and complacent. Now Captain Stephens, though obviously a very worthy man, does not appear to have been in any way remarkable, and Mr. Heywood is nowise distinguished from the rank and file of religious biographers.

Under the title of The Last Tasmanian Race (Sampson Low) Mr. Bonwick re-tells the story of the total destruction of the aborigines of Van Diemen's Land by the English settlers. It is by no means creditable to the colonists, who seem to have shown an almost Spanish ferocity towards this unhappy people, but even from Mr. Bonwick's somewhat partial account—he writes throughout in the tone of a member of the Aborigines Protection Society—it is hard to see what could have saved the Tasmanians. If they had not been killed out, they would have been starved out. Mr. John Oldcastle, like Mr. Bonwick, has reduced a larger work to a small compass in his Guide for Literary Beginners (Field & Tuer). It gives the youth or maiden who is desperately resolved to rush on the press some useful information and some good advice.

The reading public ought by this time to be well grounded in the history of the University of Edinburgh. We have lately noticed two works on the subject, and now here is a third by Mr. John Harrison. Our Town's College (Blackwood & Sons) tells the story of the humble beginnings, early struggles, and honourable career of the Scotch University in a pleasant way. The author has included some sketches of Old Edinburgh, and adds an appendix of historical documents. Terse Talk on Timely Topics (Nisbet & Co.), by Mr. Henry Varley, might be fairly though less alliteratively translated by commonplace preachment on odds and ends. The author's aim has been "to stimulate thought, provoke inquiry, and yield interest, enjoyment, and blessing." This praiseworthy intention does not seem to him incompatible with lecturing and threatening members of other religious communions than his own.

The Memoir and Letters of the Princess Alice which had already attracted attention when first published in German are now accessible in English (John Murray). The translation has been executed by the sanction, and it is to be supposed under the inspection, of the Princess's family, and makes a handsome volume.

We have as usual to notice several technical handbooks and school books. Matthew Hale's System of Bookkeeping for Solicitors (Stevens & Sons) is designed to supply articled clerks with guidance on a subject in which, according to the author, their instruction has hitherto been deficient. Mr. Ernest Holah's Double Entry (Effingham Wilson) is a condensed treatise on the "principle of perfect book-keeping" designed for the use of all who have to practise that mystery. Cotton-Spinning, by Mr. R. Marsden (Bell & Sons), is a work on a larger scale. It is one of a series of Technological Handbooks, and gives a history of the cotton manufacture, as well as an account of its processes. The author seems to be full in his details, and the book is profusely illustrated with good designs. Celestial Motions, by W. T. Lynn (Edward Stanford) is a school primer intended to give the results of the latest research in the most concise form. Another book of the same class is A Skeleton Outline of Roman History, by P. D. Matheson, M.A. (Rivingtons). It is a chronologically arranged list of dates and events. Mr. Elwes's Portuguese Dictionary (Crosby Lockwood & Co.) is small, cheap, and handy. It is apparently meant chiefly for those who wish to make use of the language for commercial purposes, and will be useful within its limits.

The popularity of Mr. R. Harris's Hints on Advocacy (Stevens & Sons) is proved by the fact that it has reached a seventh edition, which has been "further revised" by the author. The Rev. E. Storrow has "carefully revised and brought down to date" a new edition of the Rev. M. A. Sherring's History of Protestant Missions in India (Religious Tract Society). The Family Guide to Brussels, by J. R. Scott (Edward Stanford), very well deserves to reach a second edition. It is as soundly done and well written as any book of the kind it has been our fortune to meet. Mention must be made also of Ward & Lock's Guide to North Wales (Ward & Lock). It is cheap, fully illustrated, and supplied with maps.

Although the editors of school books must not be encouraged to lay irreverent hands on Sir Walter, a certain reasonable amount of annotating is permissible. Therefore, we can speak well of Miss Yonge's edition of Quentin Durward, executed for a series of Classics for Children (Ginn, Heath, & Co., Boston, Mass.). The introductory essay may even be read with profit. Mr. W. Satchell has edited an older form of the Treatyse of Fysshynge wyth an angle, attributed to Dame Juliana Berners (W. Satchell). We have yet more books to notice on the apparently fascinating subject of Florida. The first is Florida Fruits and How to Raise Them, by Helen Harcourt (Ashmead Bros., Jacksonville, Fla.; Trübner & Co., London); the second is Practical Orange Culture, by A. M. Manville (Ashmead Bros., Jacksonville, Fla.; Trübner & Co., London); the third, A Treatise on the Culture of the Orange, by George W. Davis, M.D. (Ashmead Bros., Jacksonville, Fla.; Trübner & Co., London.)

A two-volume pocket edition of Sheridan and Goldsmith, published by Messrs. Kent & Co., and uniform with the edition of Shakspeare in the same publishers' "Miniature Library of the Poets," deserves high commendation. It is desirable to mention that Pizarro, The Trip to Scarborough, and The Camp are not included.

We have received various instalments of two works on birds, which appear to be coming out in parts. They are, Fancy Pigeons, by Lyell, and Foreign Cage-birds, by C. W. Gedney (L. Upcott Gill). We can praise the illustrations. Mrs. Geoffrey, by the author of Phyllis, is published in a two-shilling railway novel form (Smith, Elder, & Co.) For half that sum the purchaser can secure Excursions into Puzzledom, by Tom Hood and his sister, Mrs. Broderip (Fun Office). We have received some prize cards and book marks, published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The cards are a little glaring in colour, though pretty in design, but the book marks are in good taste.

The Honorary Secretary of the Municipal Reform League, Mr. Lloyd, writes to us to say that he has at no time been Secretary to any Radical Clubs, as was stated in the SATURDAY REVIEW (April 26). We regret that the mistake should have been made.

ROYAL HOSPITAL for INCURABLES—The VOTES and INTEREST of the readers of the "Saturday Review," for the Election on the last Friday this month, are earnestly solicited on behalf of Mr. CHARLES BRUCE, who has been deformed and a cripple from his birth. A self-made and self-educated man, he has managed to support himself in very modest circumstances by his pen, and has written between twenty and thirty books, all of a good tendency. His volume of Sea Ballads is as complete as anything of the kind. He finds his physical powers giving way, and his friends are trying to obtain for him the shelter of this admirable Institution. References may be made to, and proxies will be gratefully received by, Mr. BENJAMIN CLARKE, General Editor, Sunday School Union, 56 Old Bailey.

SHEFFIELD FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—The HEADMASTERSHIP of the above School, founded by Letters Patent of King James I., will become VACANT at the end of the current Term. Candidates must possess the degree of M.A. or B.A. The stipend from the endowment, on an average of the last seven years, has been rather more than £700 per annum. The usual number of boys in the School is about 100, and the Foundationers are at present restricted to thirty. Applications (with Testimonials) must be sent in under cover addressed to the undersigned (from whom any further information may be obtained) not later than June 10, and the election is intended to take place early in July.

JOHN J. WHEAT, Solicitor,
8 Paradise Square, Sheffield,
May 1884. Clerk to the Governors.

THE MASON SCIENCE COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

The PROFESSORSHIP of the FRENCH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE in this College will shortly be VACANT. Stipend, £100 per annum, plus two-thirds of the fees from Day Students, and the whole of the fees from Evening Students.

The successful Candidate will be expected to enter on his duties on October 1 next.

Applications should be sent to the undersigned, on or before June 5 next.

Candidates are especially requested to abstain from canvassing.

Further particulars may be obtained from

GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.—The PROFESSORSHIP of APPLIED MATHEMATICS will be VACANT at the end of the Session. Until the Council shall otherwise direct, £300 a year will be allotted to the Professorship in addition to the Professor's share of fees.

Applications will be received on or before May 27 at the College, where information may be obtained.

POPULAR NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE DAILYS of SODDEN FEN. By the Author of "Four Crotchets to a Bar." 3 vols. crown 8vo.

EVENING NEWS.

"The Dailys of Sodden Fen" is well equipped. The characters are original, and there is plenty of variety; the author's grasp of his purpose is firm; the study of men and things is close and trustworthy; the insight into human motives is deep and the sympathy with human suffering is true; and, besides all this, there is a freshness of subject-matter, an independence of treatment, and a sustained strength of dramatic interest, which will make a book, full of attraction for the cultivated and thoughtful, reach and hold even the ordinary reader. Looked at from whatever point of view, "The Dailys of Sodden Fen" is simply a brilliant success, and we have no fear that the public will fail to justify this verdict.

"The literary merit of 'An Open Foe' is much beyond the average and affords hope of excellent work from the writer."—Academy.

IN LONDON TOWN. By KATHARINE LEE, Author of "A Western Wildflower" &c. 3 vols.

"A good, sound, interesting, and healthy novel, and one that it is impossible to read without feeling the better for it. There is a refreshingly quiet humour in some of the characters. The figure of the old man, Thorold, a descendant of an ancient family, who believes that he has been defrauded of his rights, is a very striking and even pathetic one."—Academy.

"The characters in Mrs. Lee's new tale are strongly marked, and have been drawn with much artistic care. 'In London Town' is an unusually interesting story."—Athenæum.

MORLEY'S UNIVERSAL LIBRARY.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS have found that there is in England a very large public demand for good books. They now know it to be large enough to justify the production of a uniform series of very cheap volumes, advancing, in course of time, towards the realization of a UNIVERSAL LIBRARY that shall contain all the best and most significant books in the world of all times, outside the time of Copyright, and of all countries, so far as such books can be found written in or rendered into English. The Publishers wish to produce the best books at the cheapest rate—that is to say, in bound and well-printed volumes of 320 pages for a Shilling. The Editor to whom they have looked for aid in working out their purpose shares their faith in the demand for easiest access to all forms of the world's thought, and all forms of opinion that have helped to shape the lives of men. He agrees, therefore, to be responsible for the selection of books published in this way, and he will issue each of them with a short Introduction, giving some account of its writer and some indication of its place in literature.

In the sequence of these volumes, as first published, there will be only the order in disorder that aims at variety. As they multiply upon the shelves, they will admit of any classification that most pleases their possessor. There will be in them the best Plays and Poems, the best works of Fiction, the best books of Travel, Histories, Biographies, all that is most characteristic in the speculations of Philosophy and of Political Economy—the books of most mark in the world that seek to define or purify man's sense of his relation towards God. They may be arranged in sequence of time, from Confucius to Coleridge, or grouped into nations, with Homer to head the Greeks, Dante the Italians, Shakespeare the English, and so forth. The series of books is one that should outlive its present Editor if English readers are really agreed that, for as far as lies within the compass of their own language, it is good to have in a Home Library, as cheap, neat, and compact as the modern art of publishing can make it, all the best books of the world.

The first six books of the UNIVERSAL LIBRARY were taken from writers of five nations—England, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain. The series began cheerfully with Sheridan's Plays, because they were sure of an easy welcome from all readers. France was represented, not by direct translation, but by a volume of the plays of English writers, Dryden, Wycherley, Fielding, plays such as Colley Cibber's "Nonjuror," that have been founded upon plays of Molière. Literature of Spain was represented by Southey's version of the "Chronicle of the Cid"; of Germany, by Goethe's "Faust"; of Italy, by Machiavelli's "Prince." A volume of Rabelais was also within the number of the first half-dozen books. As the series advances, it is meant gradually to include a full representation of the English Drama, from the "Miracle Plays" downwards; the most significant books upon the theory of Government and on Political Economy, such as Locke's "Two Treatises of Civil Government," which, with Filmer's "Patriarcha," have already been given; Hobbes's "Leviathan," the chief writings of Jeremy Bentham, and other books that are more quoted than read. There will be Hooker's "Ecclesiastical Polity." There will be books also of the Puritans whom it opposed. In Poetry and Fiction many writers who now live chiefly as names will come back into fellowship, and the old coinages of wit again be current. Sometimes the work of different writers will be placed within one volume in significant juxtaposition. Thus, produced at the same time, and dealing in very different ways with the same thought of the time, Johnson's "Rasselas" will be associated with Voltaire's "Candide."

The text of the volumes published in the UNIVERSAL LIBRARY is carefully printed from the copies indicated by the Editor, and it is printed without annotation. Whatever explanation may be given will be found in the Introduction to each book. In some volumes, however, the text needs editing. Old writers are printed as we print Shakespeare for common use, without suffering the swift passage of thought from mind to mind to be retarded by those obsolete forms of spelling which are no part of the thought of man, except when he is studying words as their historian. In literature words are but symbols, incomplete at best, of the stirrings of a life within life, compared to which the air itself is in its movement gross and palpable. As far, therefore, as sense and rhythm allow, old spelling will, throughout this Library, be modernized. Also, it is the Editor's intention to respect that change in the convention of society which excludes now from our common acquaintance certain plainnesses of thought and speech once honestly meant and honestly allowed. By a little care in this respect, much of the best literature can, with slight injury to its best features, be rescued from neglect. The use and beauty of old monuments are, surely, separable from their dust and dirt. Real literature has for one of its qualities that it deals with the essentials of life. It is not addressed to a select company of critics, but to all who live. Every true book that has really a place in Literature speaks to every mind that has been awakened to a consciousness of interests beyond those of the flesh.

No writer has ever felt of his own book that it attained his highest aim, but that has not been reason for regretting that it had an aim. The UNIVERSAL LIBRARY will fall short of its mark, but it will not be the worse for having such a purpose as is here described. Considering, also, what a staff of writers it will have, and that in each book the Editor restricts his own talk to four pages, its volumes cannot easily be dull.

GENERAL GORDON'S NEW BOOK.

REFLECTIONS in PALESTINE, 1883.

By CHARLES GEORGE GORDON. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"It must command the most respectful attention. The earnestness of General Gordon is stamped on every line, while his strong and original views are expressed with characteristic self-confidence.....He only knows one book, and that is the Bible; but of the Bible he knows enough to be extensive and profound.....But we have said enough to show that the 'Reflections' are active to the heroic character of the man, who has set before him ideals impossible, indeed, of attainment, but towards which he is always striving to elevate himself; who seeks to mortify self, like his model, Thomas à Kempis, and carries with him the profound conviction that, happen what will, his prayers are being heard and his footsteps directed."—Times.

Edited, with Introduction, by the Rev. W. BENHAM, B.D., Rector of St. Edmund the King, Lombard Street, Editor of the "Globe Edition" of Cowper's Poetical Works. 18mo. 4s. 6d.

"Mr. Benham, as those who are acquainted with the 'Globe' Cowper know well, not only has the poet's life and works at his fingers' ends, but also is aware of what a editor should do and should not do.....We do not know any recent volume of the series that should give more pleasure and less cause for criticism than this."—Academy.

"The singular interest and beauty of these two East-Anglian minsters and their singular differences, give an excellent subject for both needle and pen. Mr. Freeman's competence for his own part of the matter needs no comment. Mr. Farren has executed his thirty-five plates with judgment and with great success."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Farren's general views are on the whole charming; for instance, Plate II. 'A View from the Meadows' with Ely towers against a soft and bright sky, could hardly be better in its way.....The 'West Front' of Ely (Plate VI.) looks like a reminiscence of one of Turner's fine pictures, because it shows the lofty tower and white façade brightly shining against a dark intervening.....Some of the interiors are capital.....That sweeping touch which comes of large views and a true sense of the harmony between English architecture and the history of the English people pervades every page (or Mr. Freeman's Introduction)."—Athenæum.

IRELAND AND THE FRANCHISE.

MR. BRODRICK'S minority is beyond all question more honourable and perhaps in reality less disastrous than Mr. CHAPLIN's retreat. But there can be no possible temptation for a reasonable politician to emulate the practices of the present Ministry and their supporters, and to pretend that the division of Tuesday is a thing to be rejoiced over. All political experience and an immense preponderance of political argument are on the side of the minority; but it is not creditable to the Conservative party that that minority was not larger. The actual deserters are few, and the only person of any importance among them shall be dealt with presently. But the abstainers are many; they include individual members from whom better things might have been expected, and their number shows that the estimate made last week of the misconceptions prevailing on the question was far from erroneous. A patriotic prophet would rather that his estimate had been falsified. Of the causes of the blunder enough has been said already, and it is scarcely necessary to touch very hardly on the maro's-nest of a Conservative-Irish conspiracy which has been discovered by Ministerialists smarting under the defeat of Tuesday week. By averting the attention from all the solid argument on the other side (some Ministerial newspapers, by an unfortunate coincidence which no doubt they regret, have accidentally made this easier by printing Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL at length and omitting Lord CLAUD HAMILTON altogether), it is possible to represent the action of a few irregulars as characteristic of the party. But even those who are least satisfied with the generalship displayed on this occasion by the defenders of the Constitution may acknowledge that fainéantise, unwillingness to fight a losing battle, and failure to apprehend the question at issue, have much more to do with the matter than the deliberate acceptance of a false and mischievous theory of politics.

There is no blame due to those Radicals who, without suppressing the opinions on the other side, attach importance to the speech of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL; it is not so easy to say that there is no blame due to soi-disant organs of the Conservative party which affect to attach it. It is not every one to whom it is given to comprehend the positive as well as the relative weight of forces in politics, and it is perfectly fair partisan warfare to lay stress on the admissions of an opponent. But some considerations of a tolerably obvious kind might, if duly weighed, moderate the rejoicings of Radicals and the alarms of half-hearted Tories over the speech of the member for Woodstock. In the first place, they appear to take him for a serious political thinker, which can scarcely be the character in which he presents himself to his own party, and which certainly is not that which impartial observers assign to him. In the second place, they forget the immense difference between the conduct appropriate to a partisan pure and simple, such as Lord RANDOLPH is at present, in Opposition and in power. Tory democracy is perhaps a useful battle-cry in Opposition; on that point it is not necessary to pronounce any opinion. But, independently of the fact that no one has yet succeeded in discovering what it means, there is another very simple fact which makes it pretty certain that so clever a man as Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL will have the good sense to drop Tory democracy when he reaches Downing Street. The word may, in itself, have all the blessedness of the kindred term Mesopotamia. But it is quite certain that at least a large section of the Tory party will have nothing to do with the democracy, and that nearly the whole Liberal party will have nothing to do with the Toryism. This being so, it seems a little doubtful that any Tory democratic Ministry could rally a working majority, or even a working minority, of Parliament or of the nation to support it in power. What cannot be maintained in power may often be very useful out of power, as all parties, and the Radical party especially, have found before now. These simple considerations, which any one is welcome to call cynical if he likes, may dispense us from following Lord RANDOLPH through the interesting account of his conversion "with the deepest possible regret." "Eh! pas si bête" is the generous comment which every liberal-minded reader will pass upon Lord RANDOLPH's review of the state of Ireland (where there are only two or three murders, abductions, and so forth, a day), and upon his remarks about "the generous seed of conciliation," about the "law-abiding character of the population of the "West Coast," about "the baneful influence of a too-"powerful monarchy," and about "an antiquated past." It was not at all badly done, and perhaps it is as well that this sort of thing, which seems to go down with the present constituencies, should not be left entirely to the other side. "Why should the devil have all the most taking tunes?" is obviously Lord RANDOLPH's contention. It is not necessary to echo the argument; it is still less necessary to echo the tunes. But if anybody finds it in his conscience to play these tunes with good intentions, one may admire the elasticity of the said conscience without insulting his taste by supposing that he thinks the tunes good ones. There seems to be an uncomfortable impression in the Radical ranks that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL is at once fool enough to believe the arguments he uses and rogue enough to use them as if he believed them when he does not. It cannot be too strongly urged that this is not only unfair, but impossible.

The considerable body of absentees of the Conservative side is, however, not to be fully accounted for, either by the small number of Lord RANDOLPH's followers or by the larger number of those who misapprehend the real importance of the Irish franchise question, or by the number, it is to be feared not small, who simply think the extension inevitable, and wish to "take it lying down." Not a few, it is probable, have been influenced by the somewhat mischievous and certainly premature publication of a cut-and-dried abstract of the supposed intentions of the House of Lords. The House of Lords, unfortunately, is not omnipotent, and even omnipotence, it is understood, desires, if it does not require, some co-operation on the part of the less powerful beings whom it is expected to succour. If the Conservative party in the Commons does not fight the Bill with somewhat more vigour than it has hitherto shown, it can scarcely expect the Upper House to come to its assistance. It may be added that the incident of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's defection, whatever its importance, would pretty certainly not have happened if the collapse of Mr. CHAPLIN's amendment and the general weak-kneedness of the Opposition had not pointed the way to a method of acquiring popularity which could do no harm and might do (as Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL counts good) good. Some bad men will draw the moral that [illegible] be very hard for the student of representa[illegible] tutions to find a sorrier example of a Parlia[illegible] the present. Dr. JOHNSON would probably [illegible] scribed it, when he was in his more pointe[illegible]

"minority of cowards." This, of course, would have been wholly unmannerly and partially inexact. But the conduct of the majority in reference to the Egyptian policy of the Government, and the conduct of the minority in reference to the Franchise Bill, might certainly seem to an atrabilious person to justify the description to some extent. It is sometimes said that both sides are inwardly convinced of the necessity of reform. If it be so, they have kept the conviction to themselves as far as argumentative expression of their views is concerned. But an enemy might say that, if it exists, it must be prompted by the more intrinsic and profound conviction that there could hardly be a worse Parliament than the present under any system of election. This, again, is hasty, and but too capable of being disproved by future history. It has, however, on its side the history of the past in more ways than one. Elected, as far as the majority is concerned, in a purely irrational fit of excitement against or in favour of persons, as far as the minority goes, the result of an unparalleled absence of foresight and failure to estimate the facts of the situation, the present Parliament has, so far, signally falsified the adage that a bad beginning makes a good ending. It has seen during its course the dominion of England curtailed; the remains of that dominion threatened at points where they have never been threatened before; an unexampled opportunity unimproved, and almost, if not quite, thrown away; the most disastrous military operations which have taken place for a generation; the greatest fall, after a sudden rise, of English influence abroad that has been known since the early days of GEORGE III.; the reappearance, after a hundred years and more, of the only European nation that can seriously threaten English colonial trade as a trading and colonizing rival. But it has one redeeming point. It is quite ready to extend the experiment of Ninety-three and to forget the sequel of Ninety-eight.

THE SHIPPING BILL.

SINCE Mr. CHAMBERLAIN began to bespeak the applause of a languid gallery by doubling the parts of President of the Board of Trade and sentimental agitator, he has done some remarkable feats, but on Monday night he surpassed himself. He introduced his castrated Merchant Shipping Bill in a speech so verbose as to excel the wordiest efforts of Mr. GLADSTONE, and contrived to convey a tolerably general impression that he wished to see it make shipwreck. In these days, when Mr. GEORGE is called a stylist and Canon FARRAR counted eloquent, it is enough to pour out a torrent of words, plentifully mingled with statistics, to convince a judicious world of your ability, and accordingly Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S speech has been duly called able. On the supposition that his object was to secure the rejection of the Bill, the praise was deserved. If that was not his intention, then he delivered a mercilessly wordy harangue, in which everything essential to the real nature of his laboriously prepared measure was lost under a mass of more or less irrelevant detail. At least two-thirds of the three and a half or four hours taken up by him were devoted to repetitions of the same evidence in support of the same proposition. It is by this time pretty familiar, and moreover it has never been denied. We all agree with Mr. CHAMBERLAIN that lives are lost at sea through the fault of some shipowners, and that this is a state of things which calls loudly for remedy. The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE imposed upon himself the necessity of such an unconscionable shower of words by his choice of a method of demonstration.

It is a method familiar as his glove to the disputant who wishes to hedge in the employment of abuse. You begin with a tepid saving clause to the effect that you do not blame everybody, and then you scold at large for pages. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN showed the House of Commons on Monday for two hours and upwards how well he could play this sorry hack's trick. He acknowledged that most shipowners are honest men, and then in a thousand times as many words proceeded to try to prove the contrary. This was quite in keeping with his practice all along, and so was his peroration. After the fashion of the remarkable Cabinet he ornaments, he ended by declaring that if the Bill was opposed it would be lost, and then the responsibility would rest on his opponents. Taking advantage of the Ministerial wrong, according to the uniform practice of his colleagues, he insisted on the advanced period of the Session and the press of business as a reason why the House should consent to hurry on the Bill, as if anybody but himself was to blame for the muddle which has delayed it hitherto. Then the Wrath of the People was brought in of course. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN might have learnt by this time that it is not given to everybody to play the part of Mr. PLIMSOLL with success. That earnest and manifestly disinterested enthusiast was helped in his weakness by a variety of advantages which are wanting to the distinguished business man who sits for Birmingham. Mr. PLIMSOLL, for one thing, did not take the subject up just when he was in want of a good big measure to carry next Session, neither did he go on making concessions which were so many confessions that he had bungled in his facts and exaggerated his inferences.

For those of us who are more concerned to see sailors properly protected than to find a good text for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S next campaign on the stump, the conduct of this Bill is a matter for unmixed regret. In its present amended form it is a fairly acceptable measure. As it was first drafted, it would have burdened the whole shipping trade in order to punish a minority of dishonest owners. The insurance clauses were so drawn that the most honourable men would have been heavily fined for losses caused by no fault of theirs. As it now stands, only the reckless shipowner need suffer, and the machinery for punishing him is made efficient. Any underwriter who holds fifty per cent. of the insurance can set the law in motion if he has reason to think that the vessel lost was insured greatly in excess of her value. There is one feature of this provision which is far from pleasant. The underwriter is also a party to over-insuring a vessel; and there is something by no means favourable to commercial honesty in allowing him to escape from liabilities contracted with his eyes open. It might possibly be found that this would have some effect in rendering the Bill inoperative; for underwriters might shrink from the odium of committing what has an ugly moral resemblance to a fraud. But business men who do not scruple to speculate in doubtful transactions may be trusted not to allow fine feelings to interfere with their pockets, and in commercial affairs it is no new thing to provide for morality of a kind by making the interest of thieves incompatible, so that they may be encouraged to catch one another. Even if the strong probability that the Bill will never become an Act did not make criticism rather futile, it would be impossible at this stage to notice its details; but it may be generally said that the insurance clauses are now reduced to a reasonable form. They all provide that it shall be in the power of the underwriter to refuse to pay dishonest over insurance, which again will make it the interest of the shipowner not to over-insure. It may be doubted whether this would reduce the amount of loss of life at sea as much as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN professes to expect. Navigation is always dangerous in proportion to the daring and enterprise of seamen, and it is the possession of those qualities which have brought our merchant marine to its present position. When Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said that the Germans came next to ourselves in the proportion of lives lost at sea, he unwittingly made another important concession to the shipowners. He overlooked the fact that of late years German seamen and shipowners have been very enterprising and, consequently, prosperous. Timid sailors naturally escape dangers incurred by braver men. By stopping scandalous over-insurance, however, we can prevent the loss of life through mere rascality, and that is a distinct gain. Though it is far from easy to define what is meant by undermanning, it is a good thing to make it a part of unseaworthiness. This provision also would put the interests of shipowners on the safe side. Now that an amendment protecting owners against liability for the consequences of errors in seamanship on the part of their officers has been introduced into the Bill, it seems reasonable enough to bring them under the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act. It is perfectly right that an owner who knowingly employs a master capable of running improper risks for profit, or who meanly sends a vessel to sea with worn-out spars and bad cordage, should be made to smart for the injury they may cause his unlucky sailors. The more the Bill in its present form is considered, the more wonderful does it appear that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN still thinks proper to compromise his chance of carrying it by keeping up the hectoring tone he was ill-advised enough to assume when it was first prepared.

Whether his voluntary or involuntary error is to result in the loss of the measure for this Session will of course partly depend on the shipowners. It is highly ridiculous to throw the whole responsibility for its fate on them. The House of Commons is not entirely at the mercy of a single interest; and it is time that Ministers should be stopped in their familiar manœuvre of shifting the blame for their own bad management on to the shoulders of the Opposition. If, however, the shipowners take the course they threaten to adopt, they will assuredly and justly be held to have done their best to secure the measure from charges of vanity or selfishness. They may object to let the Bill, which is essentially one of principle, go before a Grand Committee, and in that they will probably have the support of the Conservative Opposition. To insist on a Select Committee is quite another thing. It is natural that, like the rest of the world, they should think their particular business a mystery unintelligible to the common run of humanity. As a matter of fact, however, the question is simple enough, and if the House of Commons is not competent to deal with it, neither is it fit to help to legislate for the country at all. Besides, to insist on referring the Bill to a Select Committee looks very like advancing the pretension to be judges in their own cause. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has no doubt been irritatingly abusive, and it is only human nature that they should wish to punish him. They would, however, be wise to remember a certain vulgar adage touching the folly of cutting off one's nose to punish one's face. In the present case, too, it would be somebody else's face. There are few more absurd spectacles in this world than a body of business men in a fury because they think their pockets in danger. When the danger, real or imaginary, is caused by some measure intended to protect human life, this fury is apt to become odious. Now that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has done practical penance by modifying his Bill in the proper direction, the shipowners will be very unwise if they allow their anger at his propensity to bluster to mislead them into assuming this undesirable position, and taking up the defence of the black sheep among them.

EGYPT.

THE course of events in the interior of Egypt and on the Red Sea coast has not condescended to the convenience of Mr. GLADSTONE. The wave of disaffection has now come to the very verge of the ordinary tourist country, and it is perhaps for this reason that the weighty step of sending fifty sailors to patrol a certain portion of the Nile has been taken. As to Khartoum, all is still silence. At Souakim things have gone back to much the same state as that in which they were before Mr. GLADSTONE, under pressure of a threatened vote of censure, sent General GRAHAM to kill many thousand Arabs, lose several hundred Englishmen, fight two desperate battles, return unthanked, and secure absolutely nothing by his expedition. As before, the rebels loot in the neighbourhood of the town; as before, they fire into it by night; as before, the guns of the ships save it from serious danger. No serious danger ever threatened Souakim that the shells and shot of a couple of English ships could not ward off with a few hundred marines to prevent a coup de main. No interest in the neighbourhood of Souakim called for a land expedition, except the saving of the garrisons who were abandoned, and the securing of the road to Khartoum, which has not been attempted. On the Nile the destruction draws near terribly, as a famous German ballad has it, and the brave man of that ballad has certainly not manifested himself at least in Downing Street. There are at Assouan or Wady Halfa, or thereabouts, some Egyptians with Remingtons. There were several Egyptians with Remingtons under HICKS and under MONCRIEFF and under BAKER. But it is no doubt fair to add Captain BEDFORD and his fifty sailors, the contribution of England to the defence of Egypt.

But the supporters of the Government have a triumphant reply to any such observations as this. An expedition is really going to Khartoum in two or three months, and its going is absolutely unconnected with the Vote of Censure. The credibility or the credulity (words which Mr. FIRTH, M.P., may be surprised to hear are not synonymous) of any man who asserts the latter part of this proposition is sufficiently indicated by the fact of his assertion, and needs no laborious investigation or description. It is more interesting to consider the mental attitude of persons who think that, supposing the assertion to be true, it betters in any way the case of the Government. Mr. GLADSTONE's fault is not merely that he refuses to announce the despatch of an expedition now—an announcement which even yet would probably at once arrest the wave above spoken of—but that he did not send it weeks and months ago. It is almost degrading to have to repeat and enforce such elementary truths, to have to meet the excuses of those who say that the sun is hot in June when they are charged with not sending an expedition in February or in November, the quibbles of those who say that it is dangerous to indicate routes and details, when the routes are marked out beforehand, and the details admit of scarcely any choice, and when (above all) no one insists that routes and details should be stated. The foolish clamour against Mr. FORSTER for not accepting Mr. GLADSTONE's word ignores the fact that Mr. GLADSTONE has always steadily refused to pass that word, whatever its value may be. But it is scarcely necessary to waste time upon advocates who have formally and solemnly contradicted themselves. After boasting that action would be immediately taken in the Soudan, and that this action is entirely independent of the Vote of Censure, the Ministerial apologists announce themselves authorized to state that no action has been decided on which goes beyond the declarations on the Government side in the Vote of Censure debate. As those declarations were, if not inconsistent with any action, consistent with no action at all, the announcement is almost equivalent to the announcement that the Government will do nothing. It is curious that it has been made immediately after the recording of a great majority for the Government on the Franchise Bill—a majority which may possibly have seemed to Mr. GLADSTONE to wipe out the memory of his recent disaster. But, in fact, no reasonable man trusts these irresponsible announcements. Having by wilful delay brought matters to such a point that immediate action is hardly possible, the Government no doubt hope to obtain the benefit of two or three months' respite. They will make copious inquiries and languid preparations to keep the majority of their followers in good humour; they will do nothing decided; and will inspire occasional contradictions of decisive actions, to appease those about Mr. JOHN MORLEY and Sir WILFRID LAWSON. By this means, and by devout thumbing of their favourite chapter of accidents, they hope to evade the difficulty somehow. It is needless to say that they cannot evade it except by the help of the said chapter, and that even then they can by no possibility evade it completely. But all they really hope for is to be able to tire down the interest of the country about Egypt, to postpone decisive action till Parliament is up, and then to be left free to do what they please. With intentions so obvious, announcements of intentions become unimportant. The probable course of conduct, subject to some new manifestation of the will of the country and to some new disaster in Egypt of a kind that cannot be trifled with, may be prophesied without much difficulty or danger.

A question of even greater import to the interests, though of less to the honour, of the country—the question of the Conference—remains in a state of equal darkness as far as positive information is concerned, of greater as far as concerns the possibility of forming a judgment independently of positive information. Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE, the latter with a display of temper very unusual in him, have again and again refused to give the simple pledge which would set all disquiet at rest, and assure Parliament that the Government will have nothing to do with any extension of the programme of the present Conference, or with any "new Conference," as Mr. GLADSTONE characteristically terms it on another programme. Even in Mr. GLADSTONE's latest utterances, which were apparently meant to be encouraging, there is no positive assurance. More encouraging interpretations of these and other words have indeed been put forward; but these interpretations are absolutely without warrant in the words themselves. On the other hand, the communications with France, which Mr. GLADSTONE originally thought to be of such a simple nature that he was not sure whether they were not concluded when he first announced them, have lasted the best part of a month, and are not over yet. An infinite number of interpretations may of course be put on this fact; but there is one interpretation which cannot be put, and that is that the communications have been plain sailing through smooth water. There must have been some thing or things which France wanted and England was unwilling to grant, some thing or things which England wanted and France was unwilling to grant. No one is likely to entertain much doubt as to what these some things are. And, unfortunately, the former occasions on which

Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE have been in critical diplomatic relations with one or other of the Great Powers have not had a history which is very encouraging. There is, indeed, little doubt that even Mr. GLADSTONE would hardly dare to make complete jettison of Egypt in order to pursue his voyage unhindered to the happy isles of universal suffrage and unlimited democracy. But it may be by no means impossible, by yielding a little here and a little there, by giving this Power a foothold and that a hand-purchase of the country on the Nile, to surrender without any single glaring act of renunciation all the advantages which fortune and French blundering at a critical moment and English blood and treasure lavished freely, if not wisely, have secured for England. Mr. GLADSTONE has indeed remarked, in his noble-sentiment vein, "that, subject to the require-"ments of right and justice, English interests ought to be "paramount with an English Ministry, not only in Egypt, "but all over the world." The sentiment is no doubt noble, but it is encumbered with over many provisos to be entirely reassuring. There is much vice as well as virtue in your "ought to be," a vice which prevents it from being anything like equivalent to "is." There has been too ample experience of the construction, at once curious and large, which Mr. GLADSTONE is wont to place on the terms right and justice, and the extension of the duty from Egypt to the whole world, though unexceptionable in principle, seems somehow to have a weakening effect in practice. In the case of English interests, as in the case of General GORDON, the most generous recognition of responsibility in general might turn out to be compatible with fatal neglect in particular.

MR. FORSTER AND THE LIBERAL PARTY.

MR. FORSTER'S relations to his party have for several years been peculiar. Several eminent Liberals have during that time more or less completely detached themselves from the democratic movement, though none of them have thus far coalesced with their opponents. The Duke of ARGYLL has been alienated from his colleagues by their interference with the rights of property; Mr. GOSCHEN refuses to concur in the transfer of political power to the numerical majority of the population. Distrust of the foreign policy of the Government would perhaps have caused a further secession, if it had not been almost universally entertained. Zealous partisans persuade themselves that Mr. GLADSTONE himself will at last abandon a course of timid imprudence which could have been suggested by no less ingeniously perverse an intellect than his own. Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. FORSTER expressed in their vigorous denunciation of Ministerial policy opinions which were shared by a large majority of the House of Commons, and perhaps by some members of the Cabinet. Their advocacy of sound doctrines was explained, not by superior clearness of judgment, but by the accident of their independent position. If they had not on other grounds already in some degree separated themselves from their party, they might perhaps have silently acquiesced in the fantastic blunders and miscarriages which have been perpetrated in Egypt. Foreign affairs have for the most part only a casual and artificial connexion with political differences of opinion. Mr. GOSCHEN has declined office in the present Cabinet on more relevant grounds than his disapproval of Mr. GLADSTONE's foreign policy. He is, in fact, though not a hereditary Whig, the ablest and most consistent representative of the party which once bore that respectable title. With the revolutionary caprices of the present Liberal leaders he would in no case sympathize.

Mr. FORSTER, on the other hand, is, as he has been from his youth, an earnest believer in the central democratic dogma. No politician has more consistently promoted every extension of the franchise, nor is it certain that he would shrink from the dangerous experiment of universal suffrage. It has been his fortune to introduce and carry the measure which has more than any other cause deprived rank, property, and intelligence of legitimate influence. The consequences of the Ballot, and of a uniform and equal franchise, will perhaps hereafter disappoint him; yet Mr. FORSTER lately made a speech in defence of the wild project of adding some hundreds of thousands of disaffected Irish peasants to a constituency which is already unmanageable. By one of the anomalies on which POPE or MACAULAY might have fastened as illustrations of human inconsistency, Mr. FORSTER combines with his faith in the sovereign and irresponsible multitude a genuine devotion to the public interest and to the just rights of all classes of the community. He has consequently incurred at almost every stage in his career the bitter animosity of Radical partisans. His first prominent offence against the faction consisted in the clauses of the Education Act of 1870 which protected the rights of the Church of England. The political Nonconformists resented the recognition of the fact that the Church had organized an educational system of its own before Parliament had dealt with the subject. Mr. FORSTER's resistance to sectarian intolerance was violently denounced; and his present colleague in the representation of Bradford took a principal part in the attempt to deprive him of his seat; but the moderate Liberals and the Conservatives had for once the good sense to co-operate in the return of an able and honest member; and Mr. FORSTER in 1874 came in at the head of the poll.

A year or two afterwards, on Mr. GLADSTONE's temporary retirement, Mr. FORSTER was proposed as a competitor with Lord HARTINGTON for the office of Liberal leader in the House of Commons. There was no discredit in the defeat which followed; and, indeed, the nomination as a candidate for such a post was an unusual honour. The Liberal party in the House of Commons is a constituency of greater competence than the Bradford electors; but some at least of Lord HARTINGTON's supporters distrusted Mr. FORSTER's independence, though the choice which was made might be justified on other grounds. The next offence which Mr. FORSTER gave to the extreme members of his party was his conduct of Irish administration. It was natural that he should be furiously assailed by Irish agitators within and without the House of Commons, and that their more practical allies should form plots against his life which only failed through an improbable combination of circumstances. A more unexpected embarrassment arose from the unfriendliness of the Radical section in the House of Commons, and from the ostentatious coldness of some of his colleagues. The unpopularity which had been incurred by conscientious discharge of invidious duties was imputed to Mr. FORSTER as a fault; and his post became untenable when, after refusing the Irish Government the necessary powers for the suppression of outrage, Mr. GLADSTONE concluded with Mr. PARNELL the deliberate bargain which is known to all the world, except the Minister himself, as the Kilmainham Treaty. The disastrous results which must otherwise have followed from the compact were afterwards averted in consequence of the Phœnix Park murders; but Mr. FORSTER had previously been forced to resign. He has since resumed the right of expressing his strong convictions on more than one of the untoward transactions of the Government. His speeches on the Transvaal Convention and on the Egyptian crisis must have been extremely unpalatable to the Ministers, and, as might be expected, the local Caucus of the town which he represents deeply resents his independence.

The Bradford Four Hundred censures Mr. FORSTER's independent action with a decision which might have been anticipated, and with a unanimity which throws light on the organization of the Caucus. It ought to be always remembered that, although the primary Assemblies are open to all townsmen who choose to call themselves Liberals, the Council or Committee which exclusively administers the affairs of the Association represents only the Radical majority. It is scarcely credible that there should not be a single Liberal politician in Bradford who agrees with Mr. FORSTER's judgment of the Egyptian policy of the Government; yet it is evident that the governing Four Hundred consists, without exception, of extreme and pledged partisans. The majority in the primary Assembly may perhaps not be a majority of the population of Bradford, for if the minority of Liberals were added to the strong Conservative party in the town, the unanimous Four Hundred might perhaps be opposed to the prevailing opinion. In almost all cases unanimity is incompatible with independent judgment. A writer who describes himself as a Bradford Liberal has explained the manner in which the ruling Caucus is elected in that town, and probably elsewhere. Mere handfuls of partisans assemble to accept the lists prepared by the local wire-pullers, who may perhaps not even represent the opinions of the party. The Bradford vote of censure was of course passed by the managers, and imposed on the Association. The members may perhaps have really agreed in the desire to maintain their usurped right of supervision over Mr. FORSTER's public conduct. It may be hoped that the Opposition will adhere to their published protest against the interference of their own local or federated Associations with political issues. There were many objections to the Caucus even as a form of electoral machinery; but it was not till the managers began to call members of Parliament to account that the mischievous tendencies of the system were fully disclosed.

The professed moderation of the Bradford Caucus in not sentencing Mr. FORSTER to the loss of his seat shows the salutary effect of former experience. There can be no doubt that contumacious independence would have been summarily punished if it had been certain that a vote of condemnation would be effectual. The local demagogues may perhaps have ascertained that some Liberal electors inclined to Mr. FORSTER's part; and they know that, as in 1874, the Conservatives could turn the scale. They can certainly cherish no hope that either on the question of Egypt or on future occasions will Mr. FORSTER submit to their dictation. His well-known earnestness on the popular side in the matter of the suffrage may serve as an ostensible excuse for abstinence from severer measures; but when the allies and predecessors of the Bradford Caucus formerly attempted to defeat Mr. FORSTER's candidature, they knew as well as the present Four Hundred can know that he was in domestic politics an earnest Radical. The resolutions of the Four Hundred mean that Mr. FORSTER's re-election will be opposed, if it is not found safer to tolerate his occasional defection. It would be interesting to learn whether in Bradford, as in other large towns, the Irish exercise any influence in the election of the Caucus. Mr. FORSTER's efforts to suppress rebellion and murder have not been forgotten or forgiven. He not long since informed a turbulent audience that he was determined that they should hear him in England, as they had not succeeded in putting him to death in Ireland. It is difficult to forecast Mr. FORSTER's future career; but in the majority of cases partial secession tends to become more complete. His first speech against the Government was followed by a vote in its favour, the last by abstention. It is much to be regretted that, in a studiously deferential and unnecessarily apologetic letter, Mr. FORSTER should seem to admit the right of the Caucus to call him to account for his speech or his vote. A body which, as he proves, neither knows nor cares anything about questions of foreign policy, has no moral or constitutional right to supersede the independent judgment of members of Parliament.

THE PARKS.

THE decision of the Committee on the scheme for ruining the Parks has been received with great satisfaction by Londoners and others. The opponents of the Bill had a case not easily answered, and it had but little chance of passing. But the Committee by nipping it in the bud have saved a great deal of time for the House of Commons, and a great deal of anxiety for the general public. Mr. MITFORD will perhaps be more cautious in future, and meddle less with the perilous amusement of amateur engineering. No one who heard the evidence could doubt as to the way in which the verdict ought to go; but it was impossible to feel sure that a Committee selected in the present House of Commons would decide in accordance with reason against official pressure. As it is, rumour asserts that only seven of the nine members of Colonel STANLEY's Committee voted, and that the majority against the Bill was only one. This fact, if it be a fact, should warn those whom it most concerns that it will not be safe to stop the agitation against the scheme. It may be brought forward again next Session, but we may trust that before another Session arrives some other things will have changed. A special report is to be issued, in which, it is said, the reason for rejecting the proposal will refer to the unsatisfactory character of the junctions, and not to the injury to be done to the Parks. This is improbable; but, if it be the case, no doubt the promoters of the scheme will bring it forward again with as little delay as possible. The example of the blow-holes at Westminster and on the Embankment should be a warning to our legislators. The blow-holes at the Marble Arch, at Albert Gate, and at Westminster were to be eighty feet high—towers, in fact, like that familiar chimney which disfigures the summit of Campden Hill.

The Italians have a proverb very applicable to the case—"The scalded dog dreads cold water." If we admit in principle that railways are to be made under the Parks, we must also admit that people who travel by them are to be allowed a reasonable amount of air. The great fan invention does not, from all accounts, promise very well; and few uncertain things can be more certain than that, if this Bill ever passes, we shall see ventilators in the Parks. If we may use another canine simile regarding the Bill, it will apply to the side of the promoters. Their one bold stroke was in denying by the help of numbers, which, it turned out too late, were of very questionable authenticity, that local feeling was against the Bill. This was distinctly clever, as without such an assertion few could have conceived the idea. There was perhaps less local feeling than there should have been, or, rather, its manifestation was impossible until the line of the promoters was understood, and then there was no opening for it. But even if we agree, which we do not, that there was little local feeling, how does it happen that what there was showed itself wholly against the Bill? We can easily imagine that this local feeling would have been incomparably stronger had there been the faintest opposition; but there was none. The promoters could not call in the opinion of a single local advocate of their scheme. The people whom it is so greatly to benefit turn their backs on it. But, as the case proceeded, it became an illustration of the saying, "Dog eats dog." First, the CHIEF COMMISSIONER of WORKS combines with Sir EDWARD WATKIN to sell the Parks for the benefit of the intended public offices. The pretence made on one side and accepted on the other was, of course, that the railway underground would be a quiet underground kind of thing, making little disturbance, with only two lines of rail, no blow-holes, and so on—nothing to be seen or heard. Thus Dog Number One fed himself. Then came the turn of Dog Number Two. Sir EDWARD WATKIN finances his Park line by bringing in a branch from the Great Western—which means an infinite amount of noise and earthquake, four lines of rail, and absolutely indispensable blow-holes; while at Westminster such a station would be necessary as would make the juxtaposition of the public offices impossible. So Dog Number Two silently mumbles the skin and bones of Dog Number One, and the public is mystified on both sides.

AFRICAN DIFFICULTIES.

BY a series of unpleasant coincidences almost all parts of Africa simultaneously furnish embarrassing problems to the English Colonial Office or to the Foreign Office. In some cases, and especially in the affairs of Egypt and South Africa, the Government is to blame; but for the unfriendly feeling or the conflicting claims of foreign Powers in other parts of the continent England is in no way responsible. In addition to the Egyptian difficulties, which have been fully discussed, there are two important questions relating to the Congo. There is a difference with the German Government as to the sovereignty of a district on the West Coast; and a destructive struggle among native Zulu tribes has given a fresh opportunity of encroachment to the Boers. If the report that Delagoa Bay is to be ceded to the Dutch Government should prove to be true, the supremacy of the English race in South Africa will be exposed to additional danger. In completing the circuit, it is impossible to regard with indifference the threatened exclusion of English commerce from Madagascar, where the French commander has lately announced the resumption of active hostilities. Foreign apologists often meet complaints of aggression by references to the policy which has covered half the world with English settlements and dependencies; but in almost all cases the political acquisitions of England have followed the course of spontaneous colonization or trade. It may be added that in modern times it has been the consistent policy of English Governments to allow to other nations an equal share of commercial advantage. The main object of recent French enterprises has been, as in Tonquin and Madagascar, the exclusion of English traders from ports and markets which were before open to all nations.

In the interior of Africa, including the basin of the Congo, there has hitherto been no French commerce to encourage or to protect; but about two years ago a French midshipman, then in the service of the African International Association, took occasion, with questionable loyalty to his employer, to plant French flags in various parts of the country, with the avowed purpose of claiming the territory on behalf of his own country. M. DE BRAZZA's presumptuous measures received the approval of the French Government; and he was sent back to the valley of the Congo to resume and extend his operations. Mr. STANLEY, who had discovered and partially opened to trade the territory usurped by M. de Brazza, was supposed to have more or less effectually checked his attempts; but it now appears that a reconciliation has been effected, involving great contingent advantages to France, and a total disregard of the rights and interests of all other commercial nations. The question of the Upper Congo is distinct from the complicated arrangements which have resulted in Lord Granville's projected treaty with Portugal. The English Government was prepared for the first time to recognize the Portuguese claims to that part of the West Coast which includes the mouth of the Congo, with the undisguised purpose of raising a barrier against French designs of acquiring the territory and the monopoly of the river commerce. The treaty is not yet ratified either by England or by Portugal; and it cannot in any case be valid except between the two contracting parties. The French Government will, if such a course suits its purpose, certainly abide by all its former pretensions; but it is possible that the establishment of a precedent for the strange agreement as to the Upper Congo may be preferred to a protest against the bargain between England and Portugal. Prince Bismarck has already announced his intention of disregarding the treaty as far as it may affect the rights of German subjects. On the whole, it seems not impossible that the treaty may be dropped; and it would seem that the trade of the Lower Congo is of secondary importance. The navigation is ended by cataracts at a comparatively small distance from the mouth of the river; and the traffic from the interior will probably be brought to the coast by railways.

The strange compact which has lately been disclosed between the African Association and the French Government is not properly described as a treaty. Notwithstanding the recognition of the Association by the Government of the United States, it is a private body, incapable of exercising rights of sovereignty. In substance the Association is but a name, like that of an ordinary trading firm, under which the King of the Belgians has, for reasons of convenience, thought fit to conduct a philanthropic or commercial undertaking. Neither his Parliament nor his Cabinet has at any time recognized as a national enterprise the personal venture of the King. The enterprise was until now regarded with general good-will because it was apparently directed to the promotion of trade and civilization and to the suppression of the slave trade. If any suspicion had been entertained of the intentions of the King of the Belgians, it would have been removed by his anxiety to secure the services of General Gordon. The same post is now provisionally occupied by Sir F. de Winton, an officer of distinction. It is highly improbable that any English agent should have so far mistaken his duty to his own country as to concur in the contingent transfer of the sovereignty of Central Africa to an alien and rival Power. It is not known whether Mr. Stanley, an Englishman by birth, but an American citizen by choice, has been employed in the negotiation. According to all rules of international law, the agreement has as little binding effect on foreign Powers as M. de Brazza's promiscuous distribution of tricolour flags; but the power of France is more formidable than any legal title. The uniform success of their modern policy of aggression is the more acceptable to Frenchmen because it coincides with the visible decline of the power and spirit of England. In some parts of the world the altered position of the two ancient rivals involves a relation of cause and effect. On the borders of China, in Egypt, in Madagascar, and on the Congo, French aggression is wholly or partly directed against England. Other English difficulties are probably regarded with much complacency in France.

It may be hoped that the comparatively trivial question of the sovereignty of Angra Pequeña may be solved by friendly negotiation with Germany. A German trader some time ago established a station on the coast, in the vicinity of a valuable harbour. He has since affected to claim sovereign rights in the name of his Government over the adjacent territory. Lord Derby had not, when the subject was lately mentioned in the House of Lords, received an answer to his proposal that the Cape Government should take possession of the place. In Africa, as in Australia, the interest and security of English settlements would be largely promoted by the establishment of a modified Monroe doctrine; but other Powers could scarcely be expected to acquiesce in such pretensions. In the case of Angra Pequeña there would be no difficulty in providing in the amplest manner for the protection of German trade. Notwithstanding the strong language of semi-official newspapers, it is not known whether Prince Bismarck contemplates any project of colonization on the coast of Africa. The Dutch would, both by their Colonial aptitude and by their connexion with the Boers of the two South African Republics, be more unwelcome neighbours than the Germans. The exchange of courtesies between the Envoys from the Transvaal and a large section of Dutch politicians was more natural than satisfactory. It is now reported that the Government of the Netherlands is negotiating with Portugal for the acquisition of Delagoa Bay, which is about to be connected by railway with the Transvaal. Such a complication would not have arisen but for the Quixotic policy of a former English Government, which referred to arbitration the conflicting claims of England and Portugal to the possession of a most convenient outlet for the trade of a large portion of South Africa. A bolder policy would have been cheaper and safer than habitual dread of territorial annexation.

The internecine warfare in Zululand, the aggressions of the Boers on the native territory, and the danger, now for the first time appearing, of an attack by the natives on Natal, are the immediate and natural results of the imbecile policy of restoring Cetewayo to his dominions. Before his return the country was in general at peace, though there were some insignificant squabbles among the petty chiefs who divided the territory among them. A sentimental sympathy with the personal feelings of the dethroned King was allowed to prevail over any rational regard for the interests or rights of his former subjects. In the short interval between his restoration and his death he was, as might have been foreseen, engaged in incessant war with a rival chief; and of late hostilities have been prosecuted among the tribes with increased vigour. The Protectorate, which has been repeatedly demanded by the Zulus and systematically recommended by the highest local authorities, would have prevented an enormous amount of slaughter. Indeed the blind and timid repugnance of the present Government to intervention involves in South Africa as elsewhere the bloodguiltiness from which Mr. Gladstone recoils. The war is now overflowing into the Reserve; and the Colonial officers are soliciting the aid of John Dunn, who had been capriciously deprived of the powers conferred upon him after the defeat of Cetewayo. For the first time some of the Zulu chiefs are threatening to cross the Tugela into Natal, where nineteen-twentieths of the inhabitants are of their own blood and language. During all the complications of late years the native inhabitants of Natal have maintained their allegiance to the English Government; but a Zulu invasion would put their loyalty to a severer test. The vacillation and the cowardice which have been the chief characteristics of English policy in Zululand might almost persuade desponding minds that the decay of the Empire has begun. There is no doubt that such an impression has been produced among unfriendly foreigners.

THE RIVER.

THE river in its non-commercial quarters, the river where it is still comparatively beautiful and free (like a young poet before he takes to business and goes into the City), is at present being fought for by a dozen antagonistic interests. The riparian landowners regard the natural bounties of the Thames as Wordsworth regarded the Lake District. It is the fair and still retreat, or it should be, of souls sublime, and in possession of wealth like the Sidonians. A man who can afford to live in a Thames villa, with lawns, and fields, and gardens sloping to the stream, should be allowed to keep this fragment of nature to himself. He should not be disturbed in any way. Even the complete angler, anchored in stream or back water in his punt, an object dear to the artist, disturbs the proprietor. A year or two ago one of these sportsmen wrote to the papers to complain that a lady who dwelt on the bank sent her dog in to spoil his sport. The dog was in the swim, the swim so carefully ground-baited, and the angler was out of it. This was a very fierce lady, and accustomed to the society and offensive alliance of dogs. The very artist himself, the picturesque painter, is an eyesore to the riparian landowner.

Now, when we look at the matter as we have stated it, and setting aside the final decision of law as to right of way on the river, the proprietor seems a very selfish person. Is all that is beautiful in England, even the reedy river-beds and the flag-flowers, to be locked up from the sight of all Englishmen who have not four or five thousand a year? Are the squires in the Lake Country to stop boating on Derwentwater, and the landowners on the Thames to shut up "the great playground," as Sir CHARLES DILKE calls the river. To think that would almost make a man a believer in Mr. GEORGE, only that, if Mr. GEORGE had his way, the small tenant of the State would soon take all the picturesqueness even out of the Thames, and would be the fiercest foe of "trespassers," artists, and anglers.

There is, of course, another way of looking at the matter—the proprietor's way. Why should his gardens and lawns be invaded by intoxicated 'ARRY and 'ARRIET? Why should the greasy papers that wrapped up their luncheon litter his pleasance? Why should parties of young men camp out, and light fires, and howl, and bathe, and dance naked beneath his windows, merely because he lives near the Thames? Thus regarded, even the feelings of the landowner must be admitted to have some claim on human compassion—that is, unless we regard him as hostis humani generis.

In his evidence before a Select Committee of the House of Commons, Sir CHARLES DILKE gave a very fair and interesting account of the river and its condition. For many years Sir CHARLES has plied the oar and loosed the light skiff on these waters and backwaters. Like all who love the Thames, he found himself molested by the selfish brutality of the rich and the rough, by the reckless revels of the many and of the few. The many, in the person of the cockney gunner, keep blazing away at every bird, especially at every rare bird that has its business by the waters. It is disagreeable for the rowing man or contemplative canoist, on rounding a corner, to be saluted by four barrels charged with small shot, and it is no consolation to learn that the pellets were meant to hit a kingfisher. Birds on the river must be protected by law if they are not to be exterminated by 'ARRY in his sporting jacket. Wood-pigeons, herons, ducks, swallows, and kingfishers are the favourite game; and the boldest might be adread when near a cockney who tries to follow with his piece the low flight of a swallow. On those awful carnivals of blackguardism—Bank Holidays—Sir CHARLES says that the swans are bullied by the public and their eggs are broken. To break swans' eggs and rob the river of its most beautiful denizens, how worthy that is of the home-bred British lout, how worthy of 'ARRY! The very water-lilies are dragged up and destroyed by our ferocious trampling populace, whom beauty goads into destructive frenzy. Then, leaving the performances of the many, we come to the equally hideous and selfish delights of the few. Steam-launches, those floating palaces of bloated snobbery, are as bad as ever. We have never known any man not a launch-owner, or connected with the building of launches, who defended these diabolical inventions. They travel, it seems, "without any great diminution of speed"—that is, they swamp punts and skiffs, injure the banks, and endanger life as much as ever. On the whole, there seems more excuse for the ignorant brutality of Whitechapel than for the rich man who lolls, with his cigar and champagne, in his launch, and drives it at a pace which incommodes all people taking their pleasure in simple and natural craft. As population increases, while taste seems not to make any advance, we cannot think very hopefully of the future of the river. Between exclusive owners, cockney gunners, and persons who steam swiftly up and down, the Thames is in a bad way.

THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

THE question of the WELLINGTON statue has again come before Parliament. On Tuesday last Lord STRATHEDEN and CAMPBELL proposed in the House of Lords "that it is not desirable to remove the equestrian statue of "the late Duke of WELLINGTON from London until the "public have had an opportunity of judging the monument "by which it is intended to replace it." It was objected by Lord GRANVILLE that the motion was irregular, on the ground that the subject had been already disposed of in a previous debate and division; but the objection was overruled. A motion had been, on the 24th of March, negatived by a majority of six in a small House to the effect that an address should be presented to HER MAJESTY praying that the statue might be re-erected in a suitable place near Apsley House. Both the debate and the division of Tuesday showed that the sense of the House of Lords had not been correctly expressed by its former vote. Lord GRANVILLE'S proposal that Lord STRATHEDEN and CAMPBELL'S motion should not be made was rejected by 78 to 52 votes; and the subject was consequently reopened. Eventually the mover withdrew his own proposal in favour of a friendly amendment by Lord DE ROS, "That this House, being now possessed of fuller "knowledge of the views and feelings of the late Duke of "WELLINGTON as regards his statue at Hyde Park Corner, "is of opinion that it ought not to be removed from "London." This amendment was carried in a House of 110 members by a majority of 22. It is not surprising that the subject is one which arouses a good deal of strong feeling. That the statue itself is not a joy to the eye is a statement which few people, even among those most inclined to keep it in the neighbourhood where it was first set up, will care to dispute. That, on the other hand, no small respect is due to the feelings and the memory of the great soldier who in evil days did more than any other single man to save England and Europe from the aggressive despotism of the First NAPOLEON is equally clear. Both parties to the controversy are thus placed in a difficulty; and individuals who care both for art and for great historical memories find themselves in a similar state of suspense.

Happily the question is not one of vital importance. It is certainly of some importance that the statue, with which many reminiscences are associated, and which was erected by public subscription, should not, as has been suggested, be broken up. The artistic merit of many statues constitutes only a part of their value; and the undoubted artistic demerit of the WELLINGTON statue does not destroy the associations which must always be connected with it. It is not as a good piece of sculpture, but as a kind of national heirloom, that we look on this monument as a token that a great people knows how to appreciate a great man. The ACHILLES statue inside Hyde Park is assuredly much more incongruous with the idea meant to be expressed than the equestrian statue outside. But when a man great in war happens to belong to a generation small in art, the monuments erected to him are likely to express their smallness rather than his greatness. Still, this is no reason for rudely tampering with them. Plenty of the monuments in Westminster Abbey are eyesores. Yet few people would wish to see them destroyed and their places taken by better works of Academicians or other artists of our own time. Lord STRATHEDEN and CAMPBELL said, with truth, that "this was "not a question of taste, but of sentiment." The difficulty in the matter is that here taste says one thing and sentiment another. We have to do with a monument not pleasing to the taste, but valued by the sentiment of many Englishmen; and it is not wonderful that the House of Commons, the House of Lords, and an impartial public do not exactly know how to make up their minds about it. In default of any better suggestion, the CHIEF COMMISSIONER on Thursday evening announced that the work of taking the statue to pieces had begun, notwithstanding the vote of the House of Lords, and it will, no doubt, go to Aldershot; the more so, as the present Duke of WELLINGTON raises no objection to this scheme. If a definite proposal had been made on the opposite side, the case might have worn another aspect. But neither the motions nor the speeches of either Lord STRATHEDEN and CAMPBELL or of Lord DE ROS suggested any practical alternative. The statue, where it now stands propped up by wooden stakes, and already headless, is hideous and ludicrous. Very few people would like to see it re-erected on the top of the arch as it stands in its new position, and no other site in the neighbourhood has commended itself even to those who wish to see the statue kept in London. In default of any better alternative, we can see no objection to the statue being removed to Aldershot. It will have a meaning there, as it had a meaning opposite to Apsley House. Lord DE ROS' amendment implies that the statue may be moved to any part of London, but must not be taken out of the limits of the metropolitan area. But, if it is to be taken away from the immediate neighbourhood of Apsley House, it would be hard to suggest a better place for it than Aldershot. In this, as in most cases, the victory will belong to those who have a definite proposal to make rather than to those who have only indefinite objections to make to the proposal.

CRICKET.

A PIOUS journal once complained bitterly of the ways of Providence, which caused important events to happen so late in the week as to escape the comments of the prophetic periodical. We would fain avoid this impious peevishness, and yet it seems a hard thing that the match between Australians and M.C.C. may possibly be over before the Saturday Review reaches the reader. It promises to be a very interesting match, indeed all the cricket of the early season has been unusually interesting. The match between the Australians and Lord SHEFFIELD'S Eleven was an omen, perhaps, after the Highland and Maori manner.

> Who spills the foremost foeman's life,
> That party conquers in the strife, says Sir WALTER. The Highlanders, before Tippermuir, killed a casual shepherd they came across, and claimed "first blood." The Maoris are equally eager for the Mataika, or first man killed, but not quite so very mean as the Highlanders. Lord SHEFFIELD'S Eleven was the Mataika of English cricket, and the facile victory of the Colonists seemed to predict conquest all along the line for the land of the kangaroo and the duck-billed platypus. Lord SHEFFIELD'S Eleven showed no pluck, and the fall of Dr. GRACE, for placing his leg where his bat would have been a more legitimate defence, demoralized the Eleven. They fell like a barbarous army when its chieftain is slain. From Oxford no man expected any deliverance. Both Universities had shown a lack of bowling. At both the Freshmen and the Sixteen had been making very long scores. People argued that the bowling must have been loose, and that the batsmen were no more than "severe "punishers of loose bowling." Cambridge, however, in addition to Mr. SMITH, has Mr. BAINBRIDGE and Mr. LEES. About the bowling of Oxford we had almost despaired. Mr. PEAKE, good at need like WILLIAM of Deloraine, has gone down, so has Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. PAGE last year proved that he had sterling qualities as a bat; but the bowling which devastated the wickets of Clifton proved far from formidable, and Mr. PAGE'S chief quality seemed to be a determined effort to "york" his opponents with the first ball. Mr. BASTARD last year bowled well but not successfully (slow left hand) against Cambridge. In these circumstances it appeared as if the Australians could only be eliminated by accident and the natural fatigue of the batsmen. Had the match been played on the University ground, in the Parks, we still think that scores would have been very long. But no gate-money is allowed to be taken in the Parks, and, if we may slightly alter the old proverb about the Swiss, "no gate-money, no "Colonists." Therefore the match took place on the Christ Church ground, which is better than the Old Magdalen ground and the froggy fens of Cowley Marsh, but not so good as the wickets in the Parks. The Australians are said to vow, with honourable candour, that Oxford beat them by sheer good cricket. The fielding is universally praised. Mr. NICHOLLS caught seven men at slip. Mr. WHITBY, a Leamington freshman, and therefore not so well known to fame as if he had been a pupil of Mr. MITCHELL'S or a scion of the house of STUDD, "bowled like a printed book," as we once heard an enthusiast remark. As for Mr. O'BRIEN'S batting, it simply reconciles us to the existence of the Celtic race. Yes; Ireland, after all, with her WELLESLEYS, WOLSELEYS, and O'BRIENS, is the country that wins us our victories. That Oxford should twice get rid of the Australians with ease appeared nearly beyond hope. But Mr. BASTARD proved an able comrade of Mr. WHITBY'S, Mr. PAGE also bowled well, and Mr. MURDOCH and Mr. BONNOR never seemed formidable. Nothing could be more exciting than the second innings of Oxford, when 109 were wanted to win. When an easier task was set our representatives at the Oval two years ago they simply collapsed and let themselves be beaten from very nervousness. In a juncture like this a captain like Mr. KEMP is invaluable. Even as a schoolboy his confidence was portentous. Like NELSON, he does not know what nervousness is, and in his long score he hit the famous Australian bowling about as if he had been playing against an Eleven of Jesus. Mr. HINE-HANCOCK remained in through the whole period in which the runs were got, though he generously attempted to sacrifice his own wicket when Mr. O'BRIEN should have been run out. Fortune was propitious, and the fielders muddled away an easy chance.

The Australians have since defeated, with considerable ease, Surrey—a county which is apt to improve very much as the season advances. Still, at the moment when we write, the Colonists have not performed any very remarkable feat; they have dropped several catches, and Mr. MURDOCH has not recovered his famous excellence. We hope to see both him and Mr. BONNOR worthy of themselves and of their new comrade, Mr. SCOTT, who played an excellent innings at the Oval. It would be little glory to beat our kinsmen if they were "beneath themselves."

THE WRATH OF ACHILLES.

AN acute foreign observer of the English House of Commons is reported to have recently described it after a few nights' attendance at its debates as "a disorderly "assembly led by an old gentleman of ungovernable "temper." It is probable enough that he did not always sufficiently distinguish between policy and passion in his estimate of the phenomena upon which the latter part of his description was founded; but undoubtedly he may have found plenty of apparent evidence to its truth. The wrath of ACHILLES is, in fact, becoming a more and more frequent incidence in Parliamentary debates. The PRIME MINISTER was extremely angry with Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH for "pointing at him" the other night by way of suiting the action to the words "indelible disgrace"; but, as a matter of fact, the gesture which Mr. GLADSTONE complained of has of late become, figuratively if not literally, habitual with himself. One half of his replies to his Parliamentary critics may be described as so many minatory forefingers and denunciatory outstretched arms. He seems to maintain a chronic attitude of indignant repudiation. He is, to use the language of his admirers, continually overwhelming some adversary with the torrent of his wrath, or withering him with the lightnings of his scorn; the admirers aforesaid appearing to be of opinion that the progress of public business is facilitated by outbursts which have all the suddenness of an inundation and all the caprice of a thunderstorm. The latest victim of one of these magnificent displays was the unfortunate Baron DE WORMS. The offence of the member for Greenwich does not appear to the impartial observer to have been a very heinous one. The subject of the speech which provoked his annihilation was that of the approaching Conference; and in the course of his remarks he ventured to insinuate that, "just as the Government had endeavoured to shift their "responsibility on to the shoulders of General GORDON, and "then condemned him when he failed, so, unless Parliament "exercised a vigorous criticism, they would shift to the "shoulders of the Great Powers, who are only too anxious "to avail themselves of them, those interests which we "ought to safeguard in Egypt as the high road to our "Indian Empire." These, according to Mr. GLADSTONE, were "dishonouring imputations"—such imputations as "only show the unscrupulous character of those who make "them." As regarded the charge against the Government of having abandoned General GORDON, the imputation was even "foul," and it had been made by Baron DE WORMS "without the slightest attempt to prove it, as it would "have been impossible to attempt to prove it," on the discussion of a vote on account, without exposing the irregular reasoner to a call to order from Sir ARTHUR OTWAY. The last hit of the PRIME MINISTER was naturally received with Ministerial cheers; and Mr. GLADSTONE proceeded, amid the growing enthusiasm of his followers, to deal with the other dishonouring imputations with reference to possible Ministerial proceedings at the Conference.

With his treatment of this specific point we are not for the present concerned. The very fact that many thousands of words were employed in an "explanation" which, if it had been meant to be really explanatory, could have been made in about a score, is in itself a sufficient comment upon all such Gladstonian utterances. We have only ceased to think it sufficient because we have of late so much accustomed ourselves to substitute recondite analyses of Mr. GLADSTONE'S character for the simple but adequate proposition that, "where language is unnecessarily circuitous, "the speaker has in all probability something to conceal." Mr. GLADSTONE contrived to fill half a column of newspaper report without delivering himself of the two lines of specific categorical statement which would have at once disposed of all Baron DE WORMS's and Mr. LOWTHER's apprehensions about the Conference; and we can see no reason why we should cast about for any more elaborate interpretation of this significant circumstance than we apply to facts of a like order in private life. What chiefly interests us in the PRIME MINISTER's answer of last Thursday night is not its terms, but its temper. It leads us at once into the speculation, now more frequently indulged in than ever, whether, and how often, the spirit of ULYSSES is at the bottom of the wrath of ACHILLES; whether, and how often, the outburst of noble rage is purely calculated and artificial, the lightning flash of scorn a mere ignition of the "property-man's" chemicals, and the thunder of denunciation as only a hollow rattling of the stage sheet iron. That this is sometimes the case will hardly, we suppose, be questioned. Almost every great orator is more or less of a born actor; and the PREMIER's performances have on occasions been too obviously theatrical to be mistaken by anybody. It is true that nature has to a great extent relieved him of any necessity for simulating irritability of temper; but here again we are reminded that all great actors have been wont to make histrionic capital out of their personal peculiarities; and Mr. GLADSTONE has found anger "pay" so well in Parliamentary conflicts of late, that it would not be surprising if he had begun to turn his attention to the artificial treatment of a natural gift. We do not mean to underrate the extent of nature's part in the matter. It is difficult for us of the common herd—men who are simply short-tempered, without being either old in the venerable sense or grand in any sense at all—it is difficult for us to realize the temptations to which our great orator is exposed in this matter. When we lose our tempers we have to pay for it as for any other form of excess. The momentary gratification of our instincts subjects us to the penalty of our own self-reproach and the open or tacit rebuke of our more self-controlled friends; and these deterrents are in most cases sufficiently restraining. But we cannot tell how we should behave if we knew that we were surrounded by a circle of admiring friends, who would admire us the more we stormed, who would call each other's attention to our noble fertility of imprecatory language, and the astonishing force which we could put into a stamp of the foot, and conclude by congratulating us warmly on the abject terror which we could inspire in those who excited our wrath. It must, indeed, be pleasant to eat one's cake and have it in this way, to quaff the champagne of self-indulgence without having to fear the headache of moral disapproval, to enjoy the pleasure of "letting out" at those who annoy us with the satisfaction the next morning of listening to a chorus of journalists applauding our last night's "magnificent outburst."

Admitting, however, that Mr. GLADSTONE has nowadays more temptation than ever to co-operate with nature in this matter, we cannot but perceive also that his temptations to improve upon nature are also on the increase. The "magnificent outburst" undoubtedly "pays." Mr. GLADSTONE must feel that he "does well to be angry" in the sense in which a man is said to "do well" in a prosperous business. He makes a good thing of it; and, so long as his eager crowd of sycophants remains as noisy and as servile as at present, he is likely to persevere in the practice. Righteous wrath is undoubtedly a most convenient screen for an unrighteous policy, and honest indignation is often much easier than straightforward speech. Mr. GLADSTONE knows perfectly well on what high political authority a healthy "distrust of "Ministers" has been commended to the English Parliament; and he knows equally well, therefore, that the so-called dishonouring imputations of Baron DE WORMS are such as English Administrations have been accustomed time out of mind to submit to with perfect equanimity and as a matter of course. And it might be worth his while to consider whether, whatever the momentary effect of these calculated displays of indignation may be in Parliament, their artifice is not perfectly perceptible to the public. Because, if so, and if the trick once becomes well understood, it will assuredly do the performer more harm than good. The wrath of ACHILLES is divine only as long as it is supposed to be real; so soon as it is suspected of a resemblance to the ire of the shady Irish major of comedy, resenting aspersions upon "me honour," the god-like virtue altogether goes out of it.

CURLING.

MILD winters are hateful to most Scotchmen. Farmers look for the frosts to pulverize the soil; sportsmen expect the flights of woodcocks; and the community in general counts upon a certain amount of cold to brace the enervated body and make life brisk and agreeable. As for snow, that is another matter altogether. Snow blocks the roads and chokes the railway-cuttings; snow smothers the sheep by scores in the drifts in the upland glens, and makes the toils of the shepherds almost intolerable; and, as it melts, it sets the boys snowballing everywhere, to the danger and disgust of respectable citizens. Yet it seldom lies sufficiently long, or smooth, or firm to encourage the pleasures that make the charm of the severe Canadian winters. Tobogganing is a thing unheard of to the north of the Tweed; and it is rarely that one hears upon the roads the merry jangle of the sleigh-bells. Frost, on the other hand, is welcome to almost everybody, for fox-hunters beyond the Border are few and far between. Moreover, even frozen-out fox-hunters have their compensation, besides the chance of giving overridden horses a breathing time. It is more than probable that the man who follows hounds is a curler, since curling is the game of every one who can command a little leisure with the capital to invest in a pair of serviceable "stones." It has flourished, to the south of the Tay at least, from time immemorial, and it has been rapidly spreading to the northward in the course of the last half-century. So much so, that for many years the North has met the South in an annual match, played at Blackford in Perthshire, on the picturesque ponds of the great Caledonian Club, which embraces almost all the minor associations. The "roaring game," as it is most expressively called, is become the most popular of playful national institutions, knitting all classes together for the time in close and kindly fellowship. The peer plays against the peasant; the laird meets his tenants on something more than a footing of equality, for the best man comes to the front; and the farmer pits strength and science against the labourer who has taken a holiday for the nonce, if it has not been generously given him. Nor is the sport by any means confined to folks in the country. Professional men in the towns give pressing business the go-by; and shopkeepers leave the congenial atmosphere of the counter to face the sharp change into a bitter temperature, and run the risk of colds and contingent consumptions. Not that there is really much danger in that respect. Intense excitement even more than active exercise sends the stagnating blood into rapid circulation; age forgets its infirmities; youth shakes off its sedentary habits; provosts and portly baillies ignore their dignity, and go hopping about like peas on a shovel; while even strait-laced divines stretch the principles of toleration to joining in merriment which is decorous though vociferous.

Perhaps, if one of these rural divines were to draw moral lessons from the game for his flock, he would say there was no better discipline than a doubtful season. In those "open" winters which have been only too common of late lively hopes are scarcely excited, and acquiescence in circumstances is comparatively easy. But when the frost is fugitive, and seldom does more than "grip the ground," hope is fostered only to be chilled, and sad disappointment succeeds disappointment. When matches are made, to be broken off at the last moment; when the ice is so "drug" that the stones drag instead of gliding; or when it cracks, and actually breaks, under the iron-clamped boots of the players, the sweetest-souled of saints can scarcely keep his temper, and comparative calm must be a question of temperament. The sharp falls in the thermometer are followed by a muttered discord of smothered execrations which grumbles from the Caledonian Canal to the Solway, and echoes in the far-away hills of Caithness. En revanche, in one of our good old-fashioned winters all Scotch humanity is in the most amiable of humours. The flying white frosts have given place to black frosts, and nature is fast bound in fetters of iron. There is exhilaration in the stillness of the buoyant though biting air, and the stillness, moreover, is an inestimable boon to the curler. For the ice has formed in plate-glass sheets, and it is easy to sweep the surface, even if there have been occasional snow showers. Humanly speaking, there can be no question now as to the coming off of the match to be knocked up on short notice. We shall suppose that one parish has challenged another, that the champions have been attended to the scene by a crowd of fervent sympathizers, who may amuse their leisure with quiet games of their own should they weary of looking on at the match. The players on either side may be either four or five; as a rule, four is the favourite number. As we said, they are selected with an eye to their skill, not to their station; for local honour is at stake, and it is no time to stand on social formalities. On this occasion, however, the "skip," or leader of the players, from one parish happens to be the great landed proprietor of the district. He has made his proofs repeatedly as the French say, and his name as a curler is famous through the country. The chief opposed to him is the parish blacksmith, stalwart of limb and ungainly of figure, but who has nevertheless a wonderful adroitness of wrist, with an extraordinary genius for giving directions under difficulties. His face, all fiery from the forge, lights up with a fresh gleam of pleasure as the laird exchanges a hearty hand-grip with him. It is not so much that the other is his social superior, as that he has met a foeman worthy of his stones. Then there are two or three lusty farmers; the schoolmaster from the laird's parish; a wiry little weaver who eke out by skill what he conspicuously lacks in physique; and a shepherd from the neighbouring hills, who is a bigger man even than the blacksmith.

Each of the players of course comes provided with his own pair of curling-stones. These stones are shaped like flattened Wiltshire cheeses; they may weigh, as a rule, about forty pounds; and they are swung from a pair of wooden handles let into their upper side. Metal, with the mercury many degrees below freezing-point, would be too cold for the fingers. In the primitive and cheaper stones, such as those of the hill-shepherd, the rude handles are simply riveted. But in the more artistic productions, which are sometimes beautifully polished, the handles are attached to iron pins passed through the stones, and may be indifferently screwed on at either side. Then the one surface has been ground smoother than the other, so that either can be used at pleasure, according to the state of the ice. Now, having furnished the players with their stones, briefly to describe the game. A strip of ice from 30 to 40 yards in length, about 8 feet in breadth, has been pitched upon and measured out. This is the rink. At either end are several concentric circles, narrowing in circumference towards the tee in the centre. A certain number, say 31, is fixed for game, and the stones lying nearest to the tee count towards it. In fact, the principle is the same as at bowls. Thus if two stones from one side are nearer than any of those played by the other, the winning side scores two. At a certain distance from each tee, a line called the "hog-score" is traced across the ice. Any stone stopping short of that line goes for nothing, and is removed; but as a rule, when the ice is keen, the difficulty is to "hold the stones back." The players who open the game begin by playing short of the tee; those who follow either knock them off, "promote" or guard them, according as they are friends or enemies. Sometimes the stone nearest to the tee appears to be so effectually blocked or guarded, that it is hopeless either to remove or beat it. But the stranger who judges so rashly is ignorant of the resources of the curler's craft. It is then that the skip shows his gifts of leadership by deciding what is best to be done. It is then that the player in obeying instructions must skilfully rise to a great opportunity. He directs his stone either to the inside or the outside of some other one, either cannoning off himself, or cutting another stone in towards the tee, which is defined in curling speech by making an "inwick" or an "outwick." Moreover curling has another point of affinity with billiards, inasmuch as the player may give side to his stone. He lays it down gently; at last it shoots straightforward, but he has delivered it with a dexterous twist of the wrist. Gradually the handle is seen to "wobble," the stone deflects itself gently from the direct line, and possibly may wind inwards, threading channels through the labyrinth till it actually rests upon the tee, which had seemed to be absolutely "guarded." That is curling, properly so called; the finesse that has given the name to the game. And in the event of so triumphant a shot, strangers may be startled by the wild clamour of approbation that rises from the ice. The proud but bashful performer is patted on the back with blows that ought apparently to shiver his shoulder blades; and for his opponents are nearly as loud in their approbation as his friends.

But, in fact, from the delivery of the first stone to the dusk that drops a curtain on the lively scene, curling is emphatically the roaring game. The air may be so still that the softest whisper might easily be heard a hundred yards away. Yet each man thinks it needful to bellow with the full volume of his lungs; and each pair of lungs is as powerful in blast as the bellows of the blacksmith's forge. So noise breeds noise, and gives assurance of the curlers' enjoyment to their wives, daughters, and sweethearts in glens many miles away. Besides, there is generally brisk business going forward. Each player is equipped with a besom, cut from the broom—on which, by the way, he sets his foot, to prevent slipping, when he is playing his heavy stone. But the main use of the besom is to sweep the ice, should the stones seem to "want a little more powder"; and the skips have often infinite trouble in repressing their followers' superabundant energy. It is a sight in the cities to see elderly gentlemen, built very much on the lines of Mr. Pickwick, toddling after the stones, with besoms flourished in the air, as Mr. Pickwick ran at the slide on the pond at the Manor Farm; and sometimes, like that light-hearted veteran, coming to signal grief in their excitement. Then, usually, when the games of the day are over, the second stage of the fun is only beginning. The supper is to come off—the curlers' feast. There can be no doubt beforehand as to the menu. Beef and greens go as naturally to the bill of fare as oysters used to go to a night in the theatre gallery before the prices of the bivalves became prohibitory. And as beef and greens furnish the invariable fare, so whisky toddy is the invariable beverage. Nor in moderation can the toddy do strong men the slightest harm who have been working hard to "discount" its effects, and who are probably besides in prime condition. What moderation may be in each individual case must be a matter between themselves and their consciences. But as a rule, we must say, they seldom transgress beyond the bounds of decent propriety. The minister himself may ask a blessing on the meat, and be by no means averse to mixing the steaming tumbler afterwards. The parish schoolmaster, who is probably in orders, is pretty sure to be there on the watch for an occasion of airing his eloquence; and, though the local and more secular dignitaries may insensibly relax towards the small hours, they are unlikely to countenance disorderly mirth.

MR. BRIGHT AS A MORAL SUPPORTER.

IT is a great point in the character of the present Home Secretary that he is nearly always amusing. Sometimes he means to be amusing and sometimes he does not, but so unmistakably has Providence marked him out as an amuseur that he is very often most recreative when he least means to be so. Not even that charming grey goat which has for these last few weeks communicated to Piccadilly a rustic elegance which need not envy that of Lothbury and Cheapside in Wordsworth's poem—not even the ineffable M. de Blowitz when he is discoursing of Macbeth, that powerful but unpleasing work of Shakspeare's genius—can have given greater pleasure to the contemplative student of human nature recently than Sir William Harcourt at the National Liberal Club. Sir William's comments on the Opposition did not constitute the most really humorous appeal of his speech. "Was this the sort of party?" said Sir William, and so on. He must surely have forgotten, or perhaps remembered too well, De Quincey's delightful essay on "Whiggism in its Relations to Literature," and a story there related of Dr. Parr. "Oh! what a pince!" said Dr. Parr; "oh! what a thegent! Is it a thegent, is it a pince that you call this man? Oh! what a sad pince! Did anybody ever hear of such a sad, sad thegent?" "Oh! what a party!" says Sir William Harcourt. "Oh! what an Opposition! Is it this that you call a party? Is it this that you call an Opposition? Oh! what a sad party! Oh! what a sad, sad Opposition!" This sort of eloquence is perhaps effective with sympathizers. But when Sir William dealt eulogistically with Mr. Bright, and by implication far from eulogistically with some other esteemed members of his own party, he was much more generally recreative, much more like the grey goat and M. de Blowitz. Sir William began by spoiling one of Mr. John Morley's jokes. Mr. Morley did not talk about the "Brigade of Candid Friends," but the "Society of Candid Friends." Quakers, Sir William Harcourt will be glad to hear, call themselves a Society, but do not call themselves a Brigade. And then he contrasted the wicked candid friends with the good friends—who, apparently, are not candid. There was Mr. Bright, for instance. "His principles had constrained him to leave the Government [it is impossible to quote this speech of Sir William's without scoring it as Thackeray would have done]; but, instead of becoming the enemy or the bitter critic of his former friends, he had never ceased to give them the value and advantage of his moral support." Now, as it happened, the casual observer of men and things, attentive to the gambols of the Piccadilly goat, and not neglective of M. de Blowitz, had marked this "moral support" of Mr. Bright's, even before it was so triumphantly pointed to by the Home Secretary. The pleasant anticipation of a Saturday morning with Mr. Bright has been with us for the greater part of the week, but we had not anticipated the additional pleasure of Sir William Harcourt's company. This, therefore, is better than well. But perhaps we owe some apology to Mr. Bright for keeping him so long waiting. It must be remembered, however, that Cabinet Ministers in esse necessarily have the pas of Cabinet Ministers in paulo ante fuisse, even if the latter have ceased to be Cabinet Ministers on conscientious principles, and continue to give the most moral of moral supports to those former colleagues whom they left because of bloodguiltiness and other unspeakable crimes.

Mr. Bright has been for some time unable to appear in his place in Parliament, a circumstance for which, owing as it has been to ill health, all Englishmen must be heartily sorry. To tell the truth nearly everybody likes Mr. Bright, who is the most English of un-English politicians, and concerning whose Radicalism we have had very ample experience of the truth of the Scandinavian proverb, "Seldom comes a better." When Mr. Bright points out that the mistake David made in that celebrated instance when he said something in his haste was merely that his tongue slipped "men" for "Tories," and when he volunteers the opinion that all people who object, let us say, to the Channel Tunnel are irredeemable idiots, it must be an intensely stupid Tory, a remarkably unintelligent anti-Tunnellite who feels in the least aggrieved. Who quarrels with a nice black terrier for ejaculating "Yap! yap! yap!" at a nice black cat, or at the nice black cat for depressing his head into the likeness of a serpent and expanding his tail into the likeness of a bolster at a nice black terrier? It is their nature to (which, by the way, is a falsa lectio), and all right-minded people would think very badly of them if they didn't do it. So with Mr. Bright. Both he and Mr. Gladstone are always, by their own account, in the right; but then they are in the right in such a very different way. However, Mr. Gladstone is not the present concern. Mr. Bright, to return, was not in the Vote of Censure division, for which we are very sorry, partly because Mr. Bright's absence was due to illness, and partly because twenty-nine votes would have done the Government very little more good than twenty-eight, and partly because Mr. Bright's speech would have been almost certainly delightful to hear, read, and comment upon. Mr. Bright wrote a letter next day to Mr. Agnew, M.P.; how or why he selected his correspondent we do not know. Mr. Agnew himself, who in his extra-Parliamentary character is a very useful person, is remarkable for some of the fewest and foolishest Parliamentary utterances attributable to any member of the present House of Commons. There is said to be a man who when he feels low-spirited puts on his hat and goes and sits on a bench opposite the Albert Memorial for some minutes, alleging that this contemplation of la bêtise humaine, æsthetically embodied, is infallibly curative. It has, however, been objected to him that in wet weather or east winds this is dangerous, and he has, it is said, arranged for a collection of the speeches of Mr. Agnew and Mr. Thesiger as an occasional alterative. This is not irrelevant, for it may partly explain why Mr. Bright wrote to Mr. Agnew as he did. "It is strange to me," says Mr. Bright, "that any men on our side should have had a difficulty to vote with the Government. Even had they doubted the wisdom of what Government had done, they might have refused to vote a censure upon them, and have said 'No' to the motion of the Opposition." This, on the testimony of Sir William Harcourt, who as Home Secretary is a kind of ex officio authority on morality, is moral support, this is. After the divine wrath of the Lord Chief Justice with somebody who made light of the Prime Minister, it may be rather perilous work to play tricks with the Home Secretary. But at the call of duty not even Lord Coleridge has any terrors for a man of spirit. Let us look a little closer at the morality of this support and the support of this morality.

It is necessary in the first place to remember exactly what the issue presented to the men on our side was. It was extremely precise and narrow. The House was asked to say whether it thought the conduct of the Government had conduced to the success of General Gordon's mission or not. And this precise and narrow issue was accepted directly by the Government. They would not have the previous question, they would not have side issues such as those provided for them by some more zealous than judicious (but no doubt very moral) supporters. They asked the House, the men on our side and the men not on our side, to say whether they did or did not think "our" conduct favourable to the success of General Gordon's mission. Now what does Mr. Bright, the moral supporter, say about the proper conduct of our men in this trying position. "Even," says he, "if they doubted the wisdom of what the Government had done [that is to say, if they thought, with Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, that the conduct of the Government had not conduced to the success of Gordon's mission], they might have refused to vote a censure on them." At first sight this looks as if Mr. Bright meant that our men might have refused to vote at all, as, in fact, Mr. Forster and Mr. Goschen and others did refuse. This is not exactly having the courage of your opinions, but it is a recognized course of proceeding in such cases, and no one can throw the slightest doubt on its morality. But, even before going on with Mr. Bright's words, it becomes pretty clear that this is by no means what Mr. Bright meant. Certainly the Home Secretary would not have been grateful to him if he had meant it, for it is notorious that such a course on the part of our men would have meant the defeat of the Government by an enormous majority. If every one of our men who doubted the wisdom of the conduct of the Government had refused to vote, the Government would probably have been hard put to it to get a hundred men into the lobby, if indeed they could have got a score. But our moral supporter by no means backs his friends in this awkward manner. "They should have said 'No' to the motion of the Opposition," says Mr. Bright sturdily. That is to say, they should have said "No" when, by Mr. Bright's hypothesis, they thought "Yes"; and that there may be no mistake about it Mr. Bright gives his reasons, as examinees are bidden to do when they express disapproval of the conduct of Charles I. or are favourable to the genuineness of the Casket Letters. "A defeat of the Government would be a catastrophe the magnitude of which no man can measure," says Mr. Bright, wherein, indeed, we agree with him, though perhaps from a different point of view. That, however, does not matter. This disaster which Mr. Bright thinks immeasurable (and we, too, because as a disaster it would have no magnitude at all, and therefore could not be measured) is, Mr. Bright thinks, sufficient to justify a man in saying "No" when he means "Yes," in practically perjuring himself, in telling, in short, what Mr. Bright would have no difficulty in describing forcibly and monosyllabically, but which our more modest tongue prefers to indicate afar off. This is what Sir William Harcourt calls moral support. If you think "Yes," you ought to say "No," says Mr. Bright, for it would be such a dreadful thing if our men were turned out. And so Mr. Bright is left morally supporting Mr. Gladstone.

Oh! idle tongues of poets and prophets and suchlike folk! Silly constancy of martyrs! Idiotic resolution of the little boys in the tracts of our youth, who used to let themselves be maltreated rather than tell—what, again, Mr. Bright shall be left to say! Foolish, foolish Poet Laureate for writing that

> Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence.

How hard was the fate of Ananias and Sapphira! What could have been the difficulty which those Ebrew Jews felt when Nebuchadnezzar the King asked them whether a certain thing was true in answering "Certainly not, oh King! we will say anything that thou sayest and worship any image that thou settest up"? Who was that impertinent Greek who dared to hint dislike of persons who thought one thing and said another? Mr. Bright knows several things that all these foolish sages of sacred and profane history did not know. He sees no difficulty in our men thinking that Mr. Gladstone has not helped General Gordon's mission, and voting that Mr. Gladstone has helped it. Voting is a means of averting catastrophes, and Mr. Bright, like the lover in the essayist, when he is asked, "Has the conduct of the Government tended to assist General Gordon's mission?" replies, "Mr. Gladstone is exquisitely beautiful." This is support; there is no doubt of that; but it is barely possible that if Sir William Harcourt had not told us, we might not have thought of calling it moral support.

WYCLIF.

WHILE few Englishmen have made so great an impression on the men of their own day as Wyclif, none have been treated with more undeserved neglect in later times. Several of his most important works still remain unedited in the Palace Library at Vienna, and even his translation of the Bible was not printed until 1850. The first professed Life of Wyclif was published by Lewis in 1720, and no further advance was made until Dr. Robert Vaughan's praiseworthy attempts (1828–1853) to illustrate the Reformer's life and opinions from some of his unpublished manuscripts. While Dr. Vaughan's books form the largest contribution to our knowledge of Wyclif as yet made by any Englishman, his imperfect acquaintance with many of the greater works leaves much to be desired. A plan for a complete edition of the English treatises was formed by Dr. Shirley, and his preface to the "Fasciculi Zizaniorum" in the Rolls Series shows how much we might have gained from his labours had they not been so sadly cut short. Since Dr. Shirley's death the English works have been published partly by the Oxford Press and partly by the Early English Text Society. Important as these works are both as regards the history of our language and as illustrations of popular thought, for they are appeals to the people, Wyclif's place as a philosopher and as a theologian must be determined by his Latin treatises. Our lack of knowledge has been largely supplied by Dr. Lechler, of Leipzig, whose book Johann von Wiclif und die Vorgeschichte der Reformation has been well translated, with the addition of some valuable notes, by Dr. Lorimer. Dr. Lechler has also edited two of the Latin treatises, and the whole of Wyclif's writings against the clergy, monks and friars, have lately been brought out in two volumes by Dr. Buddensieg, of Dresden. It has, however, been little to our credit idly to allow the industry of Germans to do what we as Englishmen should have done for the works of one of our most famous men. To take away this reproach the Wyclif Society was founded in 1882. Dr. Buddensieg's volumes have been adopted and issued by the Society, and others are in course of preparation both by Englishmen and foreigners, so that this year, the five hundredth since the death of the Reformer, sees a vigorous effort to repair our past neglect by producing a complete edition of his works. A circular from Exeter Hall announced recently a commemoration of another kind under the management of Lord Shaftesbury and a number of vice-presidents and committee-men, including many leading Evangelicals and Dissenters. Wyclif died on December 31, but the Exeter Hall season and the Health Exhibition suggest the present month as more suitable for the "Quincentenary Commemoration," and the 21st inst. has been seized on "as the anniversary of the condemnation of the Reformer's doctrines at Blackfriars." Archbishop Courteney's Council was held in 1382, and the earthquake felt throughout England at 2 P.M. on St. Dunstan's Day (May 19), which happened almost as soon as business began, and nearly put a stop to it, certainly connects the "Synod of the Earthquake" with this year more nearly than chronology. "A Special Religious Service"—we presume a liturgical service—was held "in the Church of the Parish in which Wyclif's doctrine was condemned"—does the Committee imagine that the Black Friars worshipped in a parish church?—but evidently meetings have formed the chief attraction. We are glad of any honour done to one of the greatest of our English clergy, though we regret to observe that these meetings have not been marked by that absence of party feeling which the Wyclif Society declares to be one of its guiding principles.

Born of an old Yorkshire family, Wyclif had all the shrewdness and perseverance characteristic of the men of his native county. As one of the "Boreales," the northern nation of the University of Oxford, he was probably a scholar of Balliol Hall, where he afterwards became Warden. He passed through the full course of Oxford education, spending four years in the study of the "Arts," and a period of not less than five years more in the School of Theology, which included the reading of the Canon Law. Nor was he content with this; for in one of his sermons he tells us that he loved science, and that in his younger days he prepared himself for scientific study. But his life was not to be that of a mere student. Great scholar as he was, the tall spare Yorkshireman, quick of temper, of ready wit and winning manners, was made for active work. In all things an Englishman, Wyclif first came before the world as a politician rather than a theologian. It is indeed scarcely too much to say that his political career did much to determine one side at least of his theological opinions. From 1366 to 1378 he stands out as the great champion of English independence against the claims of Rome. As the vast sums of money annually collected by papal agents in England went to enrich popes who were virtually the creatures of our enemy of France, while the system of "provisions" pursued in defiance of our law left parishes destitute of priests and trampled on the rights of patrons, Wyclif's position was fully in accord with the national spirit. He defended the refusal of parliament to pay the feudal tribute claimed by Urban V.; he attended the conference held at Bruges to remonstrate with the papal agents on the subject of "provisions"; and, having been consulted by the Great Council on some fresh claims made upon the kingdom during the infancy of Richard II., he pointed out in plain words "the asinine folly" of helping our enemies. Dr. Lechler believes that Wyclif's pamphlet of 1366, which purports to be, and probably is, a report of the speeches of seven lords on the claim of tribute, makes it probable that he was then a member of parliament. If, however, he had been present at the debate as a proctor of the inferior clergy, he would have sat with the Commons in the Painted Chamber. His own description of himself as peculiaris regis clericus seems to explain his presence in the Lords' Chamber; he was probably in attendance on the King as his private chaplain or secretary, an office to which his opponent Cuningham appears to refer in a taunt about "the household of Herod." It is said, however, that a Vienna MS. proves him to have been in parliament some ten years later. In his defence of our national independence Wyclif did not hesitate to declare that the pope was capable of sin. Nor did his ideas on the subject of ecclesiastical property stop at the rights of the nation as against the pope. Surrounded by the abuses of a feudalized hierarchy, he looked on the wealth of the Church as an evil, and, following in the steps of William of Occam, commended the practice of the Mendicant Orders—for his quarrel with the friars belongs to a later stage of his life—as more befitting the followers of Christ. An early conflict with the monks cost him the Wardenship of Canterbury Hall. The bishops attacked him in 1377, striking through him at his patron, John of Gaunt. The fierce words of the duke and the earl marshal, who stood by Wyclif in St. Paul's, for the moment turned the Londoners against him, for they were indignant at the insults offered to their bishop. When, however, on a like occasion in the next reign the Princess of Wales interfered on his behalf, the Londoners were again on his side. Wyclif's vigorous protests against the worldliness of the Church and the violence of some of his followers gave occasion to his enemies to represent his teaching as a cause of the revolt of the villeins, and even some modern writers have attributed the close of his political career to that event. Dr. Lechler has conclusively shown that the charge is groundless as regards Wyclif personally. His political career, indeed, was terminated by the papal schism of 1378. The contest between the rival popes changed for a while at least the attitude of the nation towards the papacy. Instead of simply hating the pope, Englishmen hated Clement VII., the claimant whose cause was espoused by France, and upheld his opponent, Urban VI., who became, as even Wyclif calls him, "papa noster." On the other hand, the scandals of the schism brought Wyclif to a more decided mind. With him there was no longer a pope who was "peccabilis"; both alike were "monstra." His disagreement with the popular sentiment brought his political career to an end.

As a philosopher, Wyclif was no unworthy successor of the line of great English schoolmen—of Duns Scotus, William of Occam, and Thomas of Bradwardine. His system was independent and eclectic. While adhering to the Aristotelian method, he followed Plato and the Fathers in holding the objectivity and reality of universals, and, holding with Aquinas creation to be an act necessarily determinate, arrived at the conclusion that every creature being an intelligible nature is eternal as coincident with the mind of God—a doctrine which, as he felt, held him perilously near pantheism. Upholding the freedom of man's choice, and finding God in a certain sense to be everything, he accounted for evil by denying, with St. Augustine, that it had any substantive existence, being in itself a defection. Of greater historical interest than these abstract speculations is Wyclif's theory of "dominion," unfolded in the De Dominio Divino, a kind of introduction to his great Summa in Theologia. Considering dominion in its highest sense as belonging to God alone, and naturally treating of it in a feudal spirit, he argues that they only have a right to exercise it who are in a state of grace, mortal sin breaking the condition on which it is held from God. At the same time, he upholds the duty of obedience to the civil power in all cases, propounding the startling maxim that "God must obey the Devil." He strikes at the feudalization of the Church by pointing out that the spiritual office is a ministerium not a dominium, and by declaring that kings may lawfully confiscate the temporalities of ecclesiastics who abuse them, theories which form an interesting link between the struggle of the Franciscans with John XXII. and the policy of Henry VIII., who in 1530 sent to Oxford for Wyclif's "articles." The papal schism was probably an indirect cause of the growth of Wyclif's opinions on religious matters; at all events they became more decided in his later years. He reached the fullest conception of the headship and sufficiency of Christ, "the priour of al his religioun and the abbot, as Poul seith, of the best ordre that may be," condemning in one of his sermons for saints' days all devotion to saints save as leading to a higher reverence towards the Lord, while at the same time he strictly limited the benefits of Christ's work to the elect—"He redeemed not all men to His kingdom." During these later years also he upheld the absolute authority of Holy Scripture and maintained that the work of interpretation belonged to the Holy Ghost. In his sacramental theory, propounded in its most advanced form in his Confessio, and laid before the people in the vigorous English tract entitled "The Wicket," he anticipated the future position occupied by the Liturgy of the Church of England, being, as Dr. Lechler points out, nearer to Luther than to Zwingli or Calvin. He maintained the doctrine of a true and objective presence, rejecting in the De Apostasia the error of Berengar as against Scripture and the Four Doctors, while at the same time he refused to allow the presence to be local or corporeal.

During Wyclif's later years his teaching was laid before the people by his "simple priests." Clad in their long russet gowns, often ignorant and themselves men of the people, they went from place to place, preaching where they could in church or street or field. In his last days, probably as his priests were suspended and he found it impossible to supply their place, it is evident that he sent out laymen in their stead. He also appealed to the people by writing English tracts containing his opinions in a popular form. But his most powerful weapon was his translation of the Bible, a work never before attempted in its entirety, which he carried out in conjunction with Nicholas Hereford, and which was afterwards revised partly by Wyclif himself and partly, after his death, by John Purvey. Towards the close of his life his University stood by him against the attacks of the clergy. But Archbishop Courteney was too strong for Oxford; Wyclif's opinions were condemned, and his friends forced to recant. He himself was neither molested nor brought to submission. It may be that he was saved by his popularity with the Londoners, or possibly the clergy were conscious that the Commons resented the attempt to legislate against the heretic preachers without their consent in 1382, and were afraid to proceed to extremities against so famous a man. Be this as it may, Wyclif died, on December 31, 1384, as he had lived, a priest of the Church of England, in possession of his benefice, and in full communion with the Church Catholic. His influence while he lived can scarcely be exaggerated. It was not merely that his name was a word of terror to them that were at ease and neglectful of their calling, or that his words reached the council of the nation, or that even his enemies spoke of him as "the first theologian of his time, second to none in philosophy, and without a peer in scholastic exercises," but his influence extended over every class, and during the momentous social revolution of the latter part of the fourteenth century men learnt the lessons, not of religion only, but of freedom and of noble living from his Bible and his English treatises. Though he was not primarily a moral reformer, a story told of the effect of his teaching on the Londoners shows that its true tendency was not mistaken, though unfortunately the zeal of the mob took the form of ill-treating some women of loose life. Nor did his influence die with him. For though Wycliffism was strictly repressed during the fifteenth century, there are manifold signs of its existence, especially at Oxford, and it is impossible to doubt that Wyclif's tracts, and, above all, his Bible, prepared many minds for the changes of the Tudor times. His influence, however, was not confined to England. Dr. Loserth, in a short volume of great interest (Wiclif and Hus. By Dr. Johann Loserth. Translated by Rev. M. F. Evans. Hodder & Stoughton, 1884), has traced the intimate connexion between Wyclif and the Hussite movement. Beginning with a description of the state of the Church in Bohemia in the fourteenth century, he gives a brief sketch of the various attempts at reform before the time of Hus. Considerable light is thrown on the growth of Eucharistic controversy, which in its earliest phase was concerned, not with the right of laity to the cup, but with the lawfulness of frequent and even daily celebration. A full account is given of the influence of Wycliffism in Bohemia, and in the second part of the volume the subject is illustrated by a comparison in parallel columns of extracts from the writings of Hus with passages in Wyclif's works, from which in many cases Hus copied word for word. Dr. Loserth has been unfortunate in his translator, who labours under the disadvantage of an imperfect acquaintance with the idioms of his own language. But this is a small matter compared with the mass of information the book contains. We notice one curious mistake about the English movement. The name of Lollards was not bestowed on the adherents of Wyclif after his death (p. 64), for Rugge, the Chancellor of Oxford, who mightily favoured Wyclif and his friends, in 1382 suspended one Henry Crump, a Cistercian monk, "quia vocavit hæreticos Lollardos." Dr. Loserth, who, we are glad to see, is working for the Wyclif Society, has made a valuable contribution to ecclesiastical literature in illustrating the close connexion of our English reformer with one of the great crises in European history.

THE PEN AND THE STICK.

THE Lord Chief Justice has had during the last week or ten days to try a remarkable case of libel and an amusing case of assault. The two trials relate to very different branches of the law, and represent very different degrees of delicacy and complication. Most people would no doubt feel disposed to say that libel was a very difficult subject, and assault a very easy one. That a man must not strike another, except in self-defence, sounds and looks like one of the primary articles of civilized jurisprudence. What, on the other hand, is the limit of permissible criticism is an inquiry which at once suggests almost innumerable shades of doubtful disputation. Yet it is not very long since twelve or fifteen judges met to decide what an assault really was, and succeeded only in putting us all to ignorance again; while every text-book on the law of torts or crimes will glibly inform the inquisitive reader that a libel is a writing, printed matter, picture, or sign which holds any one up to hatred, ridicule, or contempt. The intrinsic obscurity of the two themes, so far as it may be inferred from the hesitation of the Bench and the confidence of legal authors, has been reversed in the history of the two actions to which we have referred. Signor Foli, or Mr. Foley, has only shown that, if a man will thrash another, he must pay for it. Dr. Johnson, on the contrary, has induced "the palladium of British liberty" to set its heel, if it has one, upon the freedom of the press. It would be difficult, indeed, to exaggerate the loftiness of the position which "twelve men in a box" have assigned to Dr. Johnson. They have elevated him above criticism, and made it, if not a Star Chamber, at least a Queen's Bench Division matter, to find fault with him. Dr. Johnson, whose very name we write with fear and trembling, is the Coroner for Canterbury; and it is, as we now gather, the function of the Kentish newspapers, if they presume to mention him at all, to speak of him in the language of unqualified eulogium. "Please let it be all praise," said the very sincere lady to Mr. Hayward when she asked him to review her book. "Mind it is nothing but praise," says Dr. Johnson to the journalists of Kent; and his opinion is approved and sanctioned by the unanimous verdict of a special jury. If Dr. Johnson is about to hold an inquest, the press must say "Il aura raison." While he is engaged in that solemn task, it must mutter, if it presume to break the silence, "Il a raison." When he has finished, it must say, as a sort of grace, "Il avait raison." The Kentish Observer either did not understand, or refused to follow, this latest version of "Crowner's Quest Law." It presumed to suggest that Dr. Johnson was fallible, and even to maintain that he had occasionally erred. "It is evident," said this audacious print, "that Dr. Johnson likes to pose as a Coroner," and, "puffed up with the supposed importance of the position he holds, is determined that the world shall see how ridiculous it is possible even for a professional man to make himself when vanity takes the place of common sense." Exception might easily be taken on literary grounds to this lucid and melodious sentence. The derivatives of the verb ponere are as conspicuous by their presence as simple and straightforward English is by its absence. That, however, was not the question which the jury had to decide. Dr. Johnson is a public official, and the manner in which he discharges his duties is a matter of general concern. No doubt a coroner is a very great man, especially in his own estimation. But the kind of sacrosanctity which he claims for himself, and which a jury has by implication admitted that he possesses, is something new in English law. "Terrible things, and the strongest of all," says the Greek poet, "yield to authority." The English press, since the days of the Areopagitica, has had a chequered and a troubled history. It has successfully defied the Court, the House of Lords, the House of Commons, the judges of the land, to curtail its privileges or weaken its power. Is the "liberty of unlicensed printing" destined to fall before the attack of the Coroner for Canterbury and Deputy Coroner for West Kent?

Dr. Johnson seems to be one of those Coroners who think that they ought to know all about it. Another Coroner held an inquest not long since in the neighbourhood of London to ascertain whether a medical man had committed suicide, and, as there was no doubt about the fact, proceeded to spend the public time in inquiring what had been the poor man's relations with his partner, and what was the truth about a charge against his moral character. Dr. Johnson had to investigate the cause of a poor woman's death who had declined to enter the workhouse, and had been refused outdoor relief. He thought the opportunity favourable for a denunciation of the Poor-law, and for some good sound rating of the Canterbury Guardians. The Guardians not unnaturally objected to this, and their objection was supported by the Town Council, which memorialized the Lord Chancellor, who would not interfere. In these circumstances the Kentish Observer took up the matter, and exhorted the impenitent Coroner with so much force that he brought his action for libel. The opinion expressed by the Kentish Observer was that Dr. Johnson is unfit for his post. That may be an erroneous view. Similar strictures were often passed upon the late Lord Beaconsfield, and are constantly being directed against Mr. Gladstone. Yet actions of libel did not and do not ensue. The famous instance of the statesman who was described as "a political cheap-jack, only anxious to obtain a public appointment," was mentioned by Lord Coleridge. That was held to be fair criticism, though certainly much more severe than anything said by the Kentish Observer of Dr. Johnson. "Ridicule," said Lord Ellenborough with sense and truth, "is often the fittest weapon that can be employed to expose the follies and errors of another. A man may make use of ridicule in such cases; where would be the liberty of the press if it were the ground of action?" Lord Ellenborough was not the man to lay undue stress upon popular rights; quite the contrary. But he was a robust, sound-minded Englishman who hated cant, and despised the querulous mawkishness that resents plain speaking as a grievance. Sydney Smith expanded with characteristic irony the meaning of Lord Ellenborough. "There is nothing," says that worthy Canon in the third of his immortal Letters to Archdeacon Singleton, "there is nothing pompous gentlemen are so much afraid of as a little humour. It is like the objection of certain cephalic animalcula to the use of small tooth-combs, 'Finger and thumb, precipitate powder, or anything else you please, but for Heaven's sake no small-tooth-combs.'" We hesitate to say it after what has occurred, but surely Dr. Johnson's fitness for his post is, after all, like the fitness of Mr. Gladstone for his, a matter of opinion. In the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, who is, we believe, Chief Coroner of England, Dr. Johnson has "certainly shown great ignorance of the duties of his office." Yet for saying so, the Kentish Observer has to pay Dr. Johnson a hundred pounds, besides all the costs of the trial.

The case of Foli v. Bradshawe is of a refreshingly simple character. There are in it, if we may adapt the language of a great critic on a more august theme, "no fine riddles of the human heart to read, no theories to propound, no hidden causes to develop, no remote consequences to predict. The character of the hero," if we may thus describe the defendant, "lies on the surface. His exploits are brilliant and picturesque." Signor Foli, of whom Lord Coleridge did not profess respectful ignorance, is the well-known operatic singer, and no more an Italian than Signor Campobello or Signor de Reszké. Mr. Bradshawe is a barrister, whose mode of action is a little less ceremonious and sedate than the laws of his country warrant in these degenerate days. Mr. Bradshawe has a mother, and Signor Foli has a wife, and the two unfortunately had a quarrel at Monte Carlo, where both nature and art invite to more peaceful pursuits. The two ladies, however, chose to wrangle on the important and exciting subject of peacock's feathers, and high words were used. This, according to Mrs. Bradshawe's account, made her very ill. It preyed upon her mind, and when she came home she told her son. Mr. Bradshawe then became very much enraged, and resolved to have Signor Foli's blood. He began the attack by applying to several police magistrates, and asking that something should be done to the offending songster. But he soon discovered that a London magistrate has something else to do than to compose disputes or avenge insults waged or offered in the principality of Monaco. So Mr. Bradshawe was driven back upon his own resources, which are not in all respects identical with the resources of civilization. Having in vain suggested to Signor Foli the propriety of pistols for two and coffee for four, he waited for the popular performer outside St. James's Hall, and struck him in the eye with a stick. The assault was savage, brutal, and wholly inexcusable. If Mr. Bradshawe had possessed a particle of discretion, he would have come to terms with his victim, and declined to defend the action. But then, if that quality had been vouchsafed to him in the smallest measure, there would have been no action to defend. In cases of assault, says the Lord Chief Justice, the jury may give any damages they please. In this case they gave three hundred and fifty pounds, and it cannot be said that in all the circumstances this was too much. The position of the unfortunate singer on his return to England may well arouse universal commiseration. Wherever he went he was pursued by the Bradshawes, though, as he says, he never desired to see Mrs. Bradshawe again, and had probably no very ardent longing for an introduction to her son. Yet they hunted him down from police-court to police-court, until they ran him to earth in Piccadilly. There the argumentum baculinum was applied, of which pecuniary damages are but an inadequate refutation. Much in this case will perhaps never be cleared up, though in these days of appeals and new trials one can never be sure. Did Signor Foli, for instance, say, with reference to the explosion at the Local Government Board, "I wish they had blown up old Gladstone"? It would not appear at first sight to matter much, so far as this case is concerned, whether he did or not, though, as he says he did not, he is certainly entitled to be believed.

THE OPERA.

SIGNOR BOÏTO'S Mefistofele has lately been twice presented at Covent Garden, to the apparent surprise of the critic of the Times, who informs his readers that the opera "belongs to the class of works for the universal success of which it is difficult to account." We must confess that we do not share this difficulty. On the contrary, it seems to us perfectly easy to account for the success of a work which appeals alike to all who have ears to hear and to those who have the rarer quality of appreciation. This critic certainly does admit that "the score is by no means devoid of examples of beautiful Italian cantilena"; and this might have gone some way towards resolving his difficulty. It is, indeed, in the highest degree probable that successful operas of the future will belong strictly to that class of works of which Mefistofele is an admirable example—of works, that is to say, which are compounded of pure and always expressive melody, more or less in the nature of Italian cantilena, where such melody is possible, and for the rest of what is known as dramatic music—that is to say, of scoring which serves to illustrate and interpret the sentiments and emotions of the drama. It is pleasant to find that the Times is delighted with something, though the something is not perhaps a source of universal delight. The Walpurgis Night scene, the journal declares, was a model of picturesque stage-management, and "reflected equal credit on M. Lapissida, the stage-manager, and M. Hansen, who is responsible for the ballet." This scene struck us as being a very ordinary affair. It is odd that of all the critics he of the Times should alone have discovered the merits of M. Lapissida and M. Hansen. But such little compliments, no doubt, smooth the business of arranging the new opera, which the same authority says is "in active preparation." The first performance of Signor Boito's opera necessitated a call upon two substitutes for artists who had been announced. Mme. Albani was replaced by Mme. Durand, and Signor Monti was the Mefistofele in the enforced absence of Signor Novara. On both occasions Mme. Trebelli and Signor Marconi completed the quartet. Both casts did their work creditably; the second, as was natural, with more finish than the first, a result of practice together; but neither was wholly admirable. The Margherita and Faust in the opera the success of which puzzles the Times so much have great opportunities for touching the emotions of an audience. The music is susceptible of extraordinary expression, notably perhaps the quartet of the Garden scene, where what it is not too much to call inspiration has enabled Signor Boito to make his melody, with its broken, sobbing rhythm, seem almost to speak. By Mme. Nilsson only has the hysteric passion, the supreme exultation of rapturous love, the sudden entrance into a new and enchanting world the delight of which almost takes away the breath, been truthfully rendered. Mme. Albani sings well where something far more than mere singing is wanted. The artistic qualities of Signor Novara are not perhaps adequately appreciated. There is purpose in all he does, and this is rare on the operatic stage. Mme. Tremelli and Signor Marconi are scarcely more than agreeable vocal machines. Mefistofele is a very beautiful and powerful work, and its popularity will no doubt remain a problem to puzzle the Times.

The representation of L'Etoile du Nord was of unequal merit where merit was perceptible. The critics have perhaps made too much of the circumstance that Signor de Reszké, a bass, was set to play the part of Pietro, usually assigned to a baritone, particularly as it is hard to see where a more promising Czar is to be found in the company. The original Pierro at the Opéra Comique in Paris, 1854, M. Bataille, was what is technically known as a basso cantante. Meyerbeer himself conducted the first performance of the work at Covent Garden: it may be assumed that he was consulted as to the cast, and he was content to entrust the part to Herr Formes, the possessor of an unwieldy bass; so that Signor de Reszké, whose voice is of considerable compass and unusual flexibility for an organ of such calibre, would surely have satisfied the composer himself. The new Pietro sang with taste and effect, and might have been esteemed successful as an actor—in comparison, at least, with the average operatic actor—but that the memory of M. Faure is not to be displaced. In the striking scene at the end of the second act, where the Czar reveals himself to the conspirators, Signor de Reszké fell a little short, perhaps because he is a player who always awakens expectation, perhaps also because his surroundings were wooden. Mme. Sembrich is an artist for whom we have much respect and admiration; but the companionship of a stiff and awkward Gritzenko, and a general looseness and want of life about the whole representation, except so far as she and Signor de Reszké were concerned together, interfered with her efforts. She sang as she always sings, with beauty of voice and marvellous precision in the most elaborate passages. Her shake is closer and more even than it used to be; but a perfect shake is very rare, and she is not always quite irreproachable. M. Dupont showed that his command of the band is not so complete as that which Signor Bevignani exercises.

We cannot conclude without a word of acknowledgment of Mme. Lucca's Leonora—the Leonora of Verdi. In some respects Mme. Lucca stands alone. Her voice is surprisingly fresh, for history records that the lady sang a prima-donna part at Vienna in 1856, when, however, let us hasten to add, she was a girl of sixteen. The most hackneyed of operatic heroines becomes in her hands a really impressive personage. There is something about her which commands attention whenever she is on the stage; a dramatic spontaneity which makes the spectator watch, never certain to what her impulse—or what seems to be her impulse—will lead her. The operatic stage has no truer and more original artist.

THE ETON MISSION.

ETON, which is the oldest but one of our great public schools, and will in very few years be entitled to celebrate the four hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its foundation, is just beginning to enter under its revised code of statutes on a new stage of existence. And it must be the hope of all old Etonians, or rather of all who value the public school system which is so closely identified with English character and English history, whatever they may think of the particular changes introduced, that its future may be no less glorious than its past. But many probably are unaware that the original scheme, as planned by Henry VI., included not only a College of secular priests and a school for boys, but also—as is supposed through the suggestion of Cardinal Beaufort—an almshouse for twenty-five poor men. The Almshouse was suppressed during the founder's lifetime, and the College of priests is at this moment in process of gradual extinction, the Clerical Fellows, who are dying out one by one, being succeeded by a mixed and non-resident body of Governors, who inherit their name and their office in the supreme control of the school, but not their revenues or their status as an ecclesiastical corporation. Of the threefold division of the original design therefore the school alone—which no doubt held from the first the most prominent place in the founder's mind—alone survives. The College Chapel however continued till comparatively recent years, when a new church was built for the purpose by the authorities, to serve also as the parish church of Eton, of which the Provost was ex officio Rector, though in fact his parochial duties were discharged by proxy by one of the "conducts" or chaplains employed for the performance of the daily services. The very first step taken by the Royal Founder towards the execution of his design had in fact been to purchase the advowson of the parochial Church, which was vacated through the promotion of the rector—one Payn Barghill—to a prebendal stall at Windsor. It will thus appear that, in theory at least, the foundation had all along something of a parochial, or what might now be called a missionary character. It was not designed solely as a great centre of education, but was intended also to stretch out a helping hand for the spiritual and bodily needs of the poor and suffering. In one sense it may be said that the directly religious character of the establishment has been swept away by the revised code of 1872. Neither Provost nor Fellows are bound henceforth to be in holy orders, nor is the foundation any longer confined to members of any one communion; the pastoral charge of the parish of Eton had already by the College itself been transferred to other hands. A movement has however sprung up of late, partly due to the great religious revival of the day, partly to the increased interest awakened among the upper classes in the condition of the people—of which "The Bitter Cry of Outcast London" suggests one obvious example—which has found a recognition, as elsewhere so also in our public schools and universities. The "Universities Mission" to the heathen is one expression of the idea, and when some forty years ago Bishop Selwyn, himself a distinguished and popular Etonian, was going out to New Zealand, as one of the earliest of the now constantly increasing band of colonial bishops, he appealed successfully as well to his old school as to his university for sympathy and aid. Some years later, when he came home to look for a zealous and congenial coadjutor in his work, he said to another distinguished Etonian, the late Judge Pattison, "Will you give me Coley?" And Coleridge Pattison, who had been both as an Eton boy and in after life the hero of his schoolfellows, followed his father's old friend to the distant scene of his labours, to find there the work of an untiring evangelist and a hero's martyr grave. If therefore the "Eton Mission," which held its annual meeting last Wednesday at St. James's Hall, under the presidency of Lord Chelmsford, is but one of many signs, as has been remarked, that the higher classes are becoming really and deeply interested in the condition of the poor, there is at all events a peculiar fitness—whether we look to the ancient traditions of the school, or to recent experience—in such a call eliciting a prompt and energetic response, on the same "playing fields," where the Duke of Wellington said, or is reported to have said, that "Waterloo was won." And in point of fact the Eton Mission—which has now been some years at work—was, we believe, the first of these attempts to enlist the sympathies of our richer youth in the moral and physical welfare of their less favoured fellow-countrymen. Harrow, Winchester, and other public schools have since followed so honourable an example, but Eton may claim the credit of having set the fashion, if such it is to be called. And in this at least Henry VI. and Waynfleto would feel that their great design was not discredited.

The meeting on Wednesday last, unlike some of the May Meetings with reports of which the columns of the religious press have for the last few weeks been deluged usque ad nauseam, had at once a practical and what may almost be called a jubilant character. The Duke of Westminster was unfortunately prevented by domestic anxiety from presiding, but Lord Chelmsford took his place, and he had the pleasant task of pointing out from the statistics given in the report how considerable a measure of success had already been attained since the mission at Hackney Wick, in the extreme East of London, was first opened, under the charge of the Rev. W. Carter, a son of the Fellow and Bursar of Eton of that name, who was for many years prominent among the Assistant Masters of the school. It appears that, through the liberality of old Etonians, aided by the munificent gift of 1,000*l.* from an anonymous donor, four class-rooms have already been built, and a hall containing 600 persons, which is soon to be followed by the erection of a mission church. The hall is at present, we presume, used for church purposes, though this was not expressly stated. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that the work is carried on solely—perhaps not even chiefly—by the aid of old Etonians. One of the characteristic and most conspicuous merits, here as in the other public school missions which have been started on the same model, must be sought in the fact that it is very largely dependent for support on the contributions, and even to some extent on the personal services and sympathies, of the boys actually in the school; and there can be no doubt that such a bestowal, whether of money or of personal service, may be most truly said to bless him that gives as well as him that takes. It is Mr. Carter's habit to pay periodical visits to Eton, where he has an opportunity of addressing the boys in the different houses on the subject, and thus directly arousing and sustaining their interest in the work, besides visiting Oxford and Cambridge with a similar object of interesting Etonian undergraduates in the progress of his work at the East End. Mr. Warre is the treasurer of the fund, and he took occasion to dwell, in his speech last Wednesday, with much satisfaction on this aspect of the movement. While it was of course one object of the meeting to ask for more funds—and there is at this moment a pressing call for 750*l.* for immediate use—he was careful to insist that "he had a by no means bad account to give" of what had been already done, and there was no diminution in the spirit and interest with which the work had been taken up at Eton on its first commencement. One strong evidence of this he quoted in the fact that a sum of about 400*l.* is annually collected in the school by purely voluntary contributions, though great care is taken—and very properly—to guard against any risk of the subscription degenerating into a virtual tax. It is also not unusual, as we intimated just now, for boys to give their personal aid by singing at Concerts at Hackney Wick and in other ways. It appears also from what Mr. Carter stated, that lay help is supplied him by Etonians or old Etonians who take up their quarters for awhile in the neighbourhood, and thus, as he expressed it, "they were laying the foundation of an Eton settlement in East London." It is some proof of the success which has already attended these vigorous efforts that there are already 600 children in the Sunday school, and that the mission room is full at all the services; the more so as a region was purposely selected for the experiment where the ground was before quite unbroken, lying as it does, so to speak, at the extreme outskirts of civilization.

There was a fitness in the Bishop of Chichester, who is himself one of the oldest of living Etonians, appealing to his old schoolfellows for the support of the mission. And the other prelate who took part in the meeting, the Bishop of Bedford, had the best means of knowing from personal observation the importance and many claims of the work on which he spoke. Mr. Kekewich, while his immediate aim was to urge old Etonians to contribute to the building fund, was "proud of the work now being done in East London by Eton men with Eton funds," and touched on the root of the matter when he insisted on the great advantage accruing to the boys at Eton themselves in having it thus practically brought home to them, that there were other and nobler aims in life to be sought after than "the glories of the cricket-field and the river." Great indeed is the direct importance, alike from a religious and from a social and philanthropic point of view, of increased missionary effort among the "outcast" masses of London and our other great cities. But hardly less is the indirect importance of such efforts, from every point of view, in helping to bridge over the chasm which separates one class from another. The work done, for instance, among the poor of East London by such men as the late Mr. Green, whose name will be familiar to many of our readers, in this as well as in his literary capacity, has a value of its own beyond any immediate result that may be attained. Or take the following from the report of a member of the London City Mission, whose theology may perhaps be narrow enough, but who had hit the right nail on the head in perceiving that a genuine manifestation of interest in the moral and physical well-being of those he desired to benefit would not in the long run fail of its reward. Many similar instances might easily be cited from other quarters.

> After several years of unceasing effort I gained entrance into many rooms and into most of the dens. My care for the sick and the children disarmed opposition, and then in room after room attention was secured to the readings of the Bible. A few became rightly impressed, and were induced to attend the little meeting I had established. A few years more and a real friendship was entertained for me by most unlikely people. For instance, I was once in great danger from a number of roughs and thieves who surrounded me with threats. A tall, stout Irishwoman, one of the most desperate characters there, rushed forward, and, striking at my foes, fairly seized me by the coat collar and dragged me out of danger. That very evening she was apprehended for a robbery and transported for five years; but I saw her immediately upon her return, and thanked her for the kindness performed so long ago.
> By this time the people were brought into control, as nearly all would listen to me. The ragged-school I had established was crowded with the children, and my meeting was increasingly well attended. Soul after soul was brought under conviction, and many were gathered into the fold of Christ.

If this sort of result is being accomplished—and on what many will consider a sounder religious basis than that of the City Mission—by the Eton and other Public School missions, of which two or three at least are already at work in different parts of the metropolis, and others elsewhere, it may well be matter of rejoicing to those who are interested in the future whether of our public schools, of the outlying masses of our population, or of the Church.

CALLED BACK.

THE process of adapting Mr. Hugh Conway's story Called Back for theatrical purposes involved a difficult dramatic problem. As a narrative the tale of the blind Gilbert Vaughan's presence when a mysterious murder was committed, and of Pauline March's loss of reason through the terrible shock occasioned by the crime, was very well told. The personages of Called Back—an infelicitous title, by the way—are skilfully contrasted and individually interesting. There was excellent material in the book for a play; but it was so arranged that, without considerable transposition and alteration, nothing that could possibly prove effective on the stage was to be contrived. The blind man of the novel, groping his way down a street and accidentally finding himself in the house where the Russian spy Macari murders young Anthony March, nephew of the conspirator Dr. Ceneri, could not have been represented to an audience. The story had to be treated with much boldness, and great credit is due to Mr. Comyns Carr, if—as is understood—he be responsible, for retaining the full strength of the composition after a complete regrouping of the figures. By this time no doubt the one source of weakness, apparent on the first night, the curious prolixity of the dialogue, is removed.

The authors have perceived the necessity of opening with a chain of interest, instead of forging link by link as the novelist may do; so here we find that before blindness overtook him Gilbert Vaughan had seen, and loved Pauline. It is she who takes him to Ceneri's house where the murder is committed; and waiting in the grounds outside, he hears Pauline's shriek, evoked by the sight of her brother falling under Macari's dagger. That he should have supposed it was Pauline who fell is by no means unnatural. The passing of the candle before his glazed eyes, the test by which Ceneri proves the sincerity of his prayer for sight, is one incident of a highly exciting scene which is very adroitly arranged. The rapid business of the action, young March's wrath at Macari's sneer, the blows with the glove which the angry lad strikes, and the instantaneous lull of Macari's ready knife, with the cry of Pauline and the bursting into the room of Gilbert, bring the prologue to a notably effective end. Another telling scene is where Gilbert and his brother-in-law, Arthur Kenyon, track the conspirators to their garret, and see the deserted and now demented Pauline, whom, it must be remembered, they believe to be dead, slowly enter. The manner in which moonlight is made to flood the chamber just before the girl walks in has too clearly the air of preparation; but this is a mere question of stage management. Good scenes succeed each other. The meeting of Vaughan and Macari in Paris, where the spy is sent by his chiefs to give the Englishman what information he can supply about Ceneri, is sound dramatic work. The audience know the truth—that it was Macari himself who committed the murder—and they can the more thoroughly appreciate the ingenuity of his plausible tale that Ceneri slew the man who had betrayed Pauline, and who refused to make her reparation. As in the book, Vaughan starts off to Siberia to find Ceneri, whom his treacherous associate has denounced to the police. This Siberian episode would be very much more valuable if there were very much less of it. An attempt has been made to realize a picture drawn by Prince Krapotkine of the horrors of Siberian exile, an attempt which is somewhat ambitious, but by no means unsuccessful. The novelty of all this may be held to justify the slowness of the development of the plot; but there is no excuse for the extreme protraction of Ceneri's death scene. The wretched prisoner's legs give way beneath him, he falls prone, but he does not die. He is an unconscionably long time in dying, and having fallen he gets up again to fall once more. When he is finally disposed of, the play is practically over; for Vaughan has learnt that Pauline is innocent of the offence charged against her by Macari. The last act in the villa on the Lake of Geneva is the weakest. A better excuse for the reappearance of Macari should have been devised. The shock to Pauline is afforded by a vision of her brother's murder as it was committed; and of course Gilbert enters opportunely from Siberia. On the map it is a long way, and trains are uncertain; on the stage, however, a hero must be punctual to his cue. But we must not leave the authors of Called Back with words of satirical comment on our pen. The play, as already stated, is very good. It is so sound and strong that the absence of comedy for what is called relief is never felt. No relief is needed; except, indeed, from the superfluity of verbiage.

The acting rises from very fair to very good. Miss Lingard has a trying task in the portrayal of a mad heroine who is to be sympathetic in her madness; but, on the whole, she succeeds in retaining interest for the witless heroine, and that is much. If the precise method by which the mental disturbance was quelled is not very plainly shown, it may be that it was impossible to show it. Mr. Kyrle Bellew has earnestness to recommend him as Gilbert Vaughan. That Vaughan should be given to set tricks of attitude and movement is unfortunate. The actor is growing into mannerisms, which are things to be checked. If mannerisms are natural and unconquerable, they must be excused; but Mr. Kyrle Bellew is gradually adopting peculiarities which, if not checked, will presently tend much to mar his otherwise intelligent efforts. Great praise has been awarded to Mr. Beerbohm-Tree for his performance of Macari, and the praise is deserved. We can well believe that it is a study from life, not, it must be understood, a copy of any particular personage—the lowest form of study from life the stage presents—but an amalgamation of natural characteristics welded by the ability of the actor into a homogeneous whole. Perhaps the part is somewhat over-elaborated, but it should not be forgotten that Macari is an Italian, with the vivacity of his race accentuated by the circumstances of his daily life. Coming after the vacuous curate of The Private Secretary, Mr. Beerbohm-Tree's Macari is a very noteworthy piece of acting. Mr. Anson was less to the point as Ceneri. Dr. Ceneri is an older man than Macari, and could not be expected to possess all the ardour and energy which Macari affects; but there is little evidence of deep-set purpose in him. He is always in trouble himself, instead of being bent on troubling others. On the whole, he is a very weak-kneed conspirator. There are clever touches in the part; at times Ceneri arrests the attention; but he does not retain command over it, and he it is who will not die. Most of the minor parts are carefully filled. Called Back promises to be a great popular success. It also, however, as is not always the case with popular successes, amply fulfils artistic requirements.

THE BATTLE OF LA HOGUE.

"RINGING of bells all day, and bonefires all night," is the entry in Narcissus Luttrell's diary for May 23rd and 24th, 1692. And this went on for many days. This ebullition of national joy meant something more than pride for that signal victory known in our annals as the Battle of La Hogue. On that ground, indeed, England had good cause to rejoice; for not only was this, as Macaulay points out, the first great check given to the arms of Lewis XIV., and the first great victory won by the English over the French since the days of Agincourt; but, if it could not efface, it at least gloriously atoned for, the disgrace of Beachy Head. The disgrace was England's that day; two years later the atonement was hers. On June 30, 1690, the Dutch bore the burden of the fighting, while Torrington lay ingloriously by out of gunshot, till his brave allies had done all that even the countrymen of De Ruyter and Van Tromp could do against an enemy near four times their strength in numbers and weight of metal, and then slunk away up the Thames, leaving the Channel free from end to end to the triumphant French. On May 19, 1692, the position was reversed. The work on that day was done almost wholly by the English, not from any backwardness on the part of the Dutch, but solely through the perversity of the wind, which for the most part of the time enabled the French to engage the English squadrons alone. But this was not all. The victory of La Hogue meant something more to England than a check to the arms of the Great Monarch. When at noon of the 24th of May the English fleet slowly drew out of the bay on an ebb tide with the flower of the French navy in flames under the helpless eyes of James and the great captains who were to have brought England once more to his feet, the last chance of the Stuarts being restored by foreign arms and foreign gold vanished with the smoke of the burning ships. Twice had the attempt been made; twice had it failed. If a King of the race she had rejected was to sit again on the English throne, he must be recalled by English voices and upheld by English arms. That issue, too, was tried. The retreat from Derby and the slaughter on Culloden Heath was the last word of the great lesson the Stuarts had learned twice before on the banks of the Boyne and in the Bay of La Hogue.

From the beginning of the year it had been known that great preparations were astir in France. The one man who had persistently opposed an invasion of England was no more. Louvois was dead, and with him vanished, as the exile flattered himself, the last barrier that lay between St. Germains and St. James's. He died at the close of 1691, and early in the following January Lewis had consented to an expedition from which he possibly expected to gain as much as James. Macaulay, following Burnet, says that the real designs of the French Government were unknown even to William when he sailed for Holland on March 6. But it is difficult to reconcile this statement with the many paragraphs in the Gazettes for January and February which show that the French preparations were no secret in London. The muster on the coast of Normandy of all the Irish troops then in France under the command of Sarsfield might not have troubled William much; but one can hardly suppose him to have been ignorant that with these Irish battalions was camped Bellefonds with ten thousand Frenchmen. It was certainly known, too, in January that the Toulon squadron was fitting for sea; in February, that all privateers had been recalled, and an embargo laid on all merchantmen; while in the dockyards of Brest, Rochefort, and Port Louis the carpenters were at work night and day. It may not have suited the English King, in the then feverish States, to have made all his information public; but the letter to Heinsius quoted by Macaulay hardly warrants our belief that it was not till April that he really saw whither all these preparations tended. However, whatever he may have suspected or known, on March 6th he sailed for his own country, leaving, as usual, full power in the hands of Mary, with Nottingham again at the head of the Council.

Meanwhile, England had not been idle. The Gazettes which announce the movements of Lewis are full of indications of our own activity. All persons trading in naval commodities were entreated to apply to the Commissioners sitting at the office of His Majesty's navy "in Crutched Fryers." Six weeks' pay by way of bounty was offered to all able seamen who would enlist, and these gentle inducements were supplemented later by a sterner call. In April three new men-of-war were launched, the Cornwall and the Devonshire of eighty guns each, and the Breda of seventy. The Prince, of a hundred guns, and the Dunkirk, of seventy, both of which had been renewed almost into new vessels, were ready in the same month; and some idea of the pace at which the work went forward may be gathered from the fact that the former of these, which, under its new name of the Royal William, had been launched at Chatham on the 21st, was manned, fitted, and ready for sea by the 30th. The same activity was observed in the land forces. The regular troops were concentrated between Petersfield and Portsmouth. Several regiments were recalled from Flanders, and others stopped on the march. All the militia were called out; and the Queen herself reviewed in Hyde Park six of the City regiments, thirteen thousand strong. In the southern shires of Scotland all capable of bearing arms between the ages of sixteen and sixty were bidden to hold themselves in readiness, and a few of the most trusted of the Highland chieftains received a sort of dictatorship over the rest. All Papists, or reputed Papists, were ordered to remove ten miles from London. The houses of all suspected persons were searched, and Lord Huntingdon, in whose stables horses enough were found to mount a whole troop of cavalry, was sent to join Marlborough in the Tower. Nor were the Dutch behindhand. The presence of William lent a spur to their zeal. The Amsterdam squadron, of fourteen men-of-war, three of ninety-two guns each, and three fire-ships, was the first to put to sea. The Meuse squadron, of five men-of-war and two fire-ships, followed; the North Holland and Zealand squadrons were not long behind. By the end of April the whole fleet, thirty-six ships, carrying about thirteen thousand men and two thousand four hundred and ninety-four guns, was anchored in the Downs under the command of Van Almonde.

On the 21st of April James left St. Germains for Normandy. As usual he was firmly convinced that his coming was anxiously expected in England, and that the officers of the English navy were with him almost to a man. In this last belief there was, indeed, more reason than in most of the foolish notions James carried in his head. So far as he can be said to have been popular at any time and with any class of people, he had been popular with the fleet. He had proved himself when Duke of York a brave and a skilful sailor, and this rare instance to his credit had not been wholly forgotten. Moreover, it was no secret that his agents had been busy in that quarter, and especially with Russell, and James, as usual supremely ignorant of the man's real nature, had been persuaded that the English Admiral was heart and soul with him. But Russell, though he had little love for his present sovereigns, had a great love for his profession. He would have had little objection to seeing James again on the English throne, but he had the very strongest objection to seeing an English fleet strike its flag to the Frenchmen. In all his correspondence with St. Germains he was resolute on one point, that the two fleets should not meet. "If I meet them," he said, "I fight them, were his Majesty himself on board." One of his chief officers, Carter, whose support had been confidently promised to James by his agents, had reported their every word to Nottingham.

Still there was an uneasy feeling in London. That Russell had been in correspondence with the enemy was pretty well known, and no man could dare to say what part he would play when the pinch came. He had taken leave of the Queen on April 30th, and by the end of the second week in May the whole of the allied fleet was anchored off St. Helen's. No mightier armament had ever assembled in an English port. If every man was true, there could be little doubt of the result. But of that fact there was much doubt, and in London these doubts were freely expressed. Again the good sense and courage of Mary showed themselves. On May 15th all the English officers were summoned on board the Britannia, Russell's flag-ship, to hear a dispatch from Nottingham, conveying the Queen's disbelief of all the stories that had been circulated to their discredit and her unshaken assurance in their loyalty. The wisdom of this course was as clear as the folly of James's Declaration. An address was hastily prepared in answer, thanking the Queen for her confidence, and vowing to defend her rights and the freedom and religion of England with their lives against all Popish invaders. Every officer present pressed forward to sign it, and there is no doubt that at that moment they signed the truth.

Meanwhile the French fleet had left Brest, and was making its way up Channel towards La Hogue, where three hundred transports were waiting his escort to convey James and his army to the shores of England. Tourville was in command. His orders were positive—to find out the English fleet, and fight them, in order to clear the way for the transports. But both Lewis and his Ministers had been strangely misinformed of the strength of that fleet. That the Dutch could have had time to join forces with the English was thought impossible. Of the latter, only Delaval's and Carter's squadrons were believed to be at sea; and of these, even if they showed fight, there could be no doubt that Tourville would be able to give a good account. Russell was supposed to be still in the Thames, or beating somewhere about the Downs; moreover, in him James, despite all that had passed, still professed the utmost confidence. At three o'clock on the morning of the 16th Nottingham was waked from his sleep by an express, who had ridden up from Weymouth in eleven hours with the news that the French squadron was in sight. Another posted off along the coast to Russell. On the following morning the allied squadrons weighed anchor from St. Helen's and stood off down Channel.

Their whole force was ninety-nine ships, carrying between forty and fifty thousand men, and close upon seven thousand guns. Russell's flag flew from the Britannia, a fine three-decker of one hundred guns. His vice- and rear-admirals were Sir Ralph Delaval, in the Royal Sovereign (which famous ship was then nearly sixty years old), and Sir Cloudesley Shovel, in the London. Sir John Ashby commanded the Blue Squadron in the Victory, with Rooke and Carter for his vice- and rear-admirals. Almonde was in command of the Dutch, with Callemberg as his vice-admiral. The accounts of Tourville's force vary. Macaulay puts it at forty-four men-of-war; others at fifty or sixty, or even more, exclusive of fire-ships and smaller vessels. It is certain, however, that it was his squadron only that was engaged, for a lucky wind still kept the Toulon fleet in harbour, and that, had our whole force been able to come into action, he would have been outnumbered nearly two to one. The French van was commanded by D'Amfreville, their rear by Gabaret. In the centre Tourville's flag flew from the Royal Sun, boasted by the French to be the finest ship ever yet launched on any waters, carrying one hundred and four guns, and adorned with a gorgeous device representing Lewis in triumph, with a crowd of kings and princes in chains at his feet. The Dutch led the English van; Russell, with the Red Squadron, lay in the centre; Ashby, with the Blue, was in the rear.

At daybreak on May 19th the two fleets came in sight of each other, Cape Barfleur, about six leagues off, bearing south by south-west of the English line. The morning was hazy, and Russell could not clearly see what tack the French were on. The wind, too, which was from the south-west and light, was with them. Tourville could have declined an engagement; and when the immense superiority of the force opposed to them was observed, his officers pressed him to do so. But he flatly declined. Orders to fight were in his pocket, and he had no mind to run the risk of another sneer about men "who carried the white feather in their heads if not in their hearts," with which he had been greeted at the French Court for not having burned the English shipping in their harbours after the battle off Beachy Head. By ten o'clock his line was formed, and bearing down upon the English centre. Russell signalled for the Dutch and the Blue Squadron to weather the French if possible, but the wind had now fallen almost to a calm, and it was not till late in the afternoon that his orders, and then but partially, could be obeyed. It was no idle boast of his, therefore, to Nottingham that for the greater part of the day he was engaged with a force practically superior to his own. Tourville stood on his course till he had come within musket-shot of the Britannia, and then, hauling up to windward, the Royal Sun opened fire about half-past eleven, and the fight began.

At first it was a little more than a duel between the two admirals, but gradually others came into action, and for four hours the firing was heavy. But the French were out-manœuvred and out-fought, our ships, it is said, firing three broadsides to their two. About four o'clock Tourville, who had played his part as became the captain of the Royal Sun, found himself in such a plight that he shifted his flag to the Ambitious, while the Royal Sun made off to the coast of Normandy, nearly all her rigging shot away and "all her scuppers" spouting blood, says Macaulay, dexterously appropriating a grandiloquent touch from a contemporary ballad. At six a breeze sprung up, which enabled the Blue Squadron to get into action. Carter's ship was the first to break the French line, and Carter himself, struck by a splinter from his own yard-arm, was one of the first to fall. Till ten the firing continued, and then the wind fell again, and in a thick fog both fleets anchored for the night. Our loss was severe. The Eagle alone had seventy killed and one hundred and fifty wounded, but besides Carter, Captain Hastings, of the Sandwich, was the only English officer who fell.

The morning of the 20th broke foggy and calm. Only thirty-eight of the French ships were in sight about three leagues to the westward. Russell gave signal for chase, his own ship being far to the eastward in consequence of her foretopmast having gone by the board during the night. All through that afternoon and until past ten in the evening the chase continued, and early the next morning the English brought up near the Race of Alderney in fifty fathoms. Twenty-eight of the French ships followed suit, but much nearer the Race, and fifteen others further to the westward. Soon the flood tide came up strong, and some of the French began to drive. Three managed to get into Cherbourg, and the rest into the Bay of La Hogue. For those who kept their anchors a luckier fate was in store. Every one knows Mr. Browning's gallant ballad which tells how D'Amfreville, with a part of the French fleet, was steered through the rocks and shallows of the dangerous Race by a Breton pilot. Whether the poet has followed history exactly or not, it is certain that about twenty ships managed to get safe into St. Malo, and that Ashby, with the Blue Squadron, having no pilot who could take him through those intricate channels, made sail to join Russell off La Hogue.

Meanwhile Delaval was after the ships who had got safe, as they hoped, into Cherbourg, the luckless Royal Sun and two other first-rates of ninety and eighty-four guns. They were hauled up too close inshore for Delaval to follow them in till he made sure of his soundings. As Nelson did more than a hundred years later in the Baltic, Delaval saw to this himself and under a heavy fire. The next morning he sent in three fire-ships, putting himself on board one. "I hope I may say, without vanity," he wrote to Nottingham, "that the service was warm, yet effectually performed." Two of the French ships were burned at anchor: the third ran on shore, and, being deserted by all her crew, shared the same fate. One of ours was sunk, but our loss was very slight.

At noon on the 23rd the allied fleets were together again off La Hogue. Thirteen of the French fleet were anchored in the bay, as far inshore as they could be drawn. They were covered by the forts De Lisset and Saint-Vaast. Platforms had been hastily run up on which all the guns of the army had been mounted. The shoals were lined with boats filled with soldiers. On the shore were drawn up Bellefond's French and Sarsfield's Irish, and on a height commanding the whole was James himself, with the Duke of Berwick, Bellefond, Tourville, and other high officers of both arms. James was uneasy. He saw that the French sailors were disheartened, and what English sailors were he knew well. He advised that a strong force of soldiers and artillery should be sent on board the ships; but his advice was disregarded. Tourville would not consent to such a slur upon his men's courage, and even the rest thought that things must needs be well enough as they were.

Russell gave charge of the expedition to Rooke, who shifted his flag to the Eagle, as drawing less water than that which had hitherto carried it. But he soon found that the work must be done by boats alone. His orders were simple. The boats were to advance, he said, and board or burn as best they could. The boats advanced under a heavy fire from the shore. Not a musket answered; oars were the only weapons used till the men got aside, and then, scrambling on board with loud hurras, they set to work with a will. Some cut the rigging, others set fire to the vessels, others turned the guns upon the shore. Six ships were burned on the first day; on the next the work was finished. There was little resistance. As fast as the English scrambled up one side, the French scrambled down the other, and as the ships and not their crews were what our men aimed at, there was little loss of life, and but few prisoners were taken. Including those destroyed by Delaval in Cherbourg, seventeen first-rates were burned to ashes, besides several transports. Our own loss after the first day's fighting was ten men killed. And throughout the two days James stood on the heights above the bay, gazing in helpless despondency at the destruction of all his hopes. One exclamation he could not help. As he saw the English sailors swarming up the huge sides of the French ships, having thrown away their muskets to leave their hands free, and cheering as though they were at play, he cried out, "Ah, none but my brave English could do so brave an action"—words natural to an Englishman, even though that Englishman were James, but hardly politic in the circumstances. Then, when all was over, he muttered that Heaven fought against him, and withdrew sullenly to his tent.

So glorious and complete a victory was received in England in a manner worthy the occasion. Solemn prayers and a thanksgiving were ordered by Russell throughout the fleet. Rochester, Portland, Sidney, and Galloway were sent down to Portsmouth with fifty thousand pounds to distribute among the sailors. Each of the captains of the fire-ships received one hundred guineas, and the same sum was given to three who had brought the first news of our success to England. Every officer who had distinguished himself in any way was presented with a gold medal. Carter was buried at Portsmouth with all military honours. The body of Hastings was brought to London, and, escorted by the Royal Guards, and followed by four Royal carriages, laid in St. James's Church. Nor were the wounded forgotten. Forty surgeons were sent down to Portsmouth. The hospitals of St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew by the Queen's orders opened their doors to all patients from the fleet at the public charge. A more lasting memorial of Royal gratitude was not wanting. The building which Charles II. had begun at Greenwich for a Royal palace was continued by Mary to commemorate the victory gained over her brother, and many an English sailor owes to-day the comfort and happiness of his declining years to the battle of La Hogue.

SCULPTURE IN 1884.

IT is a matter of congratulation to us to see year by year that our repeated prediction of better things in store as to an English school of sculpture was not a mere expression of optimism. But while we cannot but be pleased at this definite progress, we are not blind to the shortcomings of the English school. We do not permit ourselves to say, as more than one of our contemporaries have said this year, that English sculpture is now ahead of English painting at the Royal Academy. To justify such a statement as this the general average of merit should be higher among the sculptors than among the painters. This is far from being the case. We have several examples this year which hold their own against the very best of the paintings; there are about two dozen works which are up to the average of the paintings; but below these we sink suddenly to an abyss of mediocrity and false taste. That we have so many brilliant exceptions is highly creditable and encouraging; but we must not flatter ourselves that we have a school of sculpture until such contributions as Nos. 1708, 1691, and 1775 are naturally and obviously excluded.

The exhibition at the Royal Academy is especially rich this year in large imaginative groups and figures, mainly by outsiders, for neither Mr. Armstead nor Mr. Boehm nor Mr. Brock is a contributor in this department. The most striking piece of sculpture of the year, and that which is properly set in the place of honour in the Lecture-Room, is Mr. Hamo Thornycroft's "Mower" (1856). This is the fourth statue of heroic size which Mr. Thornycroft has executed, and it proves that his powers have not been thwarted or deformed by the rapidity of his success. He has shown a fine ambition in declining to repeat in another classical figure the antique poetry of his "Artemis" of 1880 or of his "Teucer" of 1882. In his statue of this year Mr. Thornycroft, who has been steadily approaching nearer and nearer to the realists, but without ever relinquishing his hold on style, deserts antiquity for the England of to-day. He gives us the statue of a young English mower, not idealized, but only selected, in his country dress, without modification or falsification of any kind. It is a happy memorial of country life in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. There is no attempt to make too much of the subject; the young man is not doing one thing with his right hand and another with his left, but stands in the simplicity of his strength, gazing forwards and downwards at some passing object with concentrated and stolid attention. The modelling was never more learned or beautiful in any previous work of Mr. Thornycroft's, nor the flesh more finely contrasted against the various textures—the leather, the cotton, and the felt.

Another figure, smaller, but not less beautiful, is the "Icarus" of Mr. Alfred Gilbert (1855). The young athlete stands ready to take flight; his artificial wings are bound to his arms with thongs, and still droop in fine curves along his flanks. His head is swathed and bound with cloths to avoid the disturbing rush of air. His feet, which, however, are the least satisfactory part of the figure, touch the ground as if ready to abandon it. The whole statuetto is full of grace and poetry and of a pathetic sense of the fallacy of the hopes of Icarus. It is this imaginative touch of lassitude in the body and anxiety in the face which completes the charm of the whole. In passing from the study of this statuette to that of Mr. George A. Lawson's "Ave Cæsar" (1809), we traverse the space that divides a masterly work, fully carried out in every part with the artist's utmost ability, from a spirited and ambitious sketch by a sculptor who can never be persuaded to carry his work far enough. Mr. Lawson's Retiarius is brandishing his three-pronged fork with exaggerated vehemence, while his net, by an unlucky subterfuge, is drawn up at his side so voluminously as to form an obvious support to the figure. These things are evidence of haste in composition, of too great readiness to be satisfied; but the statue has excellent qualities, nevertheless. Mr. Onslow Ford's "Linos" (1680) is unfortunately placed. It is difficult to say what there is about this statue which fails to impress the eye. We examine it, and we find it to be marvellously well modelled, full of evidence of patient study from the life. But it is too purely a portrait of the body of some particular model, imperfections are slavishly reproduced rather than finer forms selected. This is the result of the neglect of style, and the pursuit of realism without imagination. Mr. Onslow Ford is technically so clever, and his work as a handicraftsman has so much improved of late, that we believe he will see, from the comparative failure of his figure this year, that more is needed than mere portraiture of the body. Mr. Browning, with his crude and fleshy statue of "Dryope" at the Grosvenor Gallery, is probably beyond the power of seeing this. We should like to commend both Mr. Ford and Mr. Browning to M. Rodin's exquisitely finished statue in bronze, "L'Âge d'Airain" (1667); M. Rodin is quite as determined a realist as they are, but he throws over his work that veil of imagination which we call style, and thereby gives the figure a charm which has power to retain the attention.

Mr. E. Roscoe Mullins is an outsider who is rapidly coming forward into the front rank. His works this year, both at the Royal Academy and the Grosvenor, give him a greater claim to notice than he has ever shown before. In the Central Hall of the Academy his strong and spirited group (1682), "Bless me, even me also, O my father," attracts the eye at once. Esau has crept along the ground towards Isaac, and presses up towards his father in an agony of suspense; the solemn blind face of the patriarch suggests his doubt and inward trouble. This group is not merely nobly conceived; it is executed with a virile force which was till lately a quality unknown in our English sculpture. In the Grosvenor Mr. Mullins exhibits two statuettes (408, 420) which possess great beauty; the marble one is a charming specimen of carved work. Mr. C. B. Birch has expended great pains on his huge group of "Lady Godiva" (1823), but he leaves us unimpressed. Mr. Pinker's large "Britannia" (1669), with a lion, shows advance upon his previous work; but as a group it is too flat. Mr. Calder Marshall's ambition is as great as ever; but his sentimental statues make a poor show among the vigorous younger work. Mr. G. Natorp, a new name, signs a massive and graceful bronze statuette of "Hercules" (1746), leaning on his club, an excellent and very promising piece. We lament to see Mr. Walter Ingram, whose work in the past has often possessed great merit, sinking to such depths of trickery as he reaches this year in his so-called "Ariel" (1783). One of the prettiest statuettes in the Royal Academy is Mr. Paul de Vigne's "Poverella" (1800), a girl with a fiddle on her knees, leaning back asleep; this is in marble exquisitely carved, and the composition is as fortunate as it can be, broad and simple, and held within close limits.

The Academy possesses some good reliefs this year. Mr. Woolner's bronze "Water Lily" (1700), a bathing-girl stepping delicately among the lily-leaves, is full of poetic charm. Mr. Henry Bates, the student whose bas-relief in the schools this spring caused quite an emotion, exhibits it here for general inspection. This "Socrates Teaching in the Agora" (1712) is without question a remarkably sound and vivid piece of work, full of qualities that are both sculpturesque and picturesque, as relief should be. We hope to see it again when Mr. Bates has translated it into marble. Another student, Mr. Henry Pegram, exhibits a version of the same theme which is very gracefully conceived. All these younger men are, we are glad to see, following the example of Mr. Thornycroft—whose influence is evidently very great among them—and are avoiding the old nerveless fashion of modelling. The Academic sculptors themselves seem to be trying to catch the new manner of touch, sometimes with rather naive results.

Iconic sculpture, in the form of important monuments, is not largely represented at the Royal Academy this year. The best portrait statue is that of "Sir Richard Temple" (1686), by Mr. T. Brock, a very spirited production; the worst is that of "Lord Frederick Cavendish" (1678), by Mr. Bruce Joy. We regret the steady decline of this artist, who in the early part of his career exhibited some graceful works, which brought his name before the public, but who has lately persisted in following the old-fashioned path that leads to mediocrity. Busts are, of course, numerous and of very varied merit. The Royal Academy contains a superb "Lord Wolseley" (1722), in bronze, and an excellent "Mr. Herbert Spencer" (1784), in terra-cotta, both by Mr. Boehm, and satisfactory in every way, full of life and character, treated with simplicity, and delicately finished. Mr. Boehm remains our best portrait sculptor, when he will give himself the trouble to put his own individuality into his work. Mr. Alfred Gilbert has never surpassed his "Study of the Head" of an old man (1699), evidently an Italian model, with flapping ears brought forward, little shrewd eyes pursed up, and thin, humorous lips drawn back in a kind of sly smile. In mere technical skill, in masterly treatment of surface, this is the most accomplished head in the Academy. We observe the beautiful exactitude with which every plane of the old wrinkled skin is reproduced without exaggeration, flatly, every atom laid on in its right place with unaffected mastery. Mr. Armstead is not fortunate this year; he is represented by a queer little figurine called "Egypt" (1688), and a still more queer "Henry III.," a marble bust of a very old-fashioned gentleman, who "the semblance of a kingly crown has on." Mr. Onslow Ford exhibits a remarkably fine bust of the Archbishop of York (1793) in the Royal Academy, and in the Grosvenor an exquisitely refined and sprightly bust of a little girl (425). What has happened to Mr. T. Nelson MacLean? He seems to have formed a fresh conception of the size and proportions of the human head. His busts this year have the brightness of touch which belongs to his work: but in every case the skull has the appearance of having been pinched and the sides pressed together. He is surely not enamoured of the eccentricities of Mr. Conrad Dressler, who comes over from Berlin to enlighten our darkness with a number of strangely sensational heads. Mr. Birch is always a conscientious artist in portraits; his head of "Mr. Wilson Barrett as Wilfred Denver" is careful and praiseworthy. Mr. Thornycroft's best bust is his "Mr. Walter Prideaux" (1720); his "Coleridge" (1788), like Mr. Brock's "Longfellow" (1786), labours at the Royal Academy under the disadvantage of work which has been executed to stand within the gloom of Westminster Abbey. At the Grosvenor, in the centre of the large room, Mr. Thornycroft exhibits an extremely graceful and poetical portrait-statuette of a lady with a book of music on her knees (411), a work full of charm and originality. Other busts demanding praise at the Royal Academy are Mr. Brock's "Rev. S. H. Booth" (1726), Mr. Pinker's "Professor Rolleston" (1730), Mr. Richmond's "Dr. Pusey" (1787), and Mr. Fontana's "Sir Moses Montefiore" (1690).

A few words in conclusion with regard to such miscellaneous works as have not been already considered. Mr. Henry Holiday's "Jacob's Ladder" (1743), a tall narrow composition in relief, like a stained glass window come to life, is decorative and accomplished. Mr. Thornycroft's "Cat" (1701), in a noble position of repose, in bronze on a slab of green Irish marble, would be a delightful household acquisition, and shows the versatility of the artist. Mr. Poynter's bronze medals (1777–1781) are interesting; they are less rough than those Professor Legros exhibited two years ago, and seem to us to be more independent of the prestige of the fifteenth century. Mr. George Simond's life-sized "Sketch of a Lion" (1776) will not pass muster, we are afraid. This is not how Barye or Hachnel modelled animals.

M. PASTEUR'S RESEARCHES ON HYDROPHOBIA.

THE results obtained by the experiments of M. Pasteur with the poison of rabies, or canine madness, bid fair, if corroborated, to be of the highest scientific and practical importance. In his recent communication to the Académie des Sciences, based on work extending over four years, M. Pasteur makes the hope reasonable that a certain process of inoculation will succeed in averting the consequences of a bite from a mad dog, and thus free humanity from one of its greatest terrors and curative medicine from one of its oldest reproaches. Following the same methods as in his experiments with the poisons of other diseases, M. Pasteur has found that the poison of rabies loses in virulence by being successively inoculated into several monkeys. By this means, after a few transmissions, the poison becomes so "attenuated" that its inoculation into dogs is harmless, while a dog so inoculated is rendered thereby proof against the original disease.

Though vaccination for small-pox has now become a quite familiar example of preventive inoculation, it is but recently that there has been any scientific extension of the underlying principle. M. Pasteur especially has been working along this line with earnestness; and in more than one instance his researches have led to definite and practical results. In the present case the importance of the experiments is obvious, not only because the disease called hydrophobia is quite common enough to be a real source of terror, but also owing to the very favourable conditions that are here presented for coming to some more definite conclusion than heretofore on the subject of preventive inoculation. The disease is so clearly conveyed from animal to animal by inoculation that the experiments made are in close conformity with the mode of natural transmission, and when the efficacy of the new "vaccination" is proved in dogs we may fairly conclude that the process is likely to succeed with men. The matter is not complicated here as it may be in the case of many other diseases, such as consumption and cholera, with the question as to how far the animal and the man are similarly affected. Rabies in the dog and hydrophobia in the man may be assumed to be due to one and the same poison, its transmissibility from the one to the other being open to no reasonable doubt. Although, as M. Pasteur says, the time may still be distant when canine madness will be extinguished by this process of vaccination, there seems to be good reason for hoping, should his results be established, that the consequences of a bite from a mad dog may be prevented. For, though it would be of course unlikely that men would submit themselves to inoculation to forestall the risk of such an accidental disease as hydrophobia, there is ground for believing that, owing to the long period of incubation after a bite, the patient bitten by a mad dog may be rendered insusceptible by inoculation before the mortal malady has had time to declare itself.

Whatever may be the result of further investigations, and the testing of these experiments which is to be carried out by a Government Commission at the request of M. Pasteur, it cannot be denied that the methods followed are strictly philosophical, and that the objects in view are of the greatest scientific and practical value. The French Government is to be congratulated for so promptly appointing a Commission of scientific men of indisputable authority to assist and check these interesting experiments, the names of Villemin, Vulpian, Bert, and Bouley lending no small weight to the prospective results of the inquiry. The test experiments proposed by M. Pasteur consist (1) in causing twenty unprotected dogs and twenty "vaccinated" dogs (presumably protected thereby from the poison) to be bitten by dogs in a rabid state; and (2) in artificially inoculating with the virus of rabies two other sets of twenty dogs, respectively vaccinated and unvaccinated. "The twenty vaccinated dogs," says M. Pasteur, "will resist the poison, and the other twenty will all die of madness." The results of these trials can hardly fail to be largely decisive of the question one way or the other, and will be an unequivocal illustration of the value of experimental pathology. It is to be hoped that at some no distant date an English Government may be found to extend the same kind of aid to all-important researches of this nature as has been so lately given in Germany to the work of Dr. Koch in relation to the cholera-poison, and now again in France to the brilliantly conceived investigations of M. Pasteur. We are yet but on the threshold of new inquiries into the nature and causes of disease which may turn out to be of a value beyond all present expectation.

THE HEALTH EXHIBITION.

THE International Health Exhibition is gradually assuming something of the unity of design its promoters anticipated, and is arising beautiful out of chaos. There is still, however, much to be effected before the show can be pronounced finished. Such important features as the water exhibit and the section devoted to China are far from complete. What is, perhaps, more to the purpose, there already exist attractions self-sufficient and powerful enough to render the success of the Exhibition beyond all doubt. In the bewildering maze of galleries and annexes, full of multitudinous and varied objects of interest, two features of the show are so prominently and indisputably admirable that alone they should assure popularity. These are the representation of old London and the gallery of historical costumes illustrated chronologically by means of wax figures. The larger portion of Mr. G. H. Birch's reproduction of old London inns and houses is now externally complete, and the result is certainly a most felicitous realization of a romantic conception. Nothing can be more delightful, more perfectly illusive, more full of charm and interest, than this admirable work. The buildings, which are most accurately reproduced, are so happily disposed and contrasted that the aspect of the street, from whatever point of view, is ever charming; the solidity of the work, the clever simulation of age, and the wear of weather, the successful tone of the whole, the cunning carving, are all surprising, and contribute to the harmonious ensemble. Just now the shops are unoccupied, save one, where, in the shadow of All Hallows Church, the workers in iron pursue their craft; when, however, all is completed, the scene will be one of increased charm and animation. Outside the church may be seen a veritable specimen of the stocks, a very pleasant touch of realism. One great source of interest in these quaint buildings lies in their fidelity to the originals, all of which were of more or less historical fame; and the stroller in the street, particularly if he be not one of a crowd, must be dull indeed if he do not feel his imagination quicken by the suggestion and store of poetry about him. If he be fortunate enough to pass the portal of Bishopsgate when the street is nearly free from visitors, he will feel the full beauty and quiet of the scene and note the happy effect of the young green of the tree against the iron-workers' shop, and observe and bewail the anachronism—the telegraph-wires high overhead against the blue sky; or, standing by the church, he will have over against him the famous house of Dick Whittington, once in Crutched Friars, which is here so excellently reproduced that, though shorn of its carving and gilding, it is a marvel of craft and deft handiwork. Adjoining this stately dwelling is a remarkable interior, a fine reproduction of the Hall of the Brotherhood of the Holy Trinity, Aldersgate Street, with its old stained glass and noble roof excellently copied. The manifold allurements of the scene might even detain the enthusiastic disciple of the newest notion in hygiene, the earnest but errant pilgrim whose aim is the vegetarian dinner, the most preoccupied scientist, or the most indefatigable sightseer. The work is infinitely creditable to Mr. Birch's knowledge and taste, to the builders employed, and to the City Companies at whose cost it is undertaken.

The scope of the Exhibition is so immense, its aims so comprehensive, that literal people who love exactitude and absolute definitions will certainly, after a patient survey, address to themselves the query, What is health? and also what has this picturesque presentation of old London to do with health? And the natural answer is that it has as much relation to the subject as the wax-figures, the open-air fêtes, the glove-making, mustard manufactory, and a hundred other sights of a great popular show. To the serious person, possessed of one or more crotchets, and bent on proselytism, many are the stumbling-blocks and causes of offence in the Exhibition. If the father of a young and tender family, he will not consider the public display of the making of sweets, with its inevitable sale, conducive to health; if a vegetarian of pronounced views, he will scarcely regard the frozen New Zealand mutton with equanimity; or if a total abstainer, the show of beer-barrels and wine samples in the Food Gallery will exercise his mind. Another class of inflexible minds will, it is feared, fail to perceive the subtle connexion with the subject of the collection in the Science and Art Department, the aquarium, Mr. Rowland Ward's case of stuffed poultry, tobacco, dried vegetables, wall-paper, aërated drinks of wonderful nomenclature, and a hundred other incongruities. Liberal, however, as is the accepted interpretation of the term, the Health Exhibition might have been even more comprehensive without affording reasonable ground of complaint. Contiguous to the reproduction of old London, for instance, we might have enjoyed the advantage of an accurate copy of modern London that would offer practical and pungent illustration of defective drainage and the evils of overcrowding; and what the young lady in Punch calls "such a sweet slum" would undoubtedly prove highly attractive. It should of course be absolutely isolated, and encircled if possible by water, across which boat-loads of earnest reformers might be conveyed on due receipt of toll. Road-watering and cleansing, and paving, the vagaries of dust-contractors, the influence of barrel-organs and church-bells upon the nervous system, and other cognate matters interesting to the townsman, might also be illustrated. These suggestions are made in no carping spirit, but rather in commendation of the scheme of an Exhibition which many will think far too comprehensive.

Every day visible progress is made towards desired completeness, and in a few weeks the quality and importance of the Exhibition may be accurately estimated. The adequacy with which it illustrates the progress and present condition of sanitary science may then appropriately be considered, together with the numerous hygienic appliances exhibited, the multifarious and elaborate systems of ventilation and drainage, and other subjects of equal importance. At present the more popular aspect of the show is most prominently presented, and the Executive and Committee may be congratulated on the wisdom and discretion of their endeavours to gratify popular instincts and prepossessions without imperilling the integrity of their special object—the practical illustration of the science of health.

MR. S. WARD.

THERE are some men widely known and valued for their social power of whom the public in general hears little. They do no one piece of work which gives them a place before the world; but in their daily life they exercise an influence which, as years go by, increases constantly. In the death of Mr. Sam Ward, of New York, there has passed away from among us—for Mr. Ward was as well known socially in Europe as in America—a man of great sweetness and kindliness of nature. Mr. Ward had had many experiences, and had lived among all sorts and conditions of men. Many different versions are current as to his life and character, and most of them are true. By some he would be spoken of as the best of good fellows; by others, as one of the justest and honestest men they had ever known; by others, as the most faithful of friends and the most genial of hosts. According to the point of view from which people regarded him, and to the relation in which they stood to him, the accounts which they gave varied; but all accounts agreed in having a pleasant word to say about him. His life was a curious and a chequered one. Born of wealthy parents in New England, he inherited a considerable fortune, and by his own exertions greatly added to his already ample means. Family and business connexions increased his wealth, till, by those changes of fortune not uncommon in America, it passed away. Before he had passed middle life he found himself a poor man. In America such changes are not unusual, and a man who has not succeeded at first may easily and honourably recover his position as years advance.

In his time Mr. Ward was a little of everything. He tried finance in California during the early days of what was then only a settlement; but found nothing there but failure and disappointment. He lived among the Indians, and made himself a name as a mighty hunter. He dug gold in the Sierras. He became an expert "lobbyist" at Washington; and those who know how "lobbying" is managed will be best able to appreciate his talents in this respect. His ready tact and wide knowledge of human nature in all its aspects enabled him to fulfil this function with the dexterity which the task requires. He knew, in dealing with each individual, which was the right string to touch. He was an attractive and, as some people put it, a "magnetic" nature. Among the roughest of men he never failed to win good will or to impart a sense of confidence in him to them. He was able to see the good in others with whom he had to deal, and, at the same time, to see and to use their defects. It was this keen and, at the same time, kindly understanding of his fellow-men which enabled him to become the social power which he was, both in America and in Europe. Notwithstanding his many occupations and scanty leisure, he found time to cultivate his mind. He read much, and had learned the art, invaluable to a busy man, of sifting the wheat from the chaff in what he read. In studying literature he added much to his already practical knowledge of mankind. He had friends scattered all over the world. There was hardly a State in the Union where the name of Sam Ward was not known, and where his introduction was not a passport to all the pleasantest society in the State. In Europe he was equally well known in social circles, and he may be said to be one of those who have, of late years, contributed not a little to foster the good feeling between England and America which exists, and which, we hope, may long continue to exist and increase. In the entertainments which he gave at his own house he showed always a quick and rare sense of the fitness of people to meet one another. Nobody there found himself near somebody whom he would rather not have anything to do with. The result was that wherever, whether in Europe or America, his friends came to visit him they were sure of a pleasant and harmonious meeting. Although he was a good American, he was one of that class of Americans who, so to speak, bridge over the Atlantic—who help to make the New World intelligible to the Old, and the Old to the New. We have often expressed an opinion that this cannot be done by the American putting off from him what is characteristic of his own nationality, and trying to be (what he is not, and cannot become) a European. But it can be done, and in the simplest and most natural way, by the free intercourse of Europeans with Americans. One of the most hopeful of the signs of the time is that large numbers of Englishmen, and among them not the least distinguished, are reciprocating the interest which America has long felt towards Europe, and especially towards the mother-country. Social reciprocity is, in fact, only another term for political reciprocity. Personal relations, constant, mutual, and friendly, between large numbers of families on both sides of the Atlantic, are a perpetual and an increasing guarantee of political harmony between the two great English-speaking nations. When Americans come to feel themselves at home in London and Englishmen in Boston or New York, it will be hard to create a serious quarrel between the two countries. Few Americans have done as much as Mr. Sam Ward to foster good feeling in social life between the old and the new country, and his death is an event which may be regretted by more persons than those who have had the happiness of knowing him personally.

THE THEATRES.

THERE is a strange disagreement between the English version of the popular vaudeville Mamzelle Nitouche at the Opera Comique and its representation; the one is fairly faithful and intelligible, the other a perversion compacted of caricature and coarseness. It is but just to Miss Lotta, who impersonates Denise de Flavigny, to concede that when she unreservedly abandons her rôle—which is pretty frequently—and favours the audience with her original American notion, she is decidedly amusing. After her first serious attempt, in the opening scene, to represent the young lady of the convent, she abandons herself to expressing her own wayward individuality; she is full of trick and fun and antic; she dances with spirit and agility, sometimes with grace; she displays a vast capacity for facial pantomime and the humours of burlesque, and, in short, does everything but sing, and is anything but the ingenuous Denise. Miss Lotta's singing is distressingly colourless and thin, and the physical disability of her vocal powers is unredeemed by any charm of expression or sweetness of tone. Her failure to realize the piquancy of the part she undertakes, its agreeable blending of the devout ingénue and the merry-hearted schoolgirl whose pent-up vivacity finds sudden vent, is more remarkable than her defective vocalization. Of acting, properly so called, there is nothing in her performance; Denise de Flavigny is always Miss Lotta.

The piece is very unequally presented; the convent scene is mounted in curiously primitive fashion, and is absurdly ineffective, while the Pontarcy theatre is admirably displayed, considering stage limitations. Throughout the representation the strong comic element of the vaudeville appeared to be in constant conflict with the spirit of burlesque, with which in the original it has nothing in common. The airs and graces of Corinne, the star of the Pontarcy company, are prettily displayed by Miss Woodworth; and the director of the theatre is capitally played by Mr. John Phipps, whose horror and dismay at the defection of Corinne, just before the rise of the curtain, are well rendered. Mr. Robert Pateman undertakes the irascible Major with efficiency, and sings with excellent effect his humorous ballad of the Masher on horseback. The Celestin of Mr. Wyatt is a bright and droll conception, and his dance in the first act is clever and individual. Mr. F. Darrell does full justice to his songs as Champlatreux, and the minor parts of the officers are filled by Messrs. Barton and Chudleigh.

M. Hervé's music seems to be undergoing a revival just now, with Nitouche and La Cosaque and Chilpéric; and what was once the only form of opera-bouffe that successfully competed with Offenbach appears still to possess popularity and attraction. At the Empire, however, where an arrangement of Chilpéric by Messrs. Hersée and H. B. Farnie is performed, the opera is regarded as a means to spectacular display, and is justly entitled by the librettists "a grand musical spectacle." The theatre itself is an important addition to the sights of London, and a powerful attraction; it is not less remarkable for sumptuous display, excellent design, an agreeable impression of space and air, than for the substantial convenience and comfort of its arrangements.

The production of the opera accords thoroughly with the house's extraneous attractions. Some of the scenes are masterpieces of craftsmanship, of pictorial power, of ingenuity and illusion. In the first act the scene of the Mistletoe Grove, in which the pretty pastoral ballet occurs, with the famous ensemble of umbrellas, the grey old oaks and a charming distance of bosky dell are admirably realized with an effect of sunshine we have never seen paralleled except in the final tableau of the piece. Another remarkable scene represents Chilpéric's throne-room, from the balcony of which is obtained a most vivid and realistic view of a ravine in the mountains; still better is the night scene of the Gothic camp, save that the moon might be more luminous, when fifty Amazons enter, each of whom carries three electric lamps of various colours. The manœuvres of the ballet are carried out with wonderful precision and with brilliant effect, the peculiar star-like radiance of the moving lights being equally novel and charming. The change from this scene to the ramparts of the castle is one of the best mechanical scenic effects ever realized. The ballets are excellently devised, and the dancing very good, and more attention than usual is given to the arrangement and grouping, the colours and tone of the costumes being well harmonized. In the Spanish ballet of the second act Signorina Emma Bessone's exquisite dancing is calculated by its grace and delicacy and individual charm to revive the declining interest in the ballet; her style is full of fascination, singularly free from mannerism, and undebased by mere gymnastic feats.

Mr. Herbert Standing acts with becoming dignity and spirit as Chilpéric, and gives good effect to the music; Mr. Harry Paulton fills the pauses in the music with a number of topical references delivered in his dry sententious manner; M. Paulus, as the jester Rigolboche, sings his gallant and audacious songs with abundant verve and vivacity. Miss Camille d'Arville is an admirable Fredégonda in appearance, but her singing is deficient in animation occasionally, as in her tame rendering of the air "Canst thou recall thy words of promise?" when she throws the jewels at Chilpéric's feet. Miss Sallie Turner has too slight scope for her humour as Doña Tuberosa. Miss Madge Shirley fills the part of Galsuinda efficiently and agreeably.

SOME PROBABLE CONSEQUENCES OF THE NEW YORK PANIC.

THE panic in New York has been stayed by the action of the Clearing House Banks and the Secretary of the Treasury; but it is by no means certain that there may not yet be several serious failures. In the meanwhile, the publication on Saturday last of the weekly return of the Clearing House Banks reveals to us the steps by which the panic was brought about. The banks all over the country had lent enormous sums to promote all kinds of enterprises, very many of them exceedingly risky; and when the drain of gold from New York set in during February, the banks of that city found their reserves ebbing away. In consequence they had to take measures to contract the volume of their loans; and they therefore called upon borrowers to repay to them part of the advances made. In the week ended May 10 the reduction in the loans made by the Clearing House Banks amounted to 1¾ millions sterling, and last week the reduction exceeded 1¼ millions sterling. In the fortnight, that is, the reduction exceeded 3 millions sterling. In reality the calling in of loans was much greater. On the day the panic broke out the presidents of the Clearing House Banks met together and pledged themselves to stand by one another, and also to help solvent banks outside the Association. It is admitted that in the two following days they lent 3 millions sterling; and, if we assume that during the two other days of the panic they lent only half as much more, their total loans last week would have amounted to about 4½ millions sterling. Yet, in spite of these immense advances, the total of their loans, as we have seen, decreased during the week more than 1¼ million sterling. Consequently the calling in in the first two or three days of the week must have amounted to nearly 5 millions sterling. Unfortunately the borrowers were unable to repay the sums due by them. To fulfil their engagements they threw vast masses of stocks upon the markets, and by so doing they lowered prices so greatly that all holders of securities got frightened. Everybody feared that his turn would come next to be called upon by the banks to repay; and everybody, therefore, was anxious to accumulate with his banker as large a balance as possible. All at once, therefore, all the world became sellers, and nobody would buy. Several failures were the result; and, had it not been for the decision just referred to of the Clearing House Banks and for the intervention of the Secretary of the Treasury, the failures would have been very much more numerous and for immense amounts. As it was, it is admitted that the Clearing House Banks had to assist six banks, besides numerous private bankers, savings banks, and stockbroking and other firms. Moreover, the branches of the Canadian banks in New York lent very largely, and the agents of English, Dutch, and German houses are reported to have advanced on a most liberal scale. The commercial community was thus reassured, and the panic ended. But it is quite evident that the market is still in a state of unstable equilibrium. The banks, as we see, have lent immense sums, which the borrowers for the moment are unable to repay. No doubt, the banks hold security which in the long run will prove to be amply sufficient; but for the moment there is no market for this security, and consequently, to use the accepted phrase, the resources of the banks are "locked up." Provided depositors are content to leave their money with the banks, and that no untoward accident happens, all will come right in the end. But an accident might renew the crisis at any moment. In any case it is clear that the consequences of so great a shock to credit must be grave, and must continue for a considerable time.

The go-ahead portion of the community (the men who construct new railways, found new works, open out new districts, establish new trades, and extend old businesses; the men, in short, whom their admirers describe as the pioneers of industry, and their detractors denounce as speculative promoters) have been crippled by the panic. They are deeply indebted to the banks and cannot meet their engagements, and therefore their credit for the time being is gone. The banks on their side, even if they were willing to aid new enterprises, are hardly in a position to do so. They have lent so much already that they will not part with any more of their resources except upon security that can be realized at any moment. Their inclination, rather, will be to diminish by every practicable means the loans they have made. Consequently, there will be no new enterprise for some time to come. The check to trade will thus be increased, and the tendency for some time to come will be to close works that have hitherto been kept open, and to reduce the number of persons employed. The people who have suffered particularly by the panic are those who in America live most luxuriously. They make fortunes rapidly and they spend them liberally. Consequently, they will be compelled to sell equipages, to move into less palatial residences, and altogether to live upon a humbler scale. The result of this will be that all who are employed in ministering to luxuries will suffer considerably; the profits of those trades will be greatly reduced, and very often will disappear, while wages also will fall. Furthermore, it is known that several railways are seriously embarrassed. Some of them are old and have never really been out of difficulty; others are new and have not yet obtained enough remunerative traffic. As long as times were good the directors of these Companies were able to borrow to pay their current liabilities; but immediately after such a shock to credit, it is very improbable that they will be able to continue this borrowing process. The likelihood is, therefore, that over several of these lines receivers will have to be appointed; and it may be expected that when these Companies are unable to pay the interest on their debts, and have to pass into the hands of receivers, there will be a further depreciation of railway property, and consequently that the trade depression will in this way be further increased. In the long run, of course, all this will right itself. The United States still contain immense tracts of unoccupied land, and the workpeople who are thrown out of employment in the older parts of the Union will settle down upon this land, will enlarge the cultivated area, and after a while will add considerably to the wealth of the country. In this way a resident population will be formed in the districts where the new railways have been built, and traffic will grow up over them; but in the interval it is reasonable to expect that there will be a good deal of distress throughout the country.

One of the reasons why the depreciation of railway property has been so great is that the demand for agricultural produce in Europe has fallen off. The competition of other countries with America has increased so greatly that the prices of raw produce have fallen lower than they have ever been known to be before. In consequence, the American farmers have been unwilling to sell their corn and cotton, and the railways have lost the traffic. The probability is that the increased depression likely to be caused by the panic will diminish also in the older States of the Union the demand for Western produce; wages will be lowered by all the methods already described; workpeople will be thrown out of employment; and, in consequence, the population will consume less than it has hitherto done. In another way, too, this will be brought about; for the Railway Companies—even those that are perfectly solvent—will be under the necessity of reducing their working expenses, and the readiest way of doing that is to lower wages and to lessen the number of persons employed. Altogether, then, there will be a smaller demand for the produce of the West both in Europe and in the older States of the Union; there will consequently be a fall of prices in America itself, and the prosperity of the agricultural classes will thereby be reduced. It will be in the recollection of our readers that about ten years ago a somewhat similar state of things existed. Then the farmers of the West and North-West found themselves so seriously distressed that they formed a great association, which was chiefly directed against the Railway Companies. A series of good harvests in America and bad harvests in Europe practically put an end to the Granger agitation. The farmers became more prosperous, and with prosperity they ceased to grumble. But now that adverse times are coming upon them again, it is reasonable to expect that the Granger movement will spring into life once more. Doubtless it will be partially directed, as before, against the Railway Companies; but it is also likely to add greatly to the movement in favour of Free-trade, or, at least, of a great reduction in the Customs duties. The West and South are little interested in manufactures; they are purely, or almost purely, agricultural, and their interest clearly is to promote the freest intercourse with all other countries. Since the beginning of the Granger movement there has been a very marked progress of Free-trade ideas in the West. The last elections to Congress show that conclusively. And recent events are likely to stimulate still more the Free-trade movement. When farmers are unable to sell their crops remuneratively, they will listen more readily to those who tell them that the necessaries of life are made dear to them for the purpose of subsidizing the great manufactures of the Eastern and middle States, and that thus their own markets in Europe are closed against them. Even in the Eastern and middle States it is remarkable that the agitation against the high Customs duties is spreading. An important meeting of merchants and manufacturers has just been held in New York in aid of the movement for the reduction of duties; and even some of the New England manufacturers themselves are declaring in favour of the abolition of all duties upon raw materials. The manufacturers, in fact, are beginning to see that the imposition of duties on raw materials is not an advantage even to themselves. No doubt there is still a very strong Protectionist party in the United States. The iron industry particularly is wedded to Protection, and so also is the woollen manufacture, while the Railway Companies are almost universally opposed to a reduction of the present duties. The old railways were built at a time when iron and steel were made artificially dear by high protective duties, and they fear that if iron and steel are made cheap by the abolition of these duties, a stimulus will be given to the construction of new railways which by their competition will injure themselves. The Protectionist party therefore is very strong, and may be expected to make a hard fight; but, if the depression continues and deepens, the probability is that the movement in favour of a considerable reduction in the Customs duties will become irresistible, all the more because the rapid redemption of the debt is in itself an unanswerable argument against the existing system.

FOLK-LORE AND MYTHS.*

BOOKS on folk-lore and myth now come in battalions. We do not know whether a wide public is interested in these topics. Probably as "none but minstrels like of sonneting," so none but active folk-lorists care for folk-lore. Of active folk-lorists, however, there is no lack in England, France, America, Spain, Italy, and Greece. Miss Emerson's book on the myths of the Red Indians has an alluring title. Only people who have tried to "blaze" a path through the forest of the mythology of the West know the intricacies and difficulties of the subject. Our evidence is scattered in a myriad books of travel, most of them unhappily rare. We have to be on our guard against the bias of the reporters, which takes Protean shapes. Our chief early authority for Mexico, Sahagun, was an intrepid Euhemerist. When he speaks of Aztec gods as if they had once been real mortals, is he stating his own inference, or giving us Mexican popular opinion, or the view of learned Aztec priests and philosophers? Old Bernal Diaz has a sturdy belief that the strange gods were "devils," and that is enough for him. Missionaries have been eager to find traces of "primitive monotheism" among the Red Indian tribes, and have very probably altered their wild cosmogonies and their rude system of dualism into close conformity with the Biblical narrative. The enthusiasts who see Jews and Welsh and Aryans everywhere have all to be tackled, and many other theorists too, before we can get at all a clear view of American mythology. To our minds, the beliefs of the Continent show their earliest extant shape in the Zoomorphic legends of the least cultivated peoples, Ahts and Thlinkeets. Among the comparatively settled Iroquois and Algonquins the anthropomorphic element grows more powerful; and, finally, among the semi-civilized empires religion and myth present the same state of savage survival and priestly allegory and symbol as we find among races like the Egyptians. This, at least, is a system which permits of an orderly arrangement of myths. We advance historically from the fables of the races of the sparsest culture to those of races almost civilized. Unluckily, Miss Emerson's book is almost without system. She begins with conceptions like "The Thought of the Infinite," "Antecedent God," and the like highly abstract conceptions which could not be reached in the beginnings of thought and speculation. Her theory appears to be that, from a conception of the Infinite, men advance or rather retreat to a personification of the Wind, and to representations of "The God of Air, Breath Master." "Within and embodied by 'this homogeneous ether which may have been the germ of the world,' is the Indian's Great Spirit, the Soul of Lives." The Great Spirit is probably a post-Christian reflection

* Indian Myths. By Ellen Russell Emerson. London: Trübner & Co. 1884.

The Trojan War. By Professor C. Witt. Translated by Miss Younghusband. London: Longmans & Co.

of missionary teaching, and it is surely an anachronism to fancy that the early fathers of the tribes conceived of "the homogeneous ether which may have been the germ of the world," a text borrowed from Mr. Everett's Science of Thought. A vast gulf divides Mr. Everett from the primitive pow-wow. The truth is that Red Indian myths should be studied, first, in comparison with other savage myths, which they closely resemble. Where Miss Emerson finds parallels in Assyrian or Vedic lore, these parallels are due to the survival of barbaric ideas (everywhere very similar) among comparatively civilized peoples, not to any "Aryan" influences of language or race among the Red Men. For example, the story of Ymir, and the story of Chokanipok, and of how the world, or things in the world, was made out of their bodies, is the story of Purusha in the Rig Veda, and occurs again in Berosus, and has parallels in Greece and in Egypt, and in Mangaia. But it would be quite a mistake to hold that the Indian was borrowed from the Scandinavian tale; nor does Miss Emerson actually uphold that opinion. But she does compare "the Indian word Yowah, or Yohowah, and the Hebrew Jovah, or Jehovah," and even seems inclined to drag our old friend Dyaus into the medley, though Yowah appears to be no more a "sacred name" than our "hurrah." Again, speaking of Michabos, the Great Hare God, she can write, "The association of ideas in the name of the vegetarian animal wabos, and that of the vegetable wah ah, together with that of the sun, is apparent"—and yet we do not see it. All the mysticism which derives the Hare God from names of the Light, or from the fire of his angry eyes (a queer theory enough), neglects the fact that almost every known animal is a god somewhere, and that surely all their names cannot have been unconscious puns on the name of the Sun, nor all their eyes or coats suggestive of Fire or Dawn. Sometimes Miss Emerson is obscure, if not unintelligible, as in this sentence:—"From this fact" (the use of a mystic name for the Bear in the magic chant), "and the belief in an elder brother Manitto, or spirit guardian of its species, it may be concluded that totem names were given animals which were of similar sacred import to those given the chief of clans, and this was the name of invocation." We have read this passage again and again, because Totemism is so specially important in American religion, and yet we can make no sense of it. Miss Emerson is still in the gall of bitterness; for she says Totem is "correctly do-daim," whereas Mr. Max Müller knows a scholar who declares that otem or ote is the real word. But when Miss Emerson adds that the Totem was "always some animated object," one comes reluctantly to the conclusion that she does not understand her subject at all. In the very next paragraph she disproves her own assertion, if it is her own, for it is printed in unleaded type. Miss Emerson's book, in short, is of little or no value as a reasoned account of American myths. Her extracts from books are often useful; we have derived from her much information, and heard of many sources of knowledge. For this reason her work should be on the shelves of anthropologists. But her references, as a rule, are perfectly vague; she sends one to "Schoolcraft" or "Tanner," or whoever it may be, or to the Relations, often without naming the volume, date, or page of the work she has in her mind. Müller's well-known work does not seem to have been much consulted by Miss Emerson, yet his general ideas are rational and deserve attention. Miss Emerson prints some sacred chants of the Red Men in their own picture-writing. The Deluge myth thus stated on pp. 351, 353 deserves attention. The similarity of Deluge myths all over the world can hardly be accounted for as the result of missionary teaching. There is so much useful matter in Miss Emerson's book that we may recommend it, with due caution, to every one interested in the obscure religious notions of the Western races.

Mr. Geldart has done a kindness, we think, both to folk-lorists and children in publishing his tales from the modern Greek. It is true that some of these märchen retain so much of savagery that sensitive parents will doubt whether they "should be placed in the hands of the young." The cannibalism, especially, seems quite as marked a feature, and is dwelt on with quite as much relish, as in stories from the Zulu or the Bushman languages. But children prefer these tales; "tell us a story, a story where somebody was eated up," says a very young and artless friend of the reviewer's. People are "eated up" at a great rate in these stories from modern Greece, and Thyestes would have found himself quite at home among his cannibal descendants. Nay, two parents propose to eat their own children, which the Zulu lady cannibal only attempted (without success) when she had devoured the whole neighbourhood. The tales were already known in Von Hahn's book, but Mr. Geldart has gone to original Greek texts. He has been obliged to omit much, and the parts he has left out are just those most useful to the student of early manners and ideas surviving in popular tradition. Mr. Geldart's short preface deals little with theory, though he recognizes "solar signification" in the adventures of Scabpate. "His tumbling in the mire, his horses of various hue, his javelin wherewith he slays his rival .... are so many ways of representing the struggle of the sun with clouds and darkness, and depicting its final triumph over storm and gloom." Why? Cannot the hero of a story fall in the mire, and own several horses and a magical javelin, without the sun being concerned in the matter? Men must always have been more interested in human affairs than in solar phenomena. Even when they attributed human adventures to the sun the interest was human first, solar afterwards, and they did not need, having raised a mortal to the skies, to bring him down again, in order to construct a story. In the tale referred to by Mr. Geldart we have the usual Drakos who pervades Greek folk-lore. Things are told of him which are told of "the last of the Pechs" in Scotland. Here he has either succeeded to a myth about Minos and his magical hair, or else Minos, in classic myth, had ousted an earlier Drakos. The idea of the separable strength, or soul, is very common in savage myth and household tale (Primitive Culture, ii. 153; Maspero, Contes Egyptiens, "Les Deux Frères"). The notion is found among the Samoyeds. The tale of "Starbright and Birdie," which begins with the most horrible and "endophagous" cannibalism, has as wide a circulation as any in the world. Two children are about to be eaten by their parents; the dog warns them to run away; they are pursued by the mother; throw a comb behind them, and it becomes a thick forest. By other magical means they delay pursuit. The boy is turned into an animal, the girl is wooed by a prince; after hard adventures both are turned, "by God's pity," into stars. In classical myth the earlier part becomes the tale of Prixus and Helle. They are to be sacrificed, not eaten, and are helped, not by a talking dog, but by a talking ram. A Samoyed version is given by Castren (Eth. Vorles. p. 164). The Kaffir shape is in "The Bird that made Milk" (Theal's Kaffir Folk-Lore, p. 30). Again, in Kaffir ("Demane and Demazana") comes a combination of two of Grimm's German variants, which very closely resemble the Greek story translated by Mr. Geldart. The incident of throwing down the comb which changes into a forest is found all over the world, in Samoa, Japan, Lithuania, among the Samoyeds, and so forth. In short the tale is a typical tale, a test case. It is all men's property—not merely what Mr. Geldart calls Indogermanisches Gemeingut. How did this happen? If we knew, the secret of the diffusion of myths would be unriddled. Mr. Geldart's volume is very prettily got up, and we think it will be a favourite with readers in the nursery.

Miss Younghusband has rendered, out of the German of Professor Witt, a good, clear, steady version of the tale of Troy, from the wedding of Peleus to the sack (complete or incomplete) of Ilios. There is no modern sentiment, and, we are truly thankful to say, no modern solar theory in this useful little book. The charm of Hawthorne's and Kingsley's classical tales is absent, but misleading and vexatious hypotheses about the dawn being everybody in general, and Helen in particular, are absent also. Professor Witt "tells a plain tale" very plainly; the fancy of children will supply the glamour of romance. The book will be useful in the lower forms of schools.

FIVE NOVELS.*

THE three books which head our list have certain marked features in common. From internal evidence they are apparently all first novels, indeed the author of Torwood's Trust acknowledges as much in her dedication. Then all the authors have a profound belief in disguise, in "making up" as a common and successful practice in modern society, and they are all about on a level as regards character drawing and style. There is nothing "fast," though much that is criminal, about any of the dramatis personæ of these novels. The gentlemen and ladies, when not the ordinary well-conducted individuals of humdrum daily life, are desperadoes and villains of the old type, to whom fraud and murder are as the air they breathe. This is particularly the case in The Violinist of the Quartier Latin. We begin with a florid description of Government House at Singapore, where the Governor, Sir Arthur Hildyard, is awaiting the return of his daughter Ethel from England. This young lady, whom an experienced reader soon suspects of being another young lady, had a tendency to turn pale and faint at the sight of letters addressed to herself in "a cramped and uneducated hand." Under pressure, she at last revealed to her father that they came from a young artist, Louis Osborne by name, who first rescued her from drowning in the river close to her former home in Berkshire, and, a short time later, proposed to jump in with her unless she would swear then and there to become his. The river is probably the "mountain stream" alluded to later. Sir Arthur naturally suggested that the man was a lunatic, but Ethel was not to be quieted till she received another letter, this time written in "a bold masculine hand," informing her that her tormentor was dead. From that moment she started on a career of social triumph, unequalled both in Asia and Europe. It culminated in Paris; where one evening, when "faultlessly attired" (why cannot novelists say "beautifully dressed"?), she accepted the proposal made to her in the following terms by Prince Ivan Suwaroff (vol. i. p. 100):—

"Ethel Hildyard, ask me not to relinquish this hand; it is the one thing I most covet, and without it life will be valueless to me. Loveliest of the lovely, and peerless among women, accept the devotion of my life. You are the exquisite embodiment of my fairest dreams; become the sharer of my fortunes; bind yourself to me indissolubly by the sweetest and tenderest of ties, and reign henceforth as mistress of my destiny; even as you are already mistress of my heart's best affections."

* The Violinist of the Quartier Latin. By G. Curzon. 3 vols. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1884.
Torwood's Trust. By Evelyn Everett Green. 3 vols. London: Richard Bentley & Son. 1884.
Down the Way. By Hope Stanford. 3 vols. London: Maxwell. 1884.
Her Washington Season. By Jeannie Gould Lincoln. Boston: Osgood. London: Trübner & Co. 1884.
Soldier and Servant. By Ella M. Baker. Boston: Lothrop. London: Trübner & Co. 1884.

But, alas! not even the devotion of a prince who spoke in such elegant language, in several elegant languages, could keep trouble from her, and events fell out in this wise. Ethel's fascination and musical talents may be gauged by the fact that one evening she "played a few solemn chords, and then sang the Stabat Mater, while Sir Arthur listened spell-bound." Not content with this difficult and prolonged musical feat, Ethel composed an opera called La Sorcière, which was performed at the house of a great lady in Paris, the composer herself undertaking the heroine's part. The opera was an entire success, as may be gathered when we mention that the heroine, "whose drooping form" was supported by her lover, while "her head rested upon his shoulder," sang the song which she "knew instinctively would immortalize her," and "moved all present to tears." It was soon however Ethel's own turn to weep, or rather to faint, for on the way she caught sight of the gentleman who wrote the uneducated hand and whom she believed to be dead. After this the dénouement was not long delayed. The letter-writer and his brother sought an interview with Sir Arthur, explained that the real Ethel Hildyard was dead, and the young lady passing under that name was their cousin Adrienne St. Clair, daughter of an Austrian Ambassador, and granddaughter of an American President; that Sir Arthur's brother and Adrienne's father had concocted this scheme, and that Adrienne (as she had stated) had promised to marry the elder of the two accusers, Louis Osborne or Onslow. Ethel, or Adrienne, on hearing that all was discovered, fainted, positively for the last time, and departed in the night, and not all the skill of the detectives could find her. Where were M. Le Coq, Pédouche, Jottrat, or even Milord? We shall expect the whole body of officials in the Rue de Jérusalem to rise up in indignant denial at this imputation! However, of course Ethel betook herself to the Quartier Latin in the disguise of a University student (a male student), and combined good works with playing the violin at a theatre. One day she overheard a gang of desperadoes plotting to rob Prince Suwaroff's villa on the Seine and murder the inhabitants. As a rule, even the most hardened villains prefer, for their own sakes, only to resort to murder in extremity; but these miscreants determined that an Englishman visiting at the villa should be "slaughtered" with the rest. One might have thought that by this time Ethel would have been hardened to surprises; but she was much startled on peeping from her hiding-place to discover that the leader of the brigands was her father. He, too, had not been idle during the three years since they parted. He had thrown Louis Onslow over the cliff, and left him for dead, and had then embarked in an emigrant ship, in which Louis Onslow (in disguise) was a passenger. The ship was set on fire by Louis Onslow as a somewhat risky and clumsy pretext for forcing Robert St. Clair to make a raft, and then accompanying him as a passenger on it, previous to carrying out his revenge. The raft was made, and the two men embarked on it; but it was Robert St. Clair who got the best of the fight and murdered Louis Onslow, after which he joined the brigands with whom his daughter found him. Ethel now assumed a fresh disguise, that of a priest, warned the Prince of his peril, and was shot by her own father—"a pretty kettle of fish," as the learned Hindoo said when describing the death of a friend. Whatever shortcomings Mr. Curzon may have, want of invention cannot be laid to his door, and no one can say that he is dull. He has put far too much, as novelists will, into his first book.

The impersonations in Torwood's Trust spring from motives quite unlike those in The Violinist of the Quartier Latin. There it was a case of every man for himself, here it is every man for somebody else, in all senses. Torrington Torwood and Philip Debenham were devoted friends, who, when the story opens, had spent eighteen years of their lives together, the first eight at a foreign school, the last ten in travelling. Torwood was rich, Debenham penniless, through the suspected roguery of an uncle, one Bellasis. When the friends were twenty-eight, things were changed by the death of Debenham's great uncle, who left Phil all his property. Unluckily at the time the announcement reached them, Debenham was lying unconscious from the combined effects of sunstroke and a fall, in a little German town, and the letter was opened by Torwood. By the same post came one from Debenham's sister Maud, entreating to be delivered from her uncle, who had made her life a burden for many years. Torwood knew that on Maud's twenty-fourth birthday, now close at hand, she was bound by her father's will to accept the uncle's son as her husband, or lose two-thirds of her fortune. It therefore occurred to him that, as his friend was in no condition to fight his own battles, let alone other people's, and not likely to be able to do so for many months to come, the only thing was for him to personate Debenham till he recovered. This was not difficult; for his relatives had not seen Phil for eighteen years, and Torwood was well up in the family history. The way in which he succeeded in his attempt is told in a lively and amusing manner. He easily managed to inspire Phil's relations with terror, and to gain the love of his sister Maud, a gushing young thing of twenty-four, who always alluded to him as "a[n] angel-boy," or "a dear boy," or as some other kind of "boy." Miss Green is perhaps a little too generous with her incidents. Not content with a very narrow escape from bigamy on the part of Bellasis, who also committed felony and did his best to steal and destroy a will, the author gives us a second edition of the elderly parent who arranges marriages, in the person of a blind old bore, Meredith by name, who told the false Debenham that it had been the dream of his life to marry him to Miss Meredith. This put every one in a very awkward position, and things were made worse by the arrival of a young Italian named Tagliadini, who fell in love with Meredith's daughter. In this Italian the reader at once recognizes Phil Debenham in disguise; but in spite of having lived with him for eighteen years, and having seen him with a beard grown only a fortnight before, Torwood was not so sharp. Phil had gradually come to his senses, and not unnaturally supposed his friend had been robbing him. He was afraid to present himself under his own name, for Torwood had taken great care to leave no compromising papers behind while Phil was under the care of a German doctor; but, of course, Phil's reappearance sets everything right. If abundance, and even redundancy, of incidents promise a great novelist, we shall expect something of Miss Green in the future. She must, however, learn to correct such phrases as "He was a wealthy man, your father" (vol. i. p. 144); "He is much improved on what he was" (vol. i. p. 147); and "He is very fond of me, is young Philip Debenham." She must also be careful in watching her printers, and not call a lady "Descarto" twice in one paragraph (vol. i. p. 155), and "Descartes" all the rest of the time.

Has Miss Hope Stanford, one wonders, ever read a work written early in the century, called Pride and Prejudice? Not that Down the Way (which, in spite of its sound, has nothing to do with the downward path) contains any one half so lively as Lyddy, or half so entertaining as Mr. Bennett. But it is the history of five sisters, of whom two are placid and sensible, like Jane; one heavy and disagreeable, like Mary; and one clever, and her father's favourite, like Elizabeth. There is also a cousin—Peter Hilton by name—who, like the immortal Mr. Collins, proposes to the three eldest girls in succession; and, being rejected by all, transfers his attentions to their friend Mary Verney. Mr. Collins was, however, more fortunate than Peter Hilton, who has to encounter a fourth refusal. His perseverance is finally rewarded by a wealthy widow, when (more like Mr. Collins than ever) he wrote the following letter to the father of his three first loves, if the expression may be allowed us:—

> My dear Wedgewood,—As my nearest kinsman, I feel that it is both pleasurable and appropriate that I should make to you the first announcement of my felicity, and I therefore take an early opportunity of informing you that on Tuesday, 26th ult., I was espoused to an amiable and charming lady, whom I had the good fortune to encounter during my stay at Homburg last autumn. . . . To the charms of physical and mental maturity she joins an elegant wit and cheerful manners, which cannot fail to recommend her to all who make her acquaintance; and I cannot but feel my young cousins, who have laboured under somewhat of a disadvantage in seeing so little of the world, may derive much benefit from her society and intimate knowledge of circles from which they have unfortunately been hitherto debarred. Not that I wish to cast any reflections upon your excellent management of your family, my dear cousin, and I consider that your elder daughters have made most respectable marriages; but it gives me satisfaction to reflect that, in consequence of my happy union, the younger members may enjoy the advantages of a less circumscribed acquaintance, previous to embarking on a life-long partnership.

Miss Austen differs widely from Miss Stanford in one respect. Whereas the former left Mary to enjoy a life of single-blessedness, the latter intends the chief interest of her novel to centre in the loves of the cross and disagreeable Laura, and her unpleasant wooer, Poland. It would be well if novelists—and other people, too—laid to heart the observation that, as a person sows, so shall he reap. When a person persistently snaps and sulks at his or her family circle, it is not to be expected that he or she shall be much sought after. Miss Stanford does not sufficiently recognize that Laura did not at once turn into an angel at the first care and consideration shown her by Geoffrey Poland, but that she never had been rude to him, which makes all the difference. We do not take much interest in the popular and commonplace Edith, her father's right hand, and ultimately heiress to the family estate; and it is not made at all plain why Poland, after having been bored by her, and in love with Laura, should suddenly have fallen a victim to Edith's charms. This he does, indeed, to such an extent that, after a year's absence, he absolutely comes back in disguise, to ascertain before disclosing himself which sister he prefers. There is something very grotesque in this incident, though Miss Stanford does not perceive it. The book, in spite of its faults, is pleasant enough reading, and the characters on the whole true to life, if they have not much originality.

Even in America, it appears, young ladies have marriages arranged for them by their fathers, and wills are made depriving the natural heir of the property in case of refusal to wed the right person. One hardly sees how it was that, even under such circumstances, two people violently in love with each other should never find it out, and separate on their wedding-day, and depart, one for Egypt, and the other for Washington. But it is not the object of Miss Lincoln to give an exhaustive analysis of the feelings of the unhappy pair, but to draw a picture of life in Washington during the season. We had always thought that life in London, to a fashionable lady, was a tolerable whirl; but, if what Miss Lincoln says is correct, London cannot hold a candle in this respect to its sister over the water. This is a description of one of many such days spent by Miss Dolly Oglethorpe and her cousin the "grass widow":—"We began operations by driving down to the Marine Barracks for a dance at eleven in the morning, and came back to a breakfast of sixteen at Kitty's at one o'clock; made twenty-four visits in the afternoon, and attended a dancing reception at Mrs. Vandeleur's at five; dined, went to some private theatricals from eight to ten, and then to a german at Marini's, where I danced untiringly until nearly one o'clock in the morning! There's a real Washington day in the height of the season for you!" Life in Washington does, indeed, seem to be a perpetual Commemoration, and the ladies who lead it are not so much "buds" as full-blown peonies. The book is written in letters, and is full of the "bright" talk, to use their favourite word, which seems as natural to an American woman as her elegant garments. English people, who are born with slower wits and under duller skies, are bewildered by the brilliant war of words and the perpetual motion. We are dazzled often, it is true, but at the same time we long for repose and a little less self-possession. It is a pity, too, to introduce the names of real people into fiction, even though what is said is complimentary. Lord Lorne may be gratified at being told that he is "a very charming unaffected young man"; but it is just possible that he would have been even more gratified at not being mentioned at all.

Soldier and Servant is a religious tale without any pretensions to the name of a novel, for it does not contain the most distant approach to love-making. There are quantities of girls who make their appearance in a casual fashion all up and down the book, and nobody seems to belong to any class in particular. The natural result of this is some remarkable English. For instance, it is rather odd that a professor should send his daughter to stay with a lady who, aunt and excellent woman though she was, talked in this way, "I don't know but my motherhood would hold out if I had a child that was all levels." Fine writing is one thing, but ordinary intelligible grammar is another. Is it the custom in America, we should like to ask, to call an officer in the navy a soldier? Because Hal Kennard speaks of himself in p. 17 as "a soldier's son," while in p. 31 we are told that his father was "in the naval service." The book calls for no special notice. There is much religious conversation, but no power is shown in any direction. However, no person in this book is some one else in a dexterous make-up—which is an agreeable relief after dozens of travesties.

GARDINER'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.*

THE new edition of Mr. Gardiner's History of England has in its brisk progress now reached its sixth volume, which closes with the assassination of Buckingham. The whole of his narrative of two very interesting and very humiliating chapters of English foreign policy is therefore now before his readers; and the opportunity seems suitable for commenting upon what beyond all doubt forms one of the strongest sides of his work, more especially in its present shape. There is indeed but little that is new in the revised account of the years during which Buckingham's ascendency was established in our foreign affairs, when his headstrong blunders almost palliated the failures due to the self-entranced impracticability of his old master. In Vol. V. some touches have been added illustrating the desperate efforts of the Spanish Ambassadors in London during their final struggle with the favourite—at that time the favourite of the people almost as much as of the King and the Prince, and the idol of the very Phelipses and Cokes. But Inojosa and Coloma could not conjure with the wand of Gondomar, and the resolution taken at the last moment in Madrid to send Gondomar himself back to England was never carried out; for it was not long afterwards that the French marriage treaty was signed. The third, and more particularly the fourth, volume contain some new matter of significance, and in any case the narrative of the European relations of England in the first eleven years of the great war is best read in its entirety. The lowest point in the history of the foreign policy of Charles I. is not reached even here; nor had his position yet come to resemble, while he still occupied his throne, that of a suppliant exile. But enough of folly and of failure is told within the compass of the volumes now before us to bear out such an estimate of Stuart foreign policy as that with which one of their number closes. At the end of Vol. IV. Mr. Gardiner is only comparing the Spanish marriage scheme of James I., carried on as it was by ordinary diplomatic means, with the "hopelessly insane" project of a visit to Madrid formed by the Prince of Wales and Buckingham; but it may be said of the foreign policy of James in general, that it was built on the quicksands of self-delusion, while the schemes of Buckingham and Charles were a mere succession of bubbles inflated by unreason.

In view of Mr. Gardiner's long and patient exposition, as well as of the manifold labours of a similar nature by the late Mr. Spedding, one cannot but consider James I., whose sayings and doings have lent themselves so readily to the caricatures of scandalmongers and of moralizing essayists, fortunate at least in his more recent historians. Mr. Gardiner's account of the King's peace policy, and of the motives which actuated him in pursuing it, is free from that touch of defiance which gives a flavour of pungency to the laborious disquisitions of Mr. Spedding; but never was there a narrative more unaffectedly fair. It is allowed, of course, that James usually chose the unfittest means for gaining his end; that he went the whole length of conciliation when a firm demand would have been in place, and that he made himself laughable by threats when all fear of his really resorting to force had passed away. It is further allowed that James shifted his position with a promptitude unequalled even in Parliamentary politics; first treating the invasion of the Palatinate as an impossible event; then when it had actually occurred, representing it to himself as merely designed for a diversion; then when it had proved a real invasion, at first showing signs of accepting even this. Lastly, it is shown how, even where James chose the right course, he generally chose it on the narrowest ground, exerting himself for the religious independence of the Palatinate because on its fate depended the fortunes of his daughter's family. Yet, with all this, the historian concedes to James what is nearly, though not quite, the highest credit which an historian can give—that his views as to the relations between nations in political, ecclesiastical, and even in commercial matters were in advance of the views of his age. In these respects he misjudged everything except the future. Very justly, however, the professorial type of statesmanship is held to be irreconcilable with monarchical power such as James still possessed and was intent upon exercising. While, therefore, Mr. Gardiner's history of the foreign policy of James leaves untouched the prevailing impression as to the strength of the King's character and as to the depth of his insight into human nature, it does not, like so many previous narratives, bewilder the reader by conveying the impression that the policy in question was devoid of a very definite and very intelligible aim. The mainspring of James's European statesmanship was the desire to uphold the peace of Europe, if possible by diplomatic means; and it was quite in accordance with the notions of the age that of these means the marriages of his children, and more especially the projected Spanish marriage of Charles, were to be the chief and central. That his position was unique, and that he might have used it most effectively, is indisputable. But the peace of Europe was broken by the action of his son-in-law, the Elector Palatine, who, after his flight from Bohemia, endeavoured to pose before the world as the injured representative of the pure religion and of German liberty. This was not the fault of James; and had Frederick even now been willing to renounce what he had lost, the Palatinate might have been preserved to him by the policy of his father-in-law. But it was the folly of the latter to persevere, long after that policy had become impossible, in the belief that he could restore peace to Europe and avert the consequences of Frederick's foolhardiness, by attaching Spain to himself and detaching her from Austria. When at last he awoke to the impossibility of accomplishing this, his rule was virtually at an end, and that of younger and giddier brains had begun.

There are virtually but two kinds of cavil which might be effectively urged against such a view of the foreign policy of James I. as we have roughly indicated. Of these the one is that which was loudly enough uttered at the time, which found its expression in the streets, on the stage, wherever men congregated, in Parliament, even in the Council Chamber, and which has been echoed by many a worthy Protestant historian as a matter of course. England's natural side was the Protestant side; her natural foe was Spain; and the only true course for James was to identify himself with the cause of the King and Queen of Bohemia and of the Protestant Union. Among other assumptions this popular view involves a judgment of the whole origin and history of the Thirty Years' War, which is open to the very gravest question. Mr. Gardiner has not shrunk from an inquiry into what might be called the premisses of the conclusion—premisses which many holding it take very little trouble about examining. Thus these volumes form a most valuable contribution to the history of the war itself, which in England at least nobody would be so competent to write as Mr. Gardiner. We observe with regret that in a very remarkable passage he speaks of the latter part of the Thirty Years' War as a chaos of brutal conflicts, of which it would be difficult with patience either to write or to read the record. Such a description is in more senses than one true enough; and many a conscientious student has found his efforts collapse when endeavouring to trace the thread of cause and consequence through such a labyrinth of wickedness and woe. Ordinary guidance is here at default; even Mr. Gardiner's own excellent little handbook of the war here furnishes but partly satisfactory assistance. Yet much was gained for the progress of mankind, while much was lost; nor are the clues wanting by which a historian of Mr. Gardiner's sure grasp and imperturbable distinctness of vision might find his way through the darkness. He asserts that German Protestantism had failed to comprehend the question to which England was ready to respond, whether liberty might not be reconciled with law, and absolutism avoided without the triumph of anarchy. This is true; but it is also true that in Germany the issue of the struggle marks a step forwards in the direction of a toleration which was wholly unintelligible to English Puritanism, and to which the life and tendencies of our English polity remained strangers even after the Revolution of 1688 had established among us the rule of "ordered liberty."

But even if this be so, it remains not the less certain that the Thirty Years' War, in those stages with which Mr. Gardiner's present narrative is directly concerned, was essentially a struggle between anarchy claiming a right which was virtually no other than the right of the strongest, and that adherence to law and order of which what remained of the Imperial authority could not but be regarded as the representative. Frederick V., in accepting the Bohemian crown, was seeking to aggrandize himself in the teeth of his assurance that his only end was "to serve God and His Church," and doing his utmost to break up "the foundations upon which law and order had hitherto rested, alike in Bohemia and in the Empire." It is therefore in a sense unnecessary to examine the merits of the quarrel between Ferdinand and the Bohemians, or to inquire into the justifiability of his deposition, or even to go over the much-trodden ground of the religious condition of the Empire since the days of the ill-fated reservatum ecclesiasticum. Some exception might perhaps be taken to Mr. Gardiner's necessarily brief reference in his second volume to the Religious Peace of Augsburg as incomplete, and therefore unfavourable to the Protestant side, inasmuch as it does not sufficiently account for the bitterness of feeling left by a compact neither fairly settled between the parties nor including in it a concession actually made to the Protestants (concerning members of their faith resident on ecclesiastical lands). And in arguing that the settlement was, considering the time at which it was made, not unfair, Mr. Gardiner is hardly on safe ground when he hazards the generalization that "it was better to be persecuted in a State of which the frontier was only ten miles from the capital than in a huge kingdom like France or England." Augustus of Saxony, for instance, found his electorate quite large enough to prevent the Crypto-calvinists from escaping his tender mercies. Again, we cannot profess ourselves satisfied, in the face of the evidence duly cited from Gindely by Mr. Gardiner, with the view taken by the latter of the proceedings of Matthias at Klostergrab and Braunau. But whatever may be thought of these and similar points, the action of Frederick would not be justifiable even had the famous "defenestration" at Prague appropriately crowned a course of perfectly legitimate self-defence on the part of Count Thurn and his associates, and had it been the clear duty of Protestant Germany, after all the Catholic encroachments which it had undergone, to unite in support of the perpetrators of the deed. Mr. Gardiner points out that it probably would have been the best policy for Frederick and his advisers at this time to seek a close alliance with the Elector of Saxony, who had good reason to interest himself in Bohemian Protestantism. Elsewhere the Duke of Bouillon is mentioned as observing that it would be better for Frederick to carry on the war as head of the Union and chief captain of the Protestant forces than as a mere anti-King; and, indeed, the failure of Frederick to bind down the Union to the maintenance of whatever enterprise he engaged in is a conspicuous proof of his political incapacity. But, as Mr. Gardiner truly, if bluntly, says, it was not a mere error of policy of which the reckless Elector Palatine and his advisers made themselves guilty. "The really unpardonable offence which they committed was, that in the face of the gravest difficulty which any German prince had ever been called upon to solve, they dared to look upon the troubles in Bohemia as a band of pilferers might look upon a fire in the streets, which, however serious it may be to others, is to them a good opportunity for filling their pockets at the expense of the sufferers and spectators." The best defence that can be offered for Frederick—if it be worth the name of a defence—is probably this: that a weaker mind naturally gives way before a stronger, and that Anhalt pressed for haste, urging what is always a potent argument with the feeble, that the Elector had already gone too far to go back.

Your case no tame expedients will afford was one of Achitophel's most convincing assurances to Absalom.

As is known, Frederick did not before accepting wait even for the advice of his father-in-law, who of course had been in no haste about his answer. Shortly before the fatal step was taken James had been invited by Spain to offer his mediation in the Bohemian quarrel, which it seemed very unlikely that the two chief Protestant Electors and the two Catholic princes named by Ferdinand would succeed in settling. About the time when James thought himself called upon to undertake a task thoroughly after his own heart, he was at the height of his prosperity; and Mr. Gardiner pauses to illustrate the situation very picturesquely, referring to the stately Banqueting House which was then intended to form the beginning of a new Whitehall, but which was to survive in isolation as "the fitting memorial of a King whose whole life was unfinished." It was indisputably in no ignoble spirit that, notwithstanding the pressure put upon him by the Dutch, and by anti-Spanish feeling at home, James was fain to come forward as mediator; but while Doncaster's mission fell perfectly flat in Germany, the Spanish Government itself was secretly promising aid to Matthias, and sending to England Gondomar, whose real opinion as to the English mediation was that it sprang from and would end in vanity. With the death of Matthias came the crisis, for which James was in every respect unprepared. But he was misjudged by his contemporaries almost as much as he has been by later times. The Bohemians had no doubt expected that he would support their cause, or they would not have elected his son-in-law. Quite as erroneously Gondomar predicted that he would be found on the strongest side, which, under the present aspect of affairs, was not the side of Spain. His irresolution was pitiable; but we thoroughly agree with Mr. Gardiner that there was no reason, and that there would have been no excuse, for his going to war at this juncture. His error lay in not taking up a distinct position as to what he would do in the future, instead of professing that the legality of Frederick's title first needed investigation. At home he fell upon the imbecile expedient of allowing his subjects to subscribe for a cause which he had not made up his mind to support. His rambling talk enabled Gondomar once more to take the length of his foot, and to furbish up for his amusement the marriage scheme. Thus while the greater part of the year 1620 was worse than wasted in Bohemia (Mr. Gardiner justly remarks on the inappropriateness of the sobriquet "the Winter-King," as applied to Frederick by historians), James was drifting further and further into the unsafe waters of Spanish diplomacy. To this period belongs the monstrous scheme, born of a suggestion from Gondomar to Buckingham, but apparently revived by James on two subsequent occasions, in 1621 and in 1623, of partitioning the Free Netherlands between England and Spain. Meanwhile France had been acting in the interest of Austria, and had negotiated the Treaty of Ulm, which left Maximilian of Bavaria free to march his troops upon Prague. When a few months afterwards like news came that all was over in the Bohemian capital, James's first comment was, "I have long expected this." He was at last, as Mr. Gardiner puts it, out of a false position.

More than this; for not only could there be no doubt as to the locus standi of James in any endeavour he might make for the preservation of his grandchildren's inheritance, but Spain was anxious for peace, almost as anxious as the Dutch were for the prolongation of the war. This was inevitably neither known nor guessed in England, and hence the angry impatience with which so much of the King's diplomacy as revealed itself to the public at home was regarded. And it is at this point that the second of the cavils to which we adverted above might conceivably be put forward by an adverse critic of Mr. Gardiner's general conception of James's foreign policy. Was there, it might be asked, ever any time at which there could be any reasonable "hope of Spain," as of a Power willing to co-operate for a place which should preserve the Palatinate for Frederick—or, at all events, for his children?

If ever there was such a time, it was most assuredly the early part of the year 1621, when the Union had been dissolved, and when not only the Spanish Government (now carried on in the name of the new king Philip IV.), but the Saxon Elector and the spiritual Electors of Mainz and Trier, were averse to the proposal of transferring Frederick's electorate to Maximilian of Bavaria; so that even the Emperor Ferdinand's own Council recommended at least the postponement of the scheme. No doubt James had attached an altogether excessive value to the promises of goodwill made to his ambassador by the new Ministers at Madrid; and even the fact that the temporary suspension of hostilities by Spinola in the Palatinate was expressly declared to have been granted at the request of the King of England was really worth very little. But Spain, for financial reasons, if for no others, was really desirous for peace; and we are, on the whole, disposed to agree with Mr. Gardiner that, had Frederick early in the year signified his readiness to renounce the Bohemian crown, and to offer guarantees for his future good conduct, reasonable terms would have then been granted him. In this event, the mediating policy of England might have been crowned with a modest success. But the period of time during which such a solution was possible can have been but short, and must be supposed to have come to an end when in the spring Mansfeld was appointed by Frederick to the command of his armies in Bohemia. Such a step was altogether irreconcilable with the prospect of any rational conduct on the part of the lack-land King and head of the dissolved Union. The situation had therefore already changed when Digby started on his mission to Vienna, with instructions to secure the Emperor's consent to the retention of the Palatinate by Frederick in return for a renunciation of the Bohemian crown, and, in the event of a refusal, to pass on to Madrid with the same terms, and, if refused there also, "to fix the quarrel as well upon the King of Spain as upon the Emperor." James was now using brave words, and, as Mr. Gardiner well shows, announcing a policy at once straightforward and temperate. But "unfortunately his intervention went no further than words," and was therefore of that contemptible sort which the historian has refrained from illustrating, like its opposite, by modern parallels. The statesman whose unenviable task it was to be the bearer of these terms, possibly formulated by himself, may almost be called the hero of this History. So careful is Mr. Gardiner, as a rule, in the choice of his expressions, and so unimpassioned is the tone in which he usually distributes either praise or blame, that the commendations again and again bestowed by him upon Digby, afterwards Earl of Bristol, stand forth with all the more striking prominence. Readers of the Fall of the Monarchy will remember how, on two occasions—once when Strafford's Attainder Bill was before the Lords, and again on the very eve of the Impeachment of the Five Members, Bristol unsuccessfully urged a compromise intended to avert the worst. There can be no question as to the devotion any more than as to the intelligence of this faithful servant of the Crown, who already before the outbreak of the Civil War was named as an "evil counsellor" in the Long Parliament. The old view, according to which he was Spanish at heart, is, moreover, manifestly incorrect; and we are glad to notice that in popular aids to historical study Mr. Gardiner's vindication of his favourite politician is already accepted. He was not even, we believe, one of those diplomatists who too readily take their colour from the Court to which they are attached or the country in which they are placed. "I know not," he wrote to Calvert from the Spanish Netherlands in 1621, "what I may be held in England; but I am sure here I shall hardly ever be held Spanish hereafter, for I assure you I have dealt very plainly with them." At the same time he was, in our opinion, a diplomatist by nature, as well as by training, and his mind moved within the limits which usually beset diplomatic action. Though both clear-headed and plain-spoken, he seems to have addressed himself to the impossible, as well as to the possible, with the same calm sense of duty, as if everything were (to use a colloquial expression) in the day's work. And occasionally one seems to notice in him that tendency to carry through a scheme quand même, to push a negotiation to its desired close on any terms, which is characteristic of the diplomatic temper proper. When, in December 1622, he received the amended articles of the Spanish marriage contract, which he could not but suppose to be the final offers of the Spanish Government, and which included the concession to Catholics in England of free private worship, while nothing but a general promise was given as to the Palatinate, Bristol recommended the acceptance of these proposals. The articles, when brought to England by Endymion Porter with a secret message from Gondomar, gladly accepting the offer of a visit to Madrid by the Prince of Wales, were at once signed by James and Charles, who thereby, as we thoroughly agree with Mr. Gardiner, "were signing away the independence of the English monarchy." But if so, what follows? Bristol may be absolved for not having penetrated Gondomar's fanatical hope that the conversion of Charles would set everything straight for Spain, and the insidious intention of Olivares to obtain the arrangement as to the Palatinate really desired by Spain without concluding the English marriage at all. But, if the diplomatist pardonably failed to see through the Ministers of the Government to which he was accredited, is the English statesman equally excusable for having so completely misunderstood English feeling? Bristol, says Mr. Gardiner, "had risen to a position from which the two parties" in the German war "could be regarded with an equal eye." In the struggle of politics it is not such men as this who master their age, or who even contribute appreciably to the determination of its destinies. It is their fate, as they know it to be their duty, to play a secondary part. Thus, without in the least denying the element of truth which the tributes contain, we cannot but find a touch of grandiloquence in Mr. Gardiner's descriptions of Bristol as a man who, though "of no party, shared in all that was best in every party," and as one who, "raised above the passions and prejudices of the world, looks serenely down upon the strife of men."

No task would have been more interesting than to follow the historian through his patient but far from tedious account of the long endeavour of English diplomacy to tie Spain down to a satisfactory promise about the war. The chief fault of Bristol, as Mr. Gardiner says in his fifth volume, was that he "attempted to impose terms at all upon those who were unwilling to assent to any reasonable compromise whatever"; and it was this radical flaw in the very conditions of the negotiation, rather than even all the folly and all the misconduct in the visit of Charles and Buckingham to Spain, which vitiated the entire transaction. It is well known that it did not come to an actual close even with the return of the travellers; nor was it for some time that the King's eyes were at least partially opened. The breach with Spain was not, as Mr. Gardiner shows, mainly owing to the ascendency of Buckingham. It would not have been brought about unless James, as he told the Spanish Ambassador's secretary, had at last perceived that "the King of Spain had given him no reason to suppose that he intended to assist him in the forcible recovery of the Palatinate." There can hardly be a parallel in the history of diplomacy to the length of time during which the Spaniards had succeeded in keeping up the delusion in King James's mind. Perhaps this is the reason why the episode which forms the climax, though it does not include the catastrophe of the drama, has been so much of a favourite with writers and readers who have both patience and wits enough to enjoy the comedy of intrigue. But the English people had no opportunity for following the incidents of the protracted game, and was therefore ready to anticipate its conclusion. The turn had now come for Bristol's triumphant rival and adversary, Buckingham, of whose foreign policy the last chapters of Mr. Gardiner's fifth, and his sixth, volumes contain the narrative. But on this equally interesting and even more lamentable story we have no further comments to offer.

PROPERTY AND PROGRESS.*

IT is a pity that Mr. Mallock, who is unquestionably an able, and in matters political a well-intentioned, person, so often forgets that, in the language of one of the characters in an edifying romance of his own, he is "getting a big boy now." In a little boy, especially a clever little boy, the peculiar weakness familiarly known as teaching your grandmother is pardonable, though even very little boys, if they have any brains, can be cured of it. Once upon a time (Mr. Mallock himself likes to beguile serious discourse with agreeable illustration) there was a little boy who took, or thought he took, a great interest in matters theological, and to whom it seemed that he had discovered some admirable arguments for the English as against the Roman view of a certain great mystery of the Christian faith. So he went to his father and he said, "Papa, I want a large sheet of paper, for I am going to write a treatise on transubstantiation." His father, who was a very sensible person, merely said "Very well," and presented him with a sheet of blue demy of the old fashion, with uncut edges. It looked very nice, but there was a terrible deal of it to fill, and as the little boy marshalled his arguments it occurred to him that they were not quite so novel as he had thought, and were remarkably like something he had seen in one of the books on his mother's table. So he folded up the large sheet of demy with uncut edges and put it in the fire. Some time afterwards his father asked him how the treatise was getting on, and thereupon he said, "Papa, the treatise was very much like what the man says in mamma's book, and I didn't think it was worth writing over again."

Now this little boy, though no doubt he never became half so clever as Mr. Mallock, seems to us on the whole to have had a larger share of practical understanding. The ingenious author of A Romance of the Nineteenth Century is always propounding with enormous gravity, with liberal rebukes to frivolous contemporaries, and with great promise of new and valuable evangelization, things which every one who has the slightest knowledge of the subject knows perfectly well already. Not very long ago we had the pleasure of reviewing a book in which Mr. Mallock, discussing the doctrines of the co-operative Socialists, stated with immense flourish of trumpets, and as a totally new discovery, the remarkable axiom that wealth and progress are due to emulation, to the desire of saving, and, in short, to the principle of private property. It was admirably true; it was most valuable doctrine for the times; but it was about as original as the enunciation of the Rule of Three. Here David again takes up his sling and his scrip against the Philistines, and in essays reprinted from the Quarterly Review plants the smooth stone of the brook in the foreheads of Mr. Goliath George and that man of great economic stature, Mr. Hyndman of the Democratic Federation. This is very well, and, if Mr. Mallock had been contented to do it in a modest fashion like David, we should have had nothing to do but to pat him on the back. Unfortunately he does it in a manner very far from modest, and, out of pure wantonness of conceit, involves himself in all sorts of paralogisms and absurdities of which Mr. George and Mr. Hyndman could, if they chose, and had the brains, make very good dialectic use.

Mr. Mallock begins after his old fashion with a general information to all those whom it may concern on his own side, that they are terribly foolish persons, as, indeed, they must be if they have missed the excellent but extremely obvious arguments which Mr. Mallock himself afterwards uses. "There has been," he says, "a strong disposition among certain English critics to regard Mr. George as if he were only a charlatan, and to think on that ground that a passing sneer will dispose of him." Both these views seem to Mr. Mallock terrible mistakes. Mr. George is not a charlatan; he is not even "crack-brained"; he is "a vigorous thinker"; he has "all the terseness and more than all the truth of Hobbes" (Heaven save us!). Moreover, even if Mr. George were as contemptible as his supercilious critics assume, "the wildest errors in modern politics are grave if they are only sufficiently popular." The classes that "have learnt to reason, but have not learnt to reason rightly, are the most dangerous of all," and to them a book like Mr. George's is particularly attractive. Therefore Mr. Mallock, by way of showing that he can reason rightly, proceeds to convert these dangerous classes by an orderly argument in the Quarterly Review. Does he think they will read his argument? That, however, is nothing; for, as Mr. Mallock correctly says, some people, at any rate, who ought to be capable of reading and following the arguments of the Quarterly Review have espoused, or at least countenanced, Mr. George's cause. But let us give a little more attention to the laudatory descriptions of Mr. George and his book quoted above, descriptions meant to imply grave rebuke on the supercilious critics, of whom we may, without much vanity, suppose ourselves to be pars non minima. We find them uncommonly hard to reconcile with certain of Mr. Mallock's own later expressions. He tells us, when he has got into the thick of the fight with Mr. George, that the Georgian errors, put into brief and comprehensible form, "will sound to any sane man like the ravings of a lunatic." Pretty well this for an author who has just expressly freed Mr. George from the charge of being crack-brained! He tells us that "an extravagant falsehood underlies the main argument of this mischievous book." Pretty well that for an author who has paid Mr. George the compliments quoted above! In another place there is, as far as Mr. Mallock can see, "no meaning to criticize" in Mr. George. Finally, the book "does not appeal to thinking men." Then Mr. Mallock may be asked, in all politeness, what is the use of treating it as if it did?

The truth is that Mr. Mallock's mania for posing as Sir Oracle has led him to decorate, and, like many decorators, to spoil his work by these flowers of speech, altogether unnecessarily. Probably for a similar reason he is as unnecessarily rude to Mr. Hyndman as he is unnecessarily polite to Mr. George. Mr. Hyndman's facts are almost always inaccurate and his reasonings ludicrously paralogistic. But to dismiss him, or rather introduce him, as a person "apparently destitute of any literary ability" is, in the first place, impolite; in the second, unwise, for a man does not devote a long essay to demolishing a personage who has no literary ability, and of whom, as Mr. Mallock afterwards says, he has "a low opinion"; and, in the third, incorrect, for Mr. Hyndman's literary ability, if you grant him all his premisses, and never examine any one of his arguments, is far from small. Elsewhere Mr. Mallock kindly informs his readers that M. de Laveleye's review of Mr. George is "insufficient and careless" on the very same page in which he also informs them that the economist of Liège is "a complete master of the subject." No doubt some people think that they speak as with authority in speaking after this fashion, but they are pretty certainly wrong. And it is particularly unfortunate that Mr. Mallock, after setting all the world right, commits himself to a ludicrous blunder of a very damaging kind; for he is apparently ignorant of the meaning of the word "pockets" in Mr. Chamberlain's now somewhat famous phrase. "Pockets," Mr. Mallock may be glad to learn, are sudden and unexpected agglomerations of mineral, lying apart from regularly distributed

* Property and Progress. By W. H. Mallock. London: John Murray. 1884.

We have taken this trouble with Mr. Mallock, because it is really an unfortunate thing that a young man of ability, which in politics at least he is willing to devote to the right side, should fritter away its effect by the childish faults of arrogance, of bad taste, and of posing as a discoverer of new and wonderful truths which so frequently mar his work. But there is also another fault to be found which is perhaps of even greater practical importance. We are very far from undervaluing argument, though we prefer it in a somewhat more unmixed and less pretentiously stated form than it is Mr. Mallock's wont to give us. But, if Mr. Mallock, or anybody else, thinks that argument will move a democracy, he makes a very great, a most pernicious, and we fear a far from uncommon mistake. Instead of considering, like Mr. Mallock and the Times, Mr. George as a vigorous thinker, we consider him an absurdly feeble one; and we very shrewdly, though uncharitably, suspect that contrary opinions come chiefly from the same sentiment as that which has sometimes prompted generals in war to magnify the strength of their enemies. But, if he were a vigorous thinker (and Mr. Mallock here practically admits our point), it is not his vigorous thinking that will influence, or has influenced, his disciples. It is the bribes he offers, his garish flow of language, his habit of setting off his conversation by appeals to his intimate knowledge of the private intentions of the Deity, and the like. To meet this sort of thing by syllogisms in Barbara and statistics out of Blue-Books is hopeless; to meet it even by counter use of the same weapons of strong language is not very possible. It can only be met by ridicule in the case of those who have some intellectual capacity, and by practical measures in the case of those who have not. So long as the Haves are prepared to enforce the opposite theory to Mr. George's by lead and hemp, property will be safe; the instant that their determination falters, all the arguments that even a much better logician than Mr. Mallock could apply to the easy task of showing up Mr. George's fallacies will be simply vain breath. The most discouraging sign of the times is the apparent disinclination of the upper and middle classes to face the fact that the whole matter comes to a willingness to fight in case of need, or to the absence of such a willingness. If order does not directly rest on the executioner, which was one famous way of putting the thing, it certainly rests on the potentialities of a whiff of grape-shot. This is perhaps an unpleasant truth, but it is one which in these mealy-mouthed days it is a public service to speak. It is because it is not oftener spoken, because it has become fashionable not to speak it, that anarchic agitation has got bolder of late. It used to be, and still is, rather the fashion to laugh at the special constables of the Kennington business; it is somewhat singular that, after their manifestation, Chartism died away at once. In the same way, many as are the apparent openings for anarchy in America, there are but few serious disturbances, and, as was seen the other day at Cincinnati, what there are are promptly put down, simply because the defenders of order are in earnest, and show themselves in earnest, after a fashion comprehensible to the meanest intellect. On the other hand, in every country where a revolution has succeeded there has been hesitation and half-heartedness in applying cold steel, warm lead, and well-twisted ropes when wanted. The most beautiful argument in the world (and Mr. Mallock's, though very fair of its kind, is not quite that) will not supply the want of this determination, and the determination will make the beautiful argument merely an agreeable ornament. "Talk as much you like, appeal as much you like to the Deity or to the late Karl Marx, to the laws of nature, or the laws of Martha's Vineyard, but directly you try to put your ideas in practice up you go to the nearest and most convenient gallows, unless it happens to be more convenient to shoot you." That is the right way of treating Mr. George, and Mr. Hyndman, and Mr. Wallace, and Mr. Davitt, and all the rest of the motley and mutually contradictory apostles of plunder.

SOUTH AMERICA.*

MR. WATSON comments in his preface, and with very just cause, on the absence even in educated English circles of the merest elementary acquaintance with South American geography and politics. On his appointment in 1866 as second Secretary to Her Majesty's Legation in the Argentine Republic, Mr. Watson was unable to find any work giving anything like a complete account of the several States of South America. A residence of a year at Buenos Ayres and another at Rio de Janeiro, during which Mr. Watson was employed on missions to Patagonia, Uruguay, Paraguay, and the inland province of Minas Geraes in Brazil, afforded him opportunities of seeing different parts of the continent. On his return to Europe Mr. Watson's diplomatic duties in other countries have until recently not allowed him the leisure necessary for the composition of a work of the kind mentioned. The materials at his disposal were so voluminous that he felt it necessary to content himself with writing an historical review respecting the several Spanish and Portuguese colonies in South America; and Mr. Watson expressly states that "he does not desire it to take the place of the more elaborate and original works referred to in it, but rather to serve as an index to the contents of these various works." After this disclaimer it may seem ungracious to quarrel with the scope of Mr. Watson's book. He has undeniably brought together within a handy compass a quantity of information on his subject not readily accessible elsewhere; but he displays a lack of method and of the value of proportion, while the usefulness of his work as a book of reference is seriously impaired, or indeed almost nullified, by the absence of an index. These defects are the more to be regretted because Mr. Watson evidently has it in his power to have produced better work. His narrative is easy reading, and he has evidently been at great pains to consult and work up every possible source of information. But apparently he must have got tired of his subject, or else was in so great a hurry to publish that he did not give himself time to throw it into shape, and at the end to gather up the various threads and thus bring it to a fitting close. Mr. Watson had a grand opportunity; for, as a complete whole, the tale of the discovery and colonization of South America can hardly be said to have been told before; but he has not made the most of it. To begin with, exception must be taken to an important omission in the scope of his work. Mr. Watson has tied himself down too literally to the geographical limits of South America. No account of the colonization of the New World by Spain and Portugal can be complete which leaves aside the conquest of Mexico. A general history, such as this purports to be, of the expansion of Spain and Portugal should pay a certain regard to the dramatic unity of the subject, from which the largest viceroyalty acquired by the Crown of Castile cannot reasonably be excluded; while, even from a geographical point of view, Mexico belongs rather to the Southern than to the Northern division of the continent. History is not merely a chronicle of events, however faithful and exhaustive; nor is it simply a brilliant series of pictures reproducing past scenes and portraying the actors with their motives and designs. It should deal with large conclusions, and show general tendencies, working through a long series of years, and shaping the development and mutual influence of States, all unknown perhaps to the actors themselves. Professor Seeley says that the true test of the historical importance of events is their pregnancy—i.e. the greatness of the consequences likely to follow from them. Applying this test, Mr. Watson might have made out of the development of the South American colonies a connected narrative, and have given historical as well as dramatic unity to his subject by showing how they necessarily tended to a climax, the attainment of which was marked by the celebrated boast of Canning. This Mr. Watson has failed to do. His two volumes are a series of unconnected essays, not leading up to any general conclusion; and his work closes so abruptly, so absolutely without any finish, that one is almost led to expect another volume.

While taking exception, however, to Mr. Watson's general treatment of his subject, full credit should be allowed to him for what he has accomplished. He has succeeded in the somewhat limited aim with which he set out—namely, that of giving an account of the colonies from which the States of South America sprang. Commencing with the discovery of the mainland of South America on the third voyage of Columbus, Mr. Watson traces the course of the early navigators, but finds himself, even at the outset, debarred by his self-imposed geographical limits from pursuing the narrative of Columbus's last voyage to Panama and Veragua, which eventually led up to the discovery of the Pacific. The first settlement on the mainland still retains the name of Venezuela, given to it by Ojeda from a fancied resemblance in the lacustrine dwellings of the inhabitants to the Queen of the Adriatic. It is interesting to find that, even at this early period, there is some trace of English navigators in these waters; for Ojeda, in his report of his voyage of 1501, states that he met English voyagers off this coast. No other record has been brought to light of this occurrence. Mr. Watson then recounts the settlement of the isthmus and adjoining territories by the two rival governors, Ojeda and Nicuesa, each of whom perished miserably, together with most of their companions; "but two humble followers survived, who were each destined to climb to the highest round of the ladder of fame. These were Vasco Nuñez de Balboa and Francisco Pizarro." No more dramatic incident can be found in the history of discovery than that of Vasco Nuñez commanding his followers to halt, and then climbing the mountain-top alone, in order that he might be the first European to gaze on the Pacific Ocean, of which he then, by spurring his horse into it, proceeded to take formal possession in the name of his Castilian sovereigns. His achievement merited a better fate than that of falling a victim to the treachery of the jealous Pedrarias. To the two great originators of discovery—Columbus and Prince Henry of Portugal, each of them profoundly religious—Mr. Watson points as having each, also unhappily, originated a new form of slavery; Columbus by his system of encomiendas, or partitions of Indians among the Spanish settlers, and Prince Henry by the enslavement of negroes. The feeling of the age, that all outside the pale of Christendom were unworthy of protection and were simply beasts of burden, has been urged in palliation of the remorseless and short-sighted cruelty of the Spaniards towards the natives; and some writers have laid the guilt of these excesses to the charge of a few ruthless and unlettered adventurers, such as Pizarro and Almagro, rather than to the Spaniards as a nation. Mr. Watson sweeps aside such excuses; he shows that the charges apply equally to all ranks and grades of the adventurers; and that wholesale depopulation, such as occurred in Hayti and Cuba, cannot be chargeable merely to one or more governors, but must be due to the colonists in general. Here and there occurs a noble example to the contrary; Isabella amongst rulers, Las Casas and Gasca among ecclesiastics, lifted up their voices in favour of the oppressed, and procured some mitigation of their sufferings.

Brazil was discovered by both Spaniards and Portuguese, independently of each other, in the same year, 1500; the former under Pinzon being the first to land and to explore the waters of the Amazons; while a few months later the Portuguese Cabral sighted the Brazilian coast, and in the following year an expedition from Lisbon under Amerigo Vespucci sailed along it as far as the 32° of southern latitude. From this voyage he got the credit of discovering the mainland of Brazil, and his name, at first applied only to those regions, was afterwards extended to the entire continent. The Portuguese planted a colony at Bahia in 1504, while the Spaniards, sailing further south, in hopes of finding an opening into the Pacific, took possession of the Rio de la Plata under De Solis, and Sebastian Cabot explored the upper waters of the Paraná to a distance of more than a thousand miles from the sea. Buenos Ayres was founded by Mendoza in 1534, and Asuncion on the Paraguay three years later. Shortly after Cabeza de Vaca completed the exploration of the country between that river and the Atlantic. The colony of Paraguay was the only one in which intermarriages between Spaniards and the natives were encouraged, the result being a singular mixture of outward civilization and primitive simplicity, which paved the way for the subsequent spread of the Order of Jesus in that country. Meanwhile the Portuguese navigator Magalhaens, sailing under the Spanish flag, had found the Straits which bear his name, and was the first to sail from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Such had been the ardour of discovery, that within about thirty years from the first voyage of Columbus the entire eastern coast of the American continent from Labrador to Tierra del Fuego had been explored. Within the same period, too, had been effected the discovery and overthrow of the only two civilized States of the New World, Mexico and Peru, and the establishment of Spanish vice-royalties in their stead. The conquest of Mexico, as we have seen, is passed over by Mr. Watson; that of Peru, though a twice-told tale, is clearly narrated in two interesting chapters by him. He compares the exploration of South America with that of Africa to-day, and remarks that, though the consideration of civilized peoples towards weaker races has become somewhat greater, there is still much room for improvement. From Peru the Spaniards overran Chili, and founded Santiago before the middle of the sixteenth century. The revolt of the colonists against the authority of the Spanish Crown was nearly anticipated by two centuries and a half. Blasco Nuñez, the first Viceroy of Peru, attempted to enforce some obnoxious ordinances, but was resisted by the colonists under Gonzalo Pizarro, and slain in battle. The latter was in a position to have founded a dynasty of Pizarros had his force of character as a politician equalled his ability as a military leader; but the revolution was averted by his lack of decision and the timely repeal of the obnoxious ordinances by the Crown. The royal authority was consolidated by the judicious proceedings of Gasca, the agent sent out single-handed to cope with disaffection by moral means alone, very much as General Gordon to the Soudan. The Portuguese possessions in Brazil were not considered as being of real importance to the mother-country until the lapse of half a century after their discovery, when De Sousa was sent out as Governor-General, and took with him Nobrega and some other Jesuit fathers, the first of their order who proceeded to South America; they began their missionary efforts with children, and made considerable progress in converting and civilizing the native races. In addition to these works of peace, Nobrega aroused his countrymen to the dangerous rivalry of the French, and succeeded in driving them out of Rio de Janeiro, where they had endeavoured to make a permanent settlement. The Portuguese had not like the Spaniards merely come to search for gold; they were legitimate colonists in a country where there was ample room for them as well as the native tribes. By the year 1580 Brazil was stocked with European fruits and cattle, while the industry of the settlers had created a considerable trade. They were obliged to defend their possessions against the attacks of various enemies, and succeeded in holding their own against Spaniards, French, English, and Dutch.

The most interesting and perhaps the least known episode in South American history is the Araucanian war, to which Mr. Watson devotes three chapters. The country of this brave people lies to the south of Chili, between the Andes and the sea; such was their love of liberty and power of endurance that for ninety years they resisted all the efforts of the Spaniards to enslave them, and, alone of native races, eventually secured the recognition of their freedom and independence. Much better known is the story of the establishment of the Jesuit Missions in Paraguay, which Mr. Watson discusses with the advantage of personal knowledge of the country. Acting on the principle that it was better to attach than to weaken or exterminate the native tribes, Philip III. sent out the Jesuits for that purpose in 1608. Their scene of action was on the frontier territory between the Spanish and Portuguese settlements. While allowing that their early success in converting the natives was very remarkable, Mr. Watson observes that it may be as well to remember that it is the Jesuits themselves, and not independent writers, who have chronicled the fact. Moreover, Portuguese rapacity in slave-hunting frightened many refugees into the Spanish missions. In Paraguay, too, there were no mines, and servitude within the reductions was disguised under the name of labour for the common good. The Jesuit policy, however, produced a mental and moral imbecility which at length, under the tyrants Francia and Lopez, resulted in the extinction of the Paraguayan race.

The most serious rivals with whom the Portuguese had to contend were the Dutch, who during the first half of the seventeenth century disputed with them the possession of Brazil. The latter made themselves masters of the capital, Bahia, and the Brazilians were astonished to find that the Hollanders meant to keep possession of what they had taken. They built naval arsenals, so as no longer to be dependent on Europe for the repairs of their fleet; and proceeded to establish themselves at Pernambuco, under the governorship of Maurice, Count of Nassau. In the year 1639 they held six provinces in Brazil. The ambition of the Dutch, however, was out of proportion to their resources, while their policy was far from conciliatory. Conspiracies were formed to shake off foreign rule, and their non-observance of a truce recoiled on their own heads. The war lingered on till 1661 before they were finally expelled from Brazil; the marriage of our Charles II. with a Portuguese Princess hastened the conclusion of a treaty between the belligerents. The Dutch left few traces of their occupation behind them; difference of religion had proved a barrier to any amalgamation of races. Holland retained her possessions in Guiana, in which part small settlements had also been effected both by the English and French. The latter gave some trouble towards the close of the seventeenth century, and claimed all the country to the north of the Amazons; but complications in European politics prevented France from making good her claim. Bahia remained the principal city until the discovery of the gold and diamond mines in the early part of the eighteenth century, which soon led to the exploration of the interior of the country; the seat of Government was then transferred to Rio de Janeiro on account of its proximity to the mining district. Mr. Watson's book must be consulted for an account of the progress of the various colonies, if they can be said to have progressed under the jealous and exclusive colonial system, and the imbecile commercial policy of Spain. Buenos Ayres, to-day a place of first importance in South America, had until the collapse of the narrow repressive policy of Spain no history beyond that of its foundation. The chief event in South America during the latter part of the eighteenth century was the expulsion of the Jesuits; they had done their work as far as it could be of benefit to those under them; their further stay would only have hindered real progress. Mr. Watson, as has been said above, does not trace the history of the colonies to its legitimate close in their assumption of independence, but finishes abruptly with an account of the ill-fated English expedition to La Plata in 1806-7. In spite of its fragmentary treatment of the whole subject, the book is valuable as the only comprehensive historical work on the whole of South America; and it would be well for the diplomatic service if all its members would turn their opportunities to as good an account as Mr. Watson had done.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

THE fourth and fifth volumes of Bishop Ellicott's Commentary on the Old Testament fulfil the promise of its earlier portions. It is called a Commentary for English Readers, and it will give them probably as much information on the subject as is at hand at present; but, while carrying out its avowed object, it has the further merit, in many places, of special interest to readers of the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate. To ensure the success of such an undertaking it was necessary not only to select able men, but to adapt their subjects to their peculiar gifts, and an instance, though not the only one, of this happy selection is the assignment of Isaiah and Jeremiah to the Dean of Wells. Dr. Plumptre has not only the requisite learning for a commentator on these books, but the poetic instinct to appreciate the epic grandeur of Isaiah and the intensely personal character of the outpourings of the "weeping prophet," which makes so much of the charm of his prophecy.

It is a sign of the times that in a commentary with the imprimatur of Bishop Ellicott there should be so much freedom of comment, and that the writers should cut themselves so definitely adrift from many traditional interpretations and conventional views. Dr. Stanley Leathes, for instance (with whose conception of Satan, however, in the Book of Job we do not agree; he seems to be represented there rather as "advocatus Diaboli" than Diabolus, and as one of "the Sons of God"), seems to make no attempt to claim a Messianic character for the famous passage xix. 35, and there is an absence of definiteness in Mr. Deane's allotment of the four beasts in Dan. vii. which inspires confidence in his caution and knowledge. The same remark is true generally about Dr. Gardiner's comment on the mysterious imagery at the opening of Ezekiel. In his note on Jonah i. 17 Mr. Aglen leaves it an open question whether the book is "a parable pure and simple," and Mr. Jennings on Haggai ii. 7 ruthlessly destroys a favourite text, "The desire of all nations shall come," by his rendering "and the precious things of all nations shall come"—i.e. costly offerings shall be brought to the Temple. We by no means intend to impute the slightest want of reverence to the commentators; their names protect them, as well as their work to those who do not know their names. We have pointed out these instances of comparative freedom of treatment in a book animated and pervaded by a reverent spirit to show the possibility of this kind of comment, and as a distinct enhancement of its value. We have seen nothing better at present than this attempt to supply a felt want, and we are glad to add that what may be called the whole "get up" of the volumes is worthy of the matter and of the names of the contributors.

Canon Swainson's learned and careful edition of the Greek Liturgies demands and deserves a more critical and lengthened examination than can be given to it among the short notices on Books of Divinity. It contains, besides a very interesting introduction of more than fifty pages, the Liturgy of Alexandria, otherwise St. Mark, from three different MSS., the liturgies of the eighth century—namely, of St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and the Liturgy of the "Presanctified," i.e., of the bread consecrated before it was offered; the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (eleventh century), of St. Basil (eleventh century), of the Presanctified (eleventh century), the Liturgies of St. Peter, of Palestine, of St. James, and a very interesting appendix in the shape of the Canon of the Mass after the use of the Coptic Church, with an English translation in columns opposite the Coptic character, with the rubrics distinguished by italics. The editor's aim has been to reproduce these liturgies from MSS. still existing; he has been indebted, besides his special knowledge of the subject, to good luck and to the kindness of friends for some of his treasures, notably for a MS. of the Liturgy of St. Mark, found in the Vatican, and the result is a goodly quarto marked no less by care and scholarship than by the admirable printing which might be expected from the University Press. Complete as the edition appears, it is evidently not a final product of liturgiological learning. For the earliest Christian liturgies have their origin in liturgies earlier still, and they have affinities with Jewish forms of worship. The "rite" of the Jewish Church in the time of our Lord is an almost unexplored region of knowledge, and until more is known about it there will remain much in Christian liturgies that is inexplicable. The apparent references to Jewish usages are frequent enough to justify the belief that the later are very largely indebted to the earlier forms. But, as expressing the latest information in a form that for accuracy, exhaustiveness, and mode of execution leaves nothing to be desired, the present volume may be heartily commended to all students of liturgiology.

Mr. Lilly's volume is a reprint, with additions, of articles published in the Nineteenth Century, the Fortnightly Review, the Contemporary and the Dublin Review, and it bears traces of its composite origin. We take some exception to his title, unless he includes Christianity among ancient religions. He has many pages on Buddhism, and a chapter on the religions of China, of the Magi, of the Hindoos, and of Mahomet; but the real drift of the book is the struggle between naturalism and supernaturalism. Regarding "Modern Thought" as equivalent to the "reasoned pessimism" of Schopenhauer, he asks, "Is religious faith any longer possible?" and his final word, put into the mouth of one of the speakers in a dialogue on this inexhaustible subject, is:—

> Plurima quæsivi; per singula quæque cucurri;
> Nec quidquam inveni melius quam credere Christo.

The pages and chapters group themselves round this issue; but there is a good deal of incidental learning and illustration which will help the reader through an argument he knows beforehand to be endless and hopeless, and are a considerable justification of Mr. Lilly's contribution to the controversy. To many minds his arguments will be vitiated throughout by the supposed obligation of a member of the Roman Church, as the writer appears to be, to believe in and to champion its infallibility; but his creed gives him, at least, the advantage of illustrating faith and pessimism in the persons of Cardinal Newman and Arthur Schopenhauer. If a creed or theory of life could be proved by its observed effects on the life and character of its holder, Roman theology could find no better argument than to point to John Henry Newman; and pessimism would stand condemned by the selfish and, it is hardly too much to say, repulsive life of Schopenhauer, as portrayed by Miss Zimmern, "a professed admirer." Mr. Lilly's papers were worth collecting, and they form a volume which will interest those who will take the trouble of abstract thinking.

In turning over the pages of Mr. Freeman Clarke's Ideas of the Apostle Paul, a student or theologian might be disposed to wish that he had remembered "the vast library of works which have this Apostle for their subject" before he wrote his preface. But it is probable that there are many readers and more hearers of St. Paul's writings who have little idea of the breadth and largeness of his Christianity, and there is little doubt that there are many church and chapel goers who, from want of any power of independent inference, would be simply shocked to hear some of his liberal utterances translated into social English and applied to the circumstances of the day. To such persons this volume will be useful, novel, and interesting. To those who are familiar with even the most recent literature on the subject, to read again of St. Paul's physical characteristics, of the impression made on him by the death of Stephen, of the meaning and purpose of his retirement into Arabia, of the intensity of his struggle with sin, of the affectionateness of his nature, is to go over too familiar ground once more. Nor do the author's discussions on the abstract questions arising out of the Epistles strike us as more original than his treatment of the personal narrative. Such questions as Justification by Faith, Inspiration, the Second Coming of Christ, "Children of wrath," and such like, invite the examination of the thoughtful reader; but we are bound to say that we have found nothing in the author's discussion of them but what is obvious, and little in a closer reading of the volume to remove our first impression that, though likely to open the mind of the general reader, judged by a higher standard it was commonplace.

To say of Dr. Leckie's Sermons that they are above the average may be thought not to be saying much, but if they were all equal to the best of them, it would be possible to say more. His prevailing weaknesses are a tendency to be run away with by his illustrations, and an indulgence in a too abstract treatment of his subject, and here and there he sinks into prosiness. The sermons on "The Everlasting Yea" and on "Speech and Silence before God" illustrate both of these faults. The reader, however, who has the patience to read the volume through will gather something as he goes, and will be rewarded by coming to a really good sermon at the end of the volume on "Present Phases of Unbelief." It is an unfortunately threadbare pulpit-topic nowadays; but Dr. Leckie has something to say upon it which is worth reading, and he has read enough of modern literature to know what he is talking about. Of course the sermon suffers from the inevitable want of the check of a "reply," as when he says that the assertion that "man cannot know God is not Agnostic, but a claim to exhaustive knowledge of man and God"; this is surely playing with words, and in his argument for the "disinterestedness" of Christian benevolence he seems to miss the point that, in a benevolent action which involves any sacrifice, the resulting pleasure is out of sight for the time and not regarded; only the pain of the sacrifice is in view. But he makes two points in his argument for Christianity as the only religion which has ever provoked controversy, and in his exposition of the mutually destructive tendencies of its two great rivals, Positivism and Agnosticism. The sermons are clearly expressed, the subjects of several of them unconventional, the language that of an educated man, and the general result of reading some of them is that time has not been wasted.

Mr. Cunningham's learned and interesting little book covers a good deal of ground in a few pages. He divides the opinion and practice in matters of lending and borrowing into three periods—the early Christian, the mediæval, and the modern. The evil of usury assumed different forms in the different periods. In the form of sin, or un-Christian motive, among "the brotherhood," it was the object of vigorous protest from Christian teachers; in the middle ages the ordinary course of financial transactions was modified by ecclesiastical teaching; and after the Reformation public opinion on the subject shared in the revolution of all opinion, and principles and practice in financial concerns were adopted which it was hard to justify by the law of Church or Scripture. In early times, when money was scarce, a loan was generally not of money, but of some article of use, as a horse, a weapon, or a boat; it was enough at first that they should be returned in as good a state as when borrowed; this was locatio, and the transition would be easy from it to the mutuum, the loan of articles like food, which could not be returned, but became wholly the property of the borrower, and for which an equivalent only could be repaid. Another result of locatio was in time the payment of hire for an article; and from this arose the payment of hire for the use of the equivalent of the article—namely, its worth in money. But the Christian and ecclesiastical theory was that the lender was no worse off for the loan of money, as he might be for the wear and tear of horse or boat, and that therefore to make profit out of his neighbour's need was wrong; a not unnatural inference when there could be no investments. The growth of opinion and legislation accompanying these developments of view and of social conditions is traced with clearness and knowledge by Mr. Cunningham, but he is not content with history. In his last two or three pages he contends that Christian principles about usury should be applied to the government of India and of Ireland, which he says should be governed, not according to Indian or Irish, but according to Christian ideas; and this appears to mean that Christians should lend money without interest to the ryots and the cotters to pay their rent. Whether the reader agrees with this conclusion or not, he will, we think, be pleased with this attractive little epitome of the learning and legislation of an interesting subject.

It is probably due to Mr. Milne's "isolated position" that he has written another "Bitter Cry." Though his problem is the "Churchless and Poor," he has devoted most of his space to the churchless because he thinks that "the condition of the lapsed population . . . . has not been yet fully dealt with in its many-sided aspects by any previous writer." We who live in less "isolated positions" feel as if hardly any other subject had been dealt with for months past. He thinks "endowed territorial work" the best agency for meeting the spiritual wants of the masses; but that the work is so overwhelming that co-operation of all the Evangelical churches, the introduction of new agencies, and the multiplication of individual missionary effort, are necessary for "the complete solution of the problem." It is hard to see the need of the limitation implied in Evangelical and to guess what the new agencies are.

Mr. Milne ascribes the physical degradation of the poor to drink and overcrowding, and he looks a good deal too much for a real reformer to the State to remedy these evils. The only way, of course, in which the State can check overcrowding in towns is by making the country more attractive and profitable as a residence for a poor man; but Mr. Milne does not go to this depth in his suggestion, nor, when he complains that the State draws a revenue out of the vice (i.e. drinking) of the poor, does he appear to see that, if the State did not draw the revenue, drink would be much cheaper and drunkenness a good deal worse. One cause of the degradation of the poor, the saddest to all who work among them, he ignores altogether—namely, the habits and character of the poor themselves, the extent to which having things done for them, from the Poor Law upwards or downwards, has contributed to make them what they are. Once begun, the vicious see-saw of the action and reaction of persons and surroundings is endless, and no one can say which element is most to blame for the present state of things.

Dr. Manning's Not of Man, but of God is another American book of divinity. In so far as such books are apologetics they have the common defect of not seeing the point of our difficulties. It is the Bible that is "not of man, but of God"; and Dr. Manning states as his thesis that God has spoken to man, and that our Bible is such a record as we need of what he has said. He goes on to prove this on à priori grounds—such as the power and desire of God to reveal himself, the need of inspiration, &c.—and on such à posteriori arguments as the witness of uninspired men, the testimony of prophecy, the power of the Bible among men, what it says about God, moral order, and redemption. But his proofs do not meet the case either of those who deny the possibility of any communication between man and the absolute, or of those who approach the Bible from the view-point of the critic and undermine its authenticity in detail. It is no answer to either of these objectors to attempt to prove that the Bible, one and indivisible, is the word of God. Dr. Manning's book is written in homely style, and is apparently addressed to working-men. It may bring comfort and assurance to the devout among them, but is hardly calculated, from the author's somewhat narrow range, to conciliate the more thoughtful, or to strengthen the hold upon them of a book which is destined to gain in influence, not by undiscriminating defence, but just in proportion as its essence is seen to resist the higher criticism, and, after all deductions, to remain what it professes to be, a Revelation and a Guide.

Such titles as "The Spare Minute Series" and Right to the Point may perhaps prejudice fastidious readers against these extracts from the writings of a worthy and accomplished and exceptionally energetic man. Dr. Cuyler is well known as a preacher and journalist in America and in England; he has contributed one thousand articles to the New York Evangelist, and probably a thousand more to other journals; the number of his sermons can hardly be calculated if, as he says, he "never lost but two Sabbaths from sickness in his life" (he was born in 1822), and he seems to have been a frequent platform speaker during the week; so that he has furnished a vast amount of material for the affection of his friend, Mrs. Storrs Haynes, to select from; but it may be doubted whether it is not rather a cruel kindness to present 343 cuttings out of any man's writings in 264 small pages of large and wide print. Few men have the gift of putting so much in such small compass, and when the arrows do not go "right to the point," they darken the air by their bewildering shower. It is possible to read Coleridge's and Seldon's Table-talk, but we are bound to confess that the extracts from Dr. Cuyler are just good enough to make the reader feel that they do him an injustice, and not good enough to make him read very much of them. The admirer has mistaken the strong point of her hero, and has made a book which to Dr. Cuyler's personal friends will, no doubt, have the charm of an ἀνάμνησις, but which will not hold the general public. From what Dr. Newman Hall says in his preface, we would rather have heard the American orator preach a sermon than read this volume of clippings.

There is no disposition to criticize a little book of devotions like Jesus the Comforter. Except in its second title—"A New Imitation of Christ"—it makes no pretension, and is a tribute of affection to the memory of a departed friend or relation. Its structure is simple and uniform; at the head of every page in large print is a verse from the Gospels, beginning with St. John i. 1, and ending with "Ecce Homo"; beneath this in smaller type is an explanation, and at the foot of the page some personal and ejaculatory reflections. It would be impossible, therefore, to give a fair specimen of the author's style without copying out a page, for which we have not space, but we are doing him no injustice in saying that both the explanations and ejaculations are for the most part sufficiently obvious, because the aim of such writing is not so much to say what is new as to remind readers of what they know already.

The only passage in the volume which we cannot understand at first sight is the announcement of a "Key" to it, to be shortly issued by "Theozeton," as we can find no mystery to unlock. If it had not been called a new "Imitation," respect for its piety and devotion would have sheltered it from comparison; but it is difficult with such a challenge not to add one more to its many texts, and say "The old is better."

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge have crowded the whole of the New Testament portion of The Churchman's Family Bible into one by no means bulky quarto. To accomplish this they have been obliged to have recourse to very thin paper and very small type. A more acceptable mode of keeping down its dimensions would probably have been to reduce the length of many of the notes, and to do away with most of the woodcuts. It is not always remembered by commentators that a note, to be read, must be short; a solid paragraph of small print in a footnote is repellent to readers of "family" editions of anything, and we are obliged to confess that more than one of the bishops and clergymen who are commentators of this edition of the Bible seem to regard a note often rather as a short sermon than an index to a meaning. Notes should be explanatory, not devotional or didactic. "Rem acu tetigisse"—is the praise of Bengel, and the maxim should be ever present to the annotator. It would be invidious to point out the worst offenders in such a reverend company; but there can be no offence in saying that the Bishop of Rochester, as might be expected, approaches most nearly to the ideal note-writer. Another and a serious fault to be shunned is that of treating readers like children; of shirking difficulties; of keeping back what the writer knows or thinks; of saying nothing about various readings or mistranslations which alter the sense of classical passages. To be abreast of the time a Family Bible should give the best results of research up to date, or it injures the cause it is issued to promote.

We think, too, that the woodcuts are hardly up to the mark; they are not numerous enough to make the volume that children's treasure, a Picture Bible, nor refined and artistic enough to please people who would study the notes. So much for detailed criticism. On the whole this edition of the New Testament is an advance on anything yet issued with the same aim and at a similar price, and will be a pleasure and help to devotional students.

The most surprising thing about this surprising little tirade of Mr. Allan-Fraser's against the clergy and the capitalists is the announcement on its title-page that it is the second edition. That he should have re-read his composition and deliberately re-issued it is an argument against that "soundness of mind" in the author which he regards as the sum of Christian virtues. Within the narrow limits of fifty pages he manages to repeat and contradict himself more than once; he foams at the mouth, and runs amuck against all professional teachers of religion, from the established clergy to the Salvation Army. But he is not the less a Christian, though he contends that oral supplication and dependence upon supernatural aid belong not to Christianity but to Churchism. It is hard to guess where he has been living. A man who can write even as well as he does must know that the best of the clergy are actually found fault with for preaching too much about obedience to laws of nature; that they repeat to weariness that public and private worship are the merest aids to obedience and not the substitute for it; that they are fervent in enforcing sanitary laws and in improving the condition of the poor.

But a writer who tells us that Christ's teaching was materialistic, and yet that true Christianity consists in men being, "in the figurative language of Scripture, born again" by the natural means of obedience to divine laws, is past arguing with. After such an instance of the confusion of thought which runs through the volume it seems a trifle to find the author arguing in one page for bringing up (apparently) every child to manual labour, and in the next inveighing against the overcrowding of workrooms, and later on ascribing the miracle of Elijah (who was a man of science it seems!) on Carmel to his knowledge of chemistry, and the preservation of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego in the furnace to their "coats, their hosen, and their hats" being made of asbestos. If Mr. Allan-Fraser is not in earnest in writing this book it is a poor joke; if he is, let him take it back and re-issue only the positive truths in it, for there are some, and cut out the negations, the repetitions, the contradictions, and the exaggerations.

RECENT DISCOVERIES AT JERUSALEM.*

IT is perhaps difficult to write an account which shall be both popular and short of the researches which have been conducted during the last twenty years in Jerusalem. Mr. King confines himself, in his title-page, to the Temple Hill, but as he includes the Royal Quarries, which are not on the Temple Hill, one naturally asks why he does not include other parts of the city where Warren, Conder, Clermont-Ganneau, Schick, Guthe, and others have excavated and made discoveries. By the suppression of some of the lengthy reports and unimportant details which fill out his paper, the author might have found room for many of these valuable researches. For instance, the finding by Ganneau of the scarp of what is believed to be the first wall, the recovery of the beautiful and interesting church on the Muristan, the ancient Jewish tombs beneath the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the course of the ancient wall on the Zion Hill, Captain Conder's ingenious identification of the real Holy Sepulchre, Warren's examination of the so-called Gate Gennath, the ancient cemetery north of the city found by Ganneau in 1874, the bearing of the rock levels on the controversy, and the nature of the controversy itself, without a knowledge of which the whole work appears to be conducted in idle curiosity and without aim or purpose—all these points should be considered in a book on recent discoveries in Jerusalem. Again, if the compiler says that his scope only permitted him to speak of the Temple Hill, why does he put in the Royal Quarries? And why does he leave out altogether the Dome of the Rock? Surely he cannot be ignorant of the discovery of the round arches made when the walls were stripped some ten years ago. We are still waiting for some English architect of authority to speak of this beautiful edifice; but, meantime, it is a most amazing omission in a book, however small, written on the subject of the Temple Hill to find no account whatever of the controversy which has been raging round its principal building for thirty-seven years—since the day, in fact, when Mr. Fergusson first put forth his famous heresy in the face of history, tradition, and, as students of architecture of reputation equal to his own have considered, in the face of architectural history itself. If, however, as we hope will be the case, the interest in the subject carries the book to another edition, we trust that a chapter may be inserted, before the author begins with the walls, treating of the Temple Hill itself, what now stands upon it, what is supposed to have once stood upon it, and what are the various theories on the position of the Temple. The moment for the production of the book seems also singularly ill chosen when we are waiting, and expecting daily, the appearance of Sir Charles Warren's great work on Jerusalem, with the plans and sketches never yet given to the world, and the complete account, not only of his own work, but also of all the researches in the city before and after his own.

This premised, we may proceed to give Mr. King credit for industry in putting together this book. In the first place, he has apparently visited Jerusalem, and speaks as an eye-witness. No one ought to write upon the subject who cannot do so. Next, he appears to have read with great care a long paper which appeared in the Journal of the Exploration Society some four years ago on the masonry and walls of the Haram Area, by Sir Charles Wilson, as well as the reports sent home in 1868 by Captain Warren. And if he does not perceive the bearing of the facts, and therefore fails to make his hearers understand their importance, at least he states them. For instance, he shows that the so-called Castle of Antonia is part of the main east wall, but does not tell us what that means, or what may be deduced from a fact which to most readers appears absolutely unimportant. Then he jumps too hastily at conclusions, as, for instance, when he says that "immense deposits of rubbish must have been made to raise the vast platform of the Haram Area to its present height," forgetting that it is most probable that the place was built up, and that there are vaults and passages below vaults, such as that found by Warren under the Single Gate. Yet in his account of "Solomon's stables" he hints at the possibility of such vaults. Again, in speaking of these "stables," he accepts the theory of Fergusson that the masonry is Justinian's work, and ignores altogether the discovery of Warren that the vaults are reconstructions of older works. Yet this is most important, because it entirely knocks away the ground from Fergusson's further argument about the weakness of the arches. When Mr. King goes on to say that the Church of St. Mary was, "according to the same authority," erected at this place, his language is singularly unscientific. How can a man be an "authority" when he is advancing a theory? The theory may be sound, but it rests principally on conjecture, and there can be no authority about it.

The best part of Mr. King's little book, which must not be taken as even a concise, far less an adequate, account of the Society's labours, are the pages in which he speaks of the Partition Wall in reference to Ganneau's discovery of the inscribed tablet from Herod's Temple. As for the rest of it, we can only repeat that it is incomplete and unsatisfactory within its own limits, and that the compiler does not apparently understand the controversy. In fact, there can be nothing but regret felt that the Religious Tract Society has been so ill advised as to adopt and publish it.

THE DUMAS MEMORIAL.*

THE unveiling of Doré's "Dumas" in the Place Malesherbes gave rise to the delivery of a certain number of speeches and the composition and recitation of a certain number of pieces of verse. These the Committee have gathered together, and M. Jouaust, of the Librairie des Bibliophiles, has issued them in a good-looking plaquette, with subscription lists and inscriptions, a preface by M. Dumas fils, a reprint of his funeral oration over Gustave Doré, an etched portrait of Doré, and an engraving by Abot of one aspect of the monument, which, by the way, is a little disappointing. The ordinary edition is limited to five hundred copies; the édition de luxe, in Dutch paper and in Whatman, consist of but twenty and fifty copies respectively. There is evidently a superabundance of Doré, and perhaps a little too much of M. Dumas fils; but the book is well worth having for all that, for its rarity and its intrinsic interest alike.

The story of the memorial, as sketched by M. Dumas, is a singularly pleasant one. The idea originated with M. Théodore Villard, the engineer, a member of the Municipal Council of Paris. Living much and working hard abroad, M. Villard had read Dumas for years. Whenever he had to expatriate himself for any length of time, he took Dumas with him; and in Spain, in Russia, in Italy he laboured at making railways all day, and at night he went off with D'Artagnan and Chicot, and "alla stoccata carried it away," and he rested and was happy. What is more to the purpose, he was grateful as well, and in his own mind he determined that one of these days he would honour his poet with a statue. This idea he at last communicated to the late Victor Borie, manager of the Comptoir d'Escompte; and in his turn Borie related how he had found George Sand on her death-bed reading the Quarante-Cinq for the fifth or sixth time, and how she had told him that when she was "ill, perturbed, miserable, tired, discouraged even," she found a Dumas her best remedy against the ailment, whether moral or physical. That, as M. Villard knew, was the way in which everybody talked of his hero; and he at once proposed to Borie that they should form a Committee and start a subscription. The Committee—which included MM. Augier, Daudet, Feuillet, Gounod, Legouvé, John Lemoinne, Paul de Saint-Victor, Regnier, Sardou, Vitu, De Neuville, Emile de Girardin, and Albert Wolf—was duly constituted, and the subscription duly set on foot. For some time, it would seem, money came in but slowly. It is everywhere a far cry from the heart to the pocket; and, as M. Dumas, who passes for an authority on the question, is pleased to note, "Le Français est, plus que tout autre, visé dans cet axiome." At last, however, the Cercle de la Presse took the matter up, and gave a performance which brought in a good round sum; the Administration des Beaux-Arts gave 12,500 francs; M. Halanzier whipped up the actors; M. Perrin brought forward the Théâtre Français; M. Larochelle gave a benefit performance at the Gaîté; the Société des Dépôts et Comptes lent offices; the Société de la Marbrerie Nationale offered marble; Doré volunteered to design and model the whole memorial; the Municipal Council contributed a site; architects, builders, founders all put their hands to the work, either for nothing or for next to nothing; and in due course the monument was achieved. It is a result of which M. Villard may well be proud. To have taken the initiative in the glorification of Dumas—Alexander Maximus—is to have deserved well, not only of the arts, but of humanity.

M. de Leuven, a friend of fifty years' standing, spoke for the Committee; M. Albert Kaempfen for the Directeur des Beaux-Arts; MM. Camille Doucet and Jules Claretie for the Société des Auteurs et Compositeurs Dramatiques; M. About for the Société des Gens de Lettres; M. Halanzier for the Société des Artistes Dramatiques; M. Sénard, Mayor of Villers-Cotterets, for the great writer's fellow-citizens. These orations vary a good deal in worth and style. But they are alike in this—and in this they differ vastly from the general run of such things—that they are animated by a sentiment, not merely of admiration and respect, but of the heartiest affection. "C'est un bon enchanteur," says M. Kaempfen, "qu'on se prend tout naturellement à aimer"; and he goes on to note that few or none will ask who was the original of Doré's work, for that every one knows him already, and every one will salute the statue "comme l'image familière d'un bienfaisant ami." "Captivé déjà par la toute-puissance de cet enchanteur de génie," says M. Camille Doucet, his thoughts reverting to the brave days of Antony and Richard Darlington, "j'ai tout vu de l'homme et de son œuvre; j'en ai tout admiré, tout applaudi, tout aimé." M. Claretie is still more eloquent and exact. For him Dumas is "ce géant sans orgueil, ce grand homme qui fut un bon homme, ce Titan doux comme un enfant, fort comme un taureau, et tendre comme une femme." To him it is plain that Dumas the dramatist cared nothing for "le rire qui se moque de l'homme," but stood, on the contrary, "pour tout ce qui ennoblit la nature humaine"; so that in his vast achievement, "la bravoure, la générosité, la pitié, le pardon auront tenu la plus grande place." He painted humanity in his own image—better, that is to say, and more generous than it is; and in so doing "il a vécu populaire, il est mort populaire, il est demeuré populaire." M. Halanzier, speaking for the actors, told how Dumas "découvrait parfois en eux des qualités qu'eux-mêmes ne soupçonnaient pas," and how "de ces ressources latentes il faisait jaillir des effets prodigieux," so that in return they not only admired him enthusiastically, but loved him with all their hearts. As for M. About, he made the most affectionate and charming speech of all. Busy as he is, he has often forgotten his engagements over the Chevalier de la Maison Rouge or the Mohicans de Paris: he has heard his children quarrelling over the volumes of Monte-Cristo: he remembers how at school with himself and M. Sarcey, at the Pension Massin, there was a poor little Spaniard, who could neither eat nor sleep, who was supposed to be dying of home-sickness, and who turned out, on examination, to be pining for his father's house, not because he loved it, but because it contained a book which he had begun in his holidays and which he wanted bitterly to finish, the said book being a work called Les Trois Mousquetaires. Of course M. About had known the man, and like everybody else had loved him deeply, and of course he bears most eloquent witness to his admirable and delightful nature.

* Le Monument d'Alexandre Dumas. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles. 1884.

What perhaps is more to the purpose is that he takes occasion to speak with admiration and authority of the writer. "Nous avons eu parmi nous d'aussi grands écrivains," he says, "jamais un type d'homme de lettres aussi parfaitement accompli." On the still-vexed question of Dumas and his borrowings his words are golden. He points out that, whoever complained of Dumas, it was certainly not his assistants. On the contrary, they rejoiced to work for him in life, and in death the proudest of them are glad to have served in such a school, while M. Maquet, the first and best of all, is wont to talk of his master and friend "avec une véritable piété." On this subject, we may add, M. About is entitled to speak with all authority, for on one occasion it was his to catch Dumas "en flagrant bienfait de collaboration." It was in '58, at Marseilles. M. About was on his way to Italy, when he was seized upon at the station by "un colosse superbe et bienveillant," who whirled him off to his hotel, cooked him an incomparable bouillabaisse, took him to the theatre for the première of Les Forestiers (which they had forced him, he said, to write in three days), obliged him to share in the speeches and serenades which ensued, carried him off to a tremendous supper, brought him back at three or four in the morning dead with sleep and wanting nothing in the world but bed, lit his candles for him, and then, "frais et dispos comme un homme qui sort du lit," sat down to write three feuilletons for that day's post, and, "if he had time," to "bâcler pour Montigny un petit acte dont le scenario me trotte par la tête." When the astonished guest awoke next morning, the "irresistible being" was singing as he shaved himself; and there on the table were three thick envelopes addressed to the Patrie and two other journals and a roll addressed to Montigny. The "petit acte" was L'Invitation à la Valse, which is, M. About says, "tout bêtement un chef-d'œuvre." One of the novels was the Compagnons de Jéhu. M. About saw the first version of it on the hotel table. It was a thick volume of coarse white paper, "couvert d'une petite écriture fort nette, une excellente ébauche mise au point par un praticien distingué d'après la maquette originale du maître." Dumas, in fact, was accustomed to produce a careful first sketch; this he handed on to one or other of his assistants, who filled it up and developed it on the lines he had laid down. Then it came back to him in the form of the "first version," seen by M. About; and all he had to do was to copy it. This he did, with his own hand, "d'une belle et lumineuse écriture, sur un grand papier azuré et satiné"; and in the process the "first version" became organic and alive. "Il copiait à sa manière, c'est à dire en y semant l'esprit à pleines mains, chaque petite feuille de papier blanc sur une grande feuille de papier bleu." That is how the novels were written. The ghosts of Gaillardet and Co. may rise as they will, and protest as they may. Dumas is not the less Dumas, and there is no more to be said about it.

THREE BOOKS ON INDIA AND ONE ON CEYLON.*

ON all questions where "Oriental experience" is desirable Sir Richard Temple has a full right to be heard. His latest publication is not perhaps equal in value to his description of India in 1880 or to The Men and Events of My Time, but it deals extensively with history, geography, and political and social economy. Any one essay can be read without reference to what goes before or after, by persons who care to know how China was overrun by the Moguls or the Manchus; whether the establishment of Sailors' Homes at Bombay and Calcutta has had the effect of promoting temperance; how the rise of the Mahrattas to power was favoured by the geographical features of Western India; and what Candahar looked like when the late Governor of Bombay galloped up to it in November 1879, and like Hannibal after Cannæ, would have been quite prepared to hurl a hog-spear at its old walls and ride off at score. Sir Richard's cohorts, however, were not madidæ a tempestate, like those of the great Carthaginian, but were nearly stifled, he tells us, by a dust storm which he had seen coming down on his party from a distance of sixty miles. A critic or reader must be hard to please if he cannot select something to satisfy him out of the writings of an administrator who has governed the most jungly and backward as well as the most civilized provinces, who has helped to decentralize finance, who has laid down a rough-and-ready railway at the rate of a mile a day, and who has choked off a huge famine, or as captious critics assert, fed the inhabitants of Tirhoot so lavishly in 1874 that they appeared to the ordinary eye fatter and healthier after the expected calamity than they were before it. The style, like that of the Thames in Denham's poem, is full without overflowing; and graphic sketches, a good index, and some useful maps enhance its value. Here and there Lord Lawrence's pupil pens a sentence which in an official draft would have called for one of the late Viceroy's pithy and pregnant remarks. Without reviving a bitter controversy, we may fairly ask how any real statesman, Liberal or Conservative, can ever have looked on Afghanistan as the "promised land." Most administrators and writers have considered it as a problem full of difficulties and promising little else than a choice of evils. At p. 261 a curious distinction is drawn between fires "which are partly accidental and partly intentional," and, "when they are accidental, they present some of the most magnificent spectacles you can possibly figure to yourselves." Are we to understand from this that an intentional fire, the work of the class called ghurramies who set a large bazaar alight in order to be employed in building it up again as fast as possible, is a mean sight? It is also quite safe to prophesy in regard to certain distressing events that, bad as they were, "worse things might possibly happen if England were to fall asleep. But if she remains wakeful, they may, under Providence, be prevented." Sir Richard Temple would have better consulted his own high reputation by not reprinting an essay that appeared in the Contemporary Review for March 1883, on Local Self-Government in British India. Never did a weaker defence of an abortive and yet mischievous measure come from the pen of one who would vigorously set forth in past times the imperative necessity of personal, prompt, and almost despotic action on the part of district officers whether to purify bazaars, make roads, build bridges, arrest criminals, or inspect schools. We prefer to listen to the author on "Forestry," for instance, or on the "Monetary practice of the natives." On the first subject he gives due credit to Lord Dalhousie, who reserved Rukhs, or "grass preserves" in the Punjab, and prevented the reckless cutting of fine trees in the hills. No one is more wasteful in these matters than the Asiatic, who has recently been credited with a wonderful power of managing "his own affairs." Rich natives cram an acre or two so full of fruit-trees that the date and the cocoa-nut, the jack and the mango, the plantain and the leecheo, jostle each other out of existence. The poorer classes of agriculturists will sacrifice a whole hillside of splendid timber in order to grow rice for a couple of years only, on one or two plots, amidst charred roots and fertilizing ashes. A Forest Department has been in existence for the past twenty years, and measures are taken to prevent the destruction of immature timber, to replant vacant spaces, and to restrict the privilege of pasturing vast herds in the jungles within reasonable limits. The account of the uses to which timber is put by natives is instructive; but surely at p. 151 the bamboo should be read for the babul-tree, as one employed for "almost every purpose that can be useful in the daily lives of the natives." The babul is much too hard except for solid cart-wheels and other implements. The bamboo can be turned to anything; it forms the posts of the hut; split, it makes excellent wickerwork; in its joints the Ryot keeps his store of oil; and the wild bamboo becomes the spear of the hunter and the watchman or the offensive weapon of the Lattial and Dacoit.

The speech or lecture read to the Institute of Bankers in London will not solve the problem of the loss to India by exchange, but we see from it how silver is absorbed into India and hoarded, which is often another term for its being lost indefinitely to sight. We do not quite understand the data on which Sir Richard lays it down that, out of thirty-three millions of adult agriculturists, twenty-six millions are cultivators and only seven million proprietors. But his remarks on money-lending, interest, and the good faith of Sahukars or Shroffs, are instructive; and we do not quite share his despair of assisting peasant proprietors by advances from the State or from savings banks. The Tour in Palestine takes us over familiar ground, but here Sir Richard writes like an artist accustomed to much vivid contrast of light and shade, the glow of the sunset or the bursting of vegetation in the early spring.

Mr. Keene is known as the author of some eloquent poems published under the title of Ex Eremo—i.e. the jungly districts of Upper India—and as a writer on the Decline and Fall of the Mogul Empire in the last century. He is also a contributor to reviews and magazines. His present work is no new history of the Sepoy mutiny, but a supplement to it. We mean that he has no idea of treating of those momentous events which were turning points in that terrible struggle. The fall of Delhi, the relief of Lucknow, the final capture of that city, the march of Sir Hugh Rose right across India, are barely noticed. But he says truly that there were several districts in which our authority was never wholly lost, or, if lost, was very soon recovered, and where active civilians with a mere handful of Englishmen or raw levies were enabled to disperse predatory bands, and to send rebellious Rajas and treacherous sirdars to an early and a merited doom. The achievements of such men were, at the time, dwarfed by the gigantic proportions which the contest assumed elsewhere at ancient seats of Empire, but they are not the less worthy of commemoration; and there are divers political lessons to be learnt from the behaviour of whole classes of the community suddenly cut adrift and called on to think and act for themselves. Some epochs of history never weary us. Stories of the first French Revolution, of Napoleon's Russian expedition, of the battle of Waterloo, false or true, are always attractive. The Indian Mutiny has similarly furnished materials for more than one novel, and some of Mr. Keene's episodes are better reading than a story in which a crafty Mohammedan or a rascally Mahratta slays the white-haired colonel of sepoys, and carries off his daughter to the harem, whence she is rescued just in the nick of time by a dashing young captain at the head of a mixed force of Highlanders and Sikhs. Let us take, for instance, such districts as Saharunpore and Muzaffarnagur. It was of the last importance, geographically and politically, that some semblance of British authority should here be maintained. Saharunpore was at the head of the Doab. Muzaffarnagur touched Meerut. Both districts were on the line of march from the Punjab to Hindostan; and by Saharunpore communication was kept up with the Deyrah Doon and the Hill stations beyond it. In the district of Saharunpore there were few landholders of importance, but there were any number of cattle-stealers and raiders, and many of the agriculturists had heard of, if they had not participated in, the lawlessness of the old time just before Lord Lake's campaigns. Yet the civil officers were enabled to put down émeutes, to prevent the plunder of treasuries, to secure the gaols, to free the residents in the Doon who were shut off from the outer world, to detect a head policeman in correspondence with the rebels at Delhi and to hand him over for deliberate trial and execution by the Commissioner, and generally to maintain authority without establishing a reign of terror. In a disorganized population of more than a million, not one hundred were executed, though there was plenty of occasional fighting in bazaars and near forts. The same thing may be said of the districts of Meerut and Bulandshahr, though by the extraordinary remissness of the military authorities at the former station Meerut had to be recovered and not merely retained. It is not very easy to make out why, in the distribution of rewards and honours, the magistrates of Meerut and Bulandshahr deservedly received the honours of the Bath, and the magistrate of Saharunpore was only thanked by the Secretary of State. The late Sir Henry Lawrence used to say that, after a campaign, it was quite a toss-up whether a captain or a major became a C.B. or had to stand a court-martial. Agra and Rohilcund present features of interest of a different kind. Rohilcund was for months completely lost to us; and readers of the Life of Lord Clyde may remember that it was a question between the Commander-in-Chief and the Governor-General whether Oudh should be abandoned after the first relief of Lucknow and Rohilcund be cleared of rebels and regained. We never had the slightest doubt, then and since, that Lord Canning was right in insisting that Rohilcund, which we had lost after fifty years' peaceful possession, ought to be recovered before Oudh which we had annexed only fifteen months before. But surely Mr. Keene is in error in saying that the native ex-judge known as the Khan Bahadur of Bareilly made good his escape, though while in receipt of a pension for judicial services he had presided at a mock trial when some Englishmen were formally sentenced to death by the mutineers. To the best of our recollection, this white-haired and treacherous old scoundrel was subsequently apprehended and hanged. The condition of Agra was only one degree more satisfactory than Rohilcund. The whole English population was shut up in the fort till the middle of September and after the fall of Delhi; and the district itself, with those of Mathura, Aligarh, and Mainpuri, were practically lost. For the able defence of the gaol at the latter place by Mr. John Power, and for an amusing and characteristic letter written by him to the old Sudder Court, we refer readers to Mr. Keene's pages. The bulky records of criminal trials were at Mainpuri made available as shelter against the fire of the mutineers; and it is not often that documents stuffed full of perjury, forgery, and rascality have in India been turned to such excellent purpose. Mr. Keene, whose narrative is clear, concise, and in perfect good taste, draws some just conclusions from the Mutiny. He says that we cannot predict what Asiatics will do when we judge their conduct according to our own notions of what it is their interest or duty to do. Again, we should never trust such men as the Nana who owe us a grudge. A third is that the smallest education might have taught the predatory classes that England for one Englishman killed could supply fifty others. He might have added a warning against the grave error committed by Lord Ripon, his Council, and some of his lieutenants, in conceding to natives, unwatched and uncontrolled, the entire command of the resources, communications, and internal government of populous districts and towns. Whatever means may be employed to encourage native talent, to feed native vanity, and to discourage English unofficial enterprise, the supreme authority in every district, whether as regards its criminal classes, its roads and ferries, its gaols and its schools, its supplies and its sanitation, should for the next century, if we are to keep India so long, never wholly pass out of the hands of the English civilian, the successor of men who kept down Benares and recovered Etawa, Azimgarh, and half a dozen more such tracts.

If the second volume of Colonel Barras's adventures is inferior to the first, this impression may be due to the sameness of the subject. The most stirring adventures with roaring tigers, runaway elephants, and well-trained Shikarries have always a sort of family likeness. But Colonel Barras is never dull or pedantic. There is a frankness and simplicity in his style. Here and there, too, we have anecdotes not connected with sport. Many persons imagine from descriptions about the camp life of the Commissioner or the tourist that a tent pitched under a fine clump of trees or by the side of a noble river, must be the very poetry of Indian life. The exigencies of the public service, the inspection of police stations, ferries, new roads or new kutcherries, can be judiciously combined with recreation and sport. There is usually some subordinate agency in the neighbourhood of a jungle swarming with all kinds of game, that must be inspected. There is no necessity to strike the tents every day, nor any desperate hurry to be off for the next camping ground at 3 A.M. Everything can be done in a leisurely, gentlemanly fashion. The tents are struck after an early breakfast, at 8.30. Perhaps one has been sent on over night with the heavy baggage; but when the last camel, bullock cart, or elephant, has got off at 10 o'clock, the civil officer mounts his horse and takes a favourite marsh or preserve obiter, so as to give the servants plenty of time to reach the next post, to prepare the dinner, and to reproduce the comfort of the preceding encampment. All this is practical and pleasant. But it is not so with regimental officers on a march. Every military station is not yet accessible by rail, and Colonel Barras gives a correct and vivid description of the sufferings of his comrades on a long march from one large cantonment to another. Everything is done under rigid and inexorable rules. Officers and men retire to bed at a very early hour. The reveillé is sounded at 3 A.M. The subaltern shivers in the clear sharp air of the cold season. Hot coffee is hastily swallowed, and amidst groaning camels, creaking bullock carts, irascible masters, and shouting natives, the cortège gets off at 4, and reaches its halting-place by 9 A.M. It is not every man who, after an early rise and a wearisome trudge over a dusty plain, has the pluck to spend the remainder of the day in scouring the neighbourhood in search of grey and black partridges and antelope. Yet this is what Colonel Barras and men of his stamp were quite ready to do in the absence of a committee or a court-martial to occupy the halt. This sort of life, though conducive to health and activity, is apt to be monotonous when continued for two and three months at a stretch. Colonel Barras was present at the great Durbar at Delhi in Lord Lytton's time, when the Queen was proclaimed as Empress of India; but we regret to say that the Colonel made his appearance on a country-bred horse of a mealy colour, with abnormally long legs and, we doubt not, a queer temper, like most of those animals. At this historical event coursing jackals and foxes with greyhounds had more attractions for him than pageantry and pomp. His eye deceived him as to the height of the famous Kootub Minar, eleven miles from the present city. What seemed to him a height of eighty feet was in reality one of 240. The Kootub, we believe, is the tallest pillar in the world. A story of the Mutiny is ghastly and significant. A certain havildar or sergeant was sentenced to be blown to death. When the gun was fired and the wretched man was scattered to pieces, the spectators were seen scrambling and fighting, like the dogs in the dream of Athalie in Racine's tragedy, over the lambeaux affreux. It turned out that the criminal had died with 300 rupees tied to his waistband in the hope of being pardoned at the last moment, and from sheer inability to find some one to whom he could entrust his savings. These, of course, are mere incidents, the bulk of Vol. II. being devoted to accounts of tracking tigers to holes in rocks, digging out a couple of hyenas, the terror of the station of Ahmedabad, and slaying panthers by the aid of two paria or village dogs named Baja and Buchi. There is also a very good story of an absconding elephant that took fright when some blank cartridges were fired, and was only recaptured by the exertions of a mahout who followed the fugitive for days, through scrub and corn-land, jungle and tank. A story or two of the famine, when the Ryots had not time to wait until dough could be flattened into cakes and toasted, is a sample of hundreds of other instances. But one of the saddest events in the book is the mishap that befel the author in the jaws of an enraged panther. It required all the coolness of his friend Sandford, who himself did not come off scatheless, to put a ball into the animal at the right time and place. But, though severely mauled, Colonel Barras owed his recovery to pluck and a sound constitution; and he actually promises us an account of Afghanistan and wolf-hunting.

Parts of Ceylon, in products and temperature, may be very like some of the southern districts of India. But it is quite right that the two countries should be separately administered. Mr. John Fergusson has had a close and long connexion with the press in that island, and has undertaken, not, indeed, to write a Cinghalese history, but to give an account of our administration for the past seventy years. It is, in fact, a year-book with several very good photographs and a capital map. No one need refer to the book for information as to the rise and spread of Buddhism, or to discuss whether Ceylon has claims to be the Ophir of sacred history. But for a capitalist and planter it will be most useful. The appendices are rather superfluous, but perhaps the story of an elephant kraal was unavoidable. Allowing for some enthusiasm as to the climate and attractions of the island, there is a good deal here to tempt unemployed young men of energy and education to try the life of a planter. We should not say that such a career is much preferable to one in Cachar, Kangra, Kumaon, or Darjeeling. But there are more openings than coffee. Ceylon is happily free from cyclones, typhoons, earthquakes, and "north-westers." The temperature in the low grounds is equable, ranging, say, from 75 to 84 in the twenty-four hours for a large portion of the year. The climate on the hills is, at times, delightful, though the rainfall is excessive and the inconvenience of living in a mist or a shower-bath during the rainy season is under-estimated. But the author is quite justified in pointing to the advance made in every department of administration during the last thirty years. Since the trumpery rebellion of Tickery Banda in 1847 there has been no one to give trouble. Revenue has increased from less than half a million to more than one million and a quarter. A population of nearly three millions requires only twelve hundred soldiers to keep the peace. The exports have vastly increased. Though a large proportion of the inland must always remain hill and jungle, some four millions of acres might be brought into cultivation. The chief reliance has hitherto been on coffee; but, while fortunes were made by proprietors with well-chosen gardens up to 1870, a horrible disease then made its appearance in the shape of a small fungus, blighting the leaf, ruining the berry, and attacking "old and young, vigorous and weak trees, with absolute impartiality." The remedy for this unhappy state of things is the introduction of new products—chinchona and tea, and possibly cocoa and india-rubber. All this enterprise has been aided by the formation of new roads. A railway lines part of the shore and runs up to Kandy and some stations beyond it. In Ceylon, as in India, there is no real advancement in any department without roads; and Mr. Fergusson gives the greatest praise to the late Sir Henry Ward and his successors for facilitating intercourse, for cheap postage, telegraphs, and steamers. The usual inconveniences of tropical climates—snakes, mosquitos, and leeches, to say nothing of fever and dysentery—are rather minimized. But we see no reason why independence should not be achieved by twenty years of expatriation and with no more danger or discomfort in Ceylon than in Queensland. And those who like sport and can stand heat, may shoot anything except tigers, from snipe and jungle fowl to leopards and elephants.

SURVEY MAPS.*

THE great enterprise which is producing these maps is that of a private Company, working mainly in the interest of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, to determine the natural features, and especially the value of the timber and metals and the agricultural advantages, of the territory about to be open to competition. As a large proportion of the territories of Dakota, Montana, and Washington has hitherto remained unsurveyed, it was necessary to institute a very complete exploration, beginning with the most elementary triangulations, and thus determining altitudes, on which trustworthy maps might be founded. Specimens of these topographical maps, filled with contour-lines showing every 200 feet of height, exhibiting parts of the gigantic territories of Montana and Washington, are already engraved. The scale is four miles to the inch, which will ensure all desirable detail, and render the maps thoroughly satisfactory in exhibiting all the valleys, watersheds, and courses of streams with such accuracy as intending settlers will require. Other series of maps, on half the scale of these, are also being prepared, coloured so as to indicate respectively—1, the minerals; 2, climate, rivers, and irrigation; 3, soils; 4, forests; 5, economic botany. We have seen specimens of the third and fourth of these divisions, which will compare favourably with the best existing maps of the kind. The work is proceeding at a rapid rate; and one guarantee of its intended efficiency is to be found in the fact that the maps already printed are treated as only tentative (and not, we believe, for sale), and bear the inscription, "Photolithographed preliminary sheet, for the use of the parties in the field, and subject to revision." Professor Pumpelly is the Director of the Survey, and its headquarters are at Nowport, R.I. He has a considerable force of scientific men working at the objects indicated above, with the aim of producing the maps with the utmost rapidity. Never before, surely, were the requirements of emigrants so well understood and so liberally provided for. Settlers in these remote regions will now be furnished with accurate details of the character of the lands they purchase, which ought to prevent their meeting the fate of poor Martin Chuzzlewit in his Eden, and being landed in a Dismal Swamp.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

MADAME DE WITT has done many pious services to her father, and her present collection of letters (1) is not the least of them. She has been remarkably frank, printing Guizot's triumphant description of the Spanish marriages (the pen had nearly run into the adjective "infamous" before Spanish) as "une grande et belle chose" which would cause France to grow greater and greater in Europe, and emphasizing the folly of the boast by the close juxtaposition of his account of his exile and of the downfall of the dynasty which he had served. But, on the whole, Guizot will gain, not lose, through the reading of this book (as it is likely to be read) by a new generation. His political faults are matter of history, and will remain matter of history; his literary merits, never of the highest, weakened by his want of style, and watered down by the immense voluminousness of his work, are already, short as is the time since his death, disappearing from the general remembrance. But his private virtues (marred chiefly by a certain schoolmasterishness and by a serenely narrow conviction of his own rectitude and infallibility, which he shared with a certain living statesman on this side the Channel) deserve commemoration, and such a book as this is better fitted to keep them in mind than any laboured memoirs. A very rigid moralist may ask whether it was quite consistent in Guizot to take credit in a private letter to Lord Aberdeen for a "politique bonne" for both countries in July and in November to take credit in a private letter to a French lady for a policy which had outwitted England and aggrandized France. But these little inconsistencies will happen. Guizot's untiring and conscientious faculty of work, his domestic affection, his freedom from personal greed of money or rank, the simplicity of his manners and thoughts when at the height of political prosperity, come out very well here.

The faithful and industrious M. Reinach has followed up his elaborate edition of his master's speeches with a closely-printed octavo volume of six hundred pages, giving the history of that master's Ministry of seventy days in the winter of 1881–1882 (2). The proportion of pages to days is perhaps excessive, and if the world's history were written on this scale it might be difficult to read it. It is needless to say that the author does not achieve this effect of disproportion without the intermixture of a very great deal of "doctrine" with no very large amount of "histoire." In fact, M. Reinach has improved the brief and rather disastrous Ministry of his chief into a kind of Gambettist "course," using that word in the sense which we believe it possesses in some religious circles. The character and purport of the volume are thus rather hagiological than historic.

We do not know that we can promise old admirers of the Poèmes antiques and the Poèmes barbares any very great delight in the pieces which M. Leconte de Lisle has collected in Poèmes tragiques (3). The reprinted Erinnyes, a shortened and very much weakened version of the first two plays of the Orestein, is really not much more than a parade-ground for the display of M. Leconte de Lisle's affected system of transliteration. Of the poems proper, "Le Lévrier de Magnus" is perhaps the best among the longer, "Sacra Fames" among the shorter. But the poet has not anywhere recovered the note of lyrical truth and beauty which he struck many years ago in "Requies," and has rarely, if at all, rivalled the graphic painting of the "Sommeil du condor" and the sombre tragedy of "Le jugement de Komor" and "Les Runoias." It would seem that the long course of translation to which he has since subjected himself has dried up his old vein without opening a new one. This is a pity, for M. Leconte de Lisle is one of the few living French poets whom it was possible to regard as something more than dabblers in verse.

M. Arsène Houssaye's La comédienne (4) appears to have been received with favour, for the eighth edition is before us. Had the demand depended upon our verdict, it would hardly have been very vigorous. The book is a kind of history of Rachel, "en forme de roman," as the author says. We do not love histories in the form of romances, and M. Houssaye's book does not convert us. As for the style, that is sufficiently familiar, and to us at least it is not attractive. M. Victor Hugo is reported as having said the other day, in an interchange of compliments, that M. Arsène Houssaye was not only a prose writer, but a poet. If he had said that M. Houssaye is as good a poet as he is a prose writer, we should have had the extreme pleasure of finding ourselves in (at any rate literal and grammatical) agreement with him.

Among reprints we have to chronicle the appearance of the third volume of M. Jouaust's Faublas (5) and of Pour une épingle (6) in the pretty little pocket library of M. Charpentier. The conjunction is humorous.

Two revised editions of technical manuals in Messrs. Hetzel's useful series of such things have appeared. The Jeweller's Guide (7) is perhaps more to the taste of the general reader than the Brewer's (8), not so much because of the subject as because that subject is handled in a less severely scientific spirit. The chemistry of beer and beer-making is exhaustively treated, but the history and the interesting subject of existing varieties of the product receive in comparison hardly any attention.

Two monuments of M. Vivien de St.-Martin's ability in directing large geographical works lie before us; one a fine Map of France (9), in four sheets, on a scale of about seventeen miles to the inch, and with the elevations of the ground admirably indicated by angular shading; the other the second volume of Messrs. Hachette's great Geographical Dictionary (10). The latter contains the letters D to J.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MRS., or Miss, or perhaps Mr., Emelyn W. Washburn had no need to insist in a preface that a history of Spanish painting might innocently be written. A field of this nature is never fully occupied, and every critic who can see and think for himself or herself has a manifest right to work on it anew. It is even a probable opinion that, as good books on the subject are not easily accessible, an honest compilation of reasonable proportions in readable English deserves to be welcomed. Let it be remembered, however, that a compilation is always a compilation, and at best a second-rate kind of literature. The Spanish Painters (New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons) is a fair specimen of the class. The author has diligently read and excerpted the standard work of Stirling-Maxwell, and has used Head and Ford. The originals, Cean Bermudez and Palomino, have not been neglected. More than that cannot fairly be said. Where these guides fail the author stops short. He or she sees with their eyes, and judges with their judgment. Besides, a history of Spanish painting in 1884 ought to have something to say about Fortuny and the recent revival. Now our author draws rein at Goya, where Stirling-Maxwell also stops. The Spanish quotations are generally accurate. Auto-da-fés must be passed as a barbarism which has become naturalized, and the printer is probably responsible for the statement that Velasquez was the friend of Philip II., who died before the painter's birth.

Mr. Nimmo has brought out a very handsome edition, in four volumes, of the tales and poems of Edgar Allan Poe. Beyond the attraction of clear print, fine paper, and really good and appropriate illustration, the edition is remarkable for containing the fragment called "The Journal of Julius Rodman," hitherto unpublished in any collection. It certainly does not take rank with Poe's best work, but as certainly has a unique interest. Furthermore, it should be stated that in the new edition the works are for the first time intelligibly classified. We look forward to Mr. Nimmo's promised volumes of translations from Hoffmann, and trust they may be found to contain "The Majorat" and the weird story entitled, in Tales from the German, "The Elementary Spirit."

The genial subject of tippling has obviously an attraction for the Rev. R. V. French, D.C.L., LL.D., F.S.A., Rector of Llanmartin, and Rural Dean. We learn from his title-page that he has already written a History of Toasting, and now he enriches historical literature with a study bearing the inebriating designation of Nineteen Centuries of Drink in England (Longmans & Co.). In this fat volume Dr. French tells us all about the bibulous habits of our very early ancestors, who drank mead and metheglin—which suggests methylated spirits, not unknown as a beverage to the French-polisher—and piment. Then he proceeds to the generations which drank beer and French wines. Then, after giving the history of port-drinking, he reaches our times, when we have come round to French wines again. Modern reform, according to Mr. Freeman, is often a return to the earliest constitutional practices; and so it is with drink. All things hang together in this world.

The humours of the House of Commons have long been the food of the daily press, and have been the subject of innumerable articles of the "Under the Gaslit Roof" and "In the Lobby" kind. Mr. David Anderson has collected some of his contributions to this rather tittle-tattling kind of journalism into a volume called Scenes in the House of Commons (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) The early chapters contain some useful information about Parliamentary procedure. The rest of the book is devoted to twice-served cabbage about Mr. Gladstone's treatment of his collar and coat-tails, Lord Hartington's way of placing his feet, and matters of equal importance.

It is very difficult to find a title for a volume of essays, and so Mr. B. A. Hinsdale's Schools and Studies (Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co.) is as good a name as another for a volume of papers on questions more or less related to books and education. Mr. Hinsdale is far too fond of scientific-seeming writers on sociology, who tell you that heredity is the something which causes us to inherit qualities, and that sometimes we do and sometimes we do not, and that the method of the thing is a puzzle, and other equally instructive truths. On the whole, however, he is very sensible; and is, for an American, creditably free from the itch for making imposing-looking generalizations out of scraps of second-hand evidence.

Nowadays, when so many superior persons find Christianity insufficient, and are taking up with Theosophism, the Worship of Humanity, Esoteric Buddhism, and Mumbo Jumbos of that kind, books on the religion of Buddha are naturally in demand. Now demand, though the fact is not generally known, has an influence on supply—argal, books on Buddhism appear, and the authors make contradictory statements about it, and abuse one another after the manner of Oriental scholars. The Rev. S. Beal publishes an account of Buddhism in China (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge), where, it seems, the religion has a great influence, because it does not exist. Surely Buddhism is the funniest ghost of the many ghosts of this generation.

Ranch Notes (Longmans & Co.) is the name given by Mr. Reginald Aldridge to a brief account of the cattle-raising industry in Kansas, Colorado, the Indian Territory, and Northern Texas. It is fairly well written, and his instances point the old moral. Be strong, industrious, and not too fastidious if you wish to get on in a new country; also a little capital is very useful.

There have been great men in the Cape also, as may be seen from Mr. Theal's Chronicles of Cape Commanders (Cape Town: Richards & Son). The reader who wishes to learn of the deeds done in ancient days by Jan van Riebeek, Zacharias Wagenaar, Cornelis van Quaelberg, and others of equally euphonious names, may consult Mr. Theal if they are not frightened by the weight of his book, both material and literary. It is terribly pestered with small details.

Because they are all of the same class, we mention the three following works together without pretending to criticize them:—The Rev. T. T. Carter has published a memoir of Harriet Monsell (J. Masters & Co.) which will doubtless be welcome in her own section of the religious world. A volume of Biographies of Celebrities for the People (J. & R. Maxwell) is edited by F. Banfield, M.A., and "personally revised" by somebody unnamed, probably the victims. In their portraits they appear to a man to be grinning or whimpering at the hideous caricatures of them presented to "the People." The reader and the reviewer pant in vain after Mr. Grant Allen, who, if it were not for Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, would be the champion maker of books of this generation. After exhausting science and art he has "commenced biographer," and publishes a volume of lives of discoverers, men of science or politicians, under the catch-penny title of Biographies of Working Men, in the "People's Literary Series" (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge).

To this same People's Series Dr. B. W. Richardson contributes a work with another catch-penny title, The Guild of Good Life (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge). It contains a certain amount of good sense on the subject of sobriety, cleanliness, &c., and the usual Richardsonian percentage of fussy regulations of hygiene which would bore to death anybody not a hypochondriac who tried to carry them out.

Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, who makes a point of interpreting Mr. Spencer, publishes a treatise On the Data of Ethics (The Modern Press). Mr. G. H. Browne's Notes on Shakspere's Versification (Boston: Ginn, Heath, & Co.) is a schoolbook suggested by the author's experience. We note with approval that it is interleaved with blank pages.

Mr. Spencer L. Holland publishes a Summary of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commissions Report (Oxford: Parker & Co.), and Messrs. R. S. Wright and Henry Hobhouse An Outline of Local Government and Local Taxation (Maxwell & Co.)—both dry and technical, but doubtless useful. Books of the merely useful kind are also Thrift and Independence, by Rev. W. L. Blackley, M.A. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge); The Complete Guide to Company Drill, by Captain W. C. E. Serjeant (W. Clowes); and The Annual Register for 1883 (Rivingtons). The Sketches by Boz are reprinted in ruinously small type by Messrs. Goodall, Backhouse, & Co., of Leeds. A Painting Book, by Kate Greenaway (Routledge & Sons), is a collection of outlines of some of her drawings, which children may fill up with colour if their parents let them spoil anything so pretty. The same firm publish a Common Objects Alphabet, an illustrated book for children of a very different kind; it is gaudy in colour and vulgar in drawing and idea. We have also received A Bird's-Eye View of London, published by the Graphic, the work of Mr. Wyllie, and executed with his usual vigour in the management of black and white.

ROYAL HOSPITAL for INCURABLES—The VOTES and INTEREST of the readers of the "Saturday Review," for the Election on the last Friday this month, are earnestly solicited on behalf of Mr. CHARLES BRUCE, who has been deformed and a cripple from his birth. A self-made and self-educated man, he has managed to support himself in very modest circumstances by his pen, and has written between twenty and thirty books, all of a good tendency. His volume of Sea Ballads is as complete as anything of its kind. He finds his physical powers giving way, and his friends are trying to obtain for him the shelter of this admirable Institution. References may be made to, and votes will be gratefully received by, Mr. BENJAMIN CLARKE, General Editor, Sunday School Union, 56 Old Bailey.

UNIVERSITY of SYDNEY.—CHAIR of CLASSICS.—Applications are invited from gentlemen, qualified by high academical position and educational experience, to fill the office of PROFESSOR of CLASSICS in the University of Sydney, vacant by the death of Dr. Badham.

Full particulars relating to salary, tenure of office, &c., may be obtained from the Agent-General for New South Wales, 5 Westminster Chambers, Westminster, S.W., to whom applications stating candidate's age, and accompanied by testimonials, should be sent before June 30 next.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—BERMONDSEY.—At a SPECIAL MEETING of the VESTRY of BERMONDSEY, held to consider the London Government Bill, it was moved by Mr. GRAGG, seconded by Mr. VIGAR, and resolved:

"That this Vestry gives its unanimous support to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purpose of opposing the Bill.

"That the Vestry present a petition to Parliament against the Bill, and oppose the passage of the same as they may be advised, and that the Clerk be instructed to take all necessary steps in that behalf.

"That this Vestry is of opinion that it is desirable there should be one Central Municipal Government with jurisdiction over the whole Metropolis, and that there should be a readjustment of the districts into which the Metropolis is at present divided for the purpose of local self-government, but regrets that Her Majesty's Government should have brought in a Bill which, if passed, would, while creating a unified central governing body, be utterly subversive of that local self-government of the several parishes and districts of the Metropolis which has been of essential service in improving the health and comfort of its inhabitants."

"The Vestry is of opinion that the proposed District Committees, having no independent power, but acting only under delegated authority, would fail to command the confidence of the ratepayers, and would be quite unable satisfactorily to fulfil the duties cast by existing statutes upon the elected representatives of the ratepayers.

"That this Vestry is of opinion that no measure for reforming the Government of the Metropolis will be satisfactory and effective which does not provide for the retention of local self-government in the several parishes and districts into which the metropolitan area after revision of its boundaries may be divided, the duties of such local authorities being clearly defined by Statute, each local authority being in federal connection with a central authority having jurisdiction over all those matters of Municipal Government which pertain to the Metropolis as a whole.

"That these Resolutions be communicated to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the local authorities of the Metropolis."

J. HARRISON, Clerk.

Town Hall, Spa Road:

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—BOARD of WORKS for the LIMEHOUSE district, comprising the Parish of LIMEHOUSE, the Hamlet of RATCLIFF, and the parishes of SHADWELL and WAPPING.

At a meeting of this Board, held to consider the London Government Bill, the following Resolution was applied:—

"That, in the opinion of this Board, the Bill now before the House of Commons, and known as the 'London Government Bill,' is calculated to increase and aggravate the evils of centralization, and thus vastly increase the financial burdens of the ratepayers, and is a direct violation of the principle of local independence and self-government; and that a petition be presented to the House of Commons not to pass the said Bill into law."

THOS. W. RATCLIFF, Clerk to the Board.

May 19, 1884.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a MEETING held at the Committee Rooms of the ST. LUKE'S RATEPAYERS' PROTECTION SOCIETY, Finsbury, on Monday, May 19, 1884, to consider the London Government Bill, it was resolved:—

"That this meeting of ratepayers desires to enter its emphatic protest against the London Government Bill, creating, as it will do, a gigantic system of centralization, with its attendant evils, extravagances, mismanagement, and greatly increased rates, removing local affairs from direct local control, and adding to local burdens large sums now paid out of the Imperial Exchequer; and hereby empowers the Chairman to sign a Petition to Parliament against the Bill."

W. BISHOP, Chairman.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of RATEPAYERS of BRIXTON, held at the Brixton Hall, on Monday, May 19, 1884, Mr. A. DODSON in the chair, it was resolved:—

"That this meeting views with extreme displeasure the manner in which it is attempted to rush through Parliament a measure of so sweeping and revolutionary a character as the London Government Bill, by which it is proposed to destroy existing municipal machinery, the usefulness of which has been admitted by the Home Secretary, and supersede it by a purely experimental body, likely to lead to greatly increased taxation."

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—ST. JAMES'S, WESTMINSTER.—At a MEETING of the VESTRY of this parish, held on the 14th May inst., specially convened to consider the London Government Bill, it was resolved:—

"1. That whilst admitting the desirability of extending Municipal Government to the Metropolis at large, by a measure that shall embrace the duties, powers, and privileges of the City Corporation and the Metropolitan Board of Works, this Vestry is of opinion that the London Government Bill now before Parliament is of an unsatisfactory character, inasmuch as it would practically abolish the existing system of local self-government without making proper provisions for the administration of purely local affairs by duly-elected Local Councils, and is objectionable in several other respects. This Vestry is neither of opinion that any scheme for the Government of London should simplify and unify the system of local management, the various districts, by abolishing obsolete, conflicting, and overlapping bodies, and providing for the administration of local affairs on the same lines throughout the Metropolis, by elected local authorities possessing precisely similar functions within their respective districts.

"2. That a copy of the foregoing Resolution be forwarded to the Home Secretary, every member of Parliament representing a Metropolitan constituency, the Corporation of the City of London, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and to every Vestry and District Board of Works in the Metropolis."

HARRY WILKINS, Vestry Clerk.

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—CHARTER for GREENWICH.—At a MEETING of RATEPAYERS held in the South Ward, BROCKLEY, on Friday, May 15, 1884, ALEX. MUNRO, Esq., in the chair, the following Resolutions were passed unanimously:—

"1. That this meeting of ratepayers having thoroughly considered the Bill now before Parliament, for the reform of the Government of London, signifies its disapproval of its principles, and enters its protest against the investment of any central body with alarmingly dangerous power, and the abolition of all local self-government that it would entail. It further expresses its great alarm at the increase of taxation, in a locality already too heavily burdened, which would follow the passing, and submits its determination to employ all constitutional means at its command to prevent the passing of the said Bill in its present form.

"2. That this meeting of inhabitant ratepayers of Greenwich and its vicinity, in the interest of local self-government, now so dangerously threatened, pledges itself to do all in its power to obtain a charter of incorporation for the historic and important borough of Greenwich, and desires that this claim shall be earnestly pressed upon Her Majesty's Government, and requests the Chairman to forward copies of these Resolutions to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Borough and County Members, the Town Clerk of the Corporation of the City of London, and to Her Majesty's Privy Council."

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—WHITECHAPEL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of RATEPAYERS of the MIDDLE WARD, held on Tuesday, May 13, 1884, Mr. Churchwarden JAMES in the Chair, the following Resolution was carried unanimously:—

"That this meeting of ratepayers of the Middle Ward, assembled for the purpose of electing Representatives for the ensuing three years, desires to thank the Members of the Vestry past and present for the able manner in which the local affairs of the Parish have been administered.

"That, as a Bill has been introduced into Parliament called the London Government Bill which, if allowed to pass, will destroy local self-government, will remove local control from those locally interested, will allow a Central Council to raise and apply funds from local ratepayers for local purposes (that ought to be raised and applied by those who have local knowledge of local necessities), and which must, in the opinion of this meeting, greatly increase the cost and decrease the efficiency of the administration of local business, that this meeting resolves that the Bill be opposed, and that copies of the Resolution be forwarded to the Home Secretary, the Borough and County Members, and that the Chairman sign a petition to Parliament against the measure."

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.—At a PUBLIC MEETING of the RATEPAYERS' ASSOCIATION, No. 7 (Portland Place) Ward, MARYLEBONE, held on Thursday, May 15, 1884, it was resolved:—

"That this meeting of ratepayers desires to enter its emphatic protest against the London Government Bill, creating, as it will do, a gigantic system of centralization with its attendant evils, extravagance, mismanagement, and greatly increased rates, removing local affairs from direct local control, and adding to local burdens large sums now paid out of the Imperial Exchequer, and hereby empowers the Chairman to sign a Petition to Parliament against the Bill."

BY AUTHORITY.—NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE and INDEX to the STATUTES. Ninth Edition. Revised to the End of the Session of 1883 (46 & 47 Victoria). Edited by G. A. R. FITZGERALD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Price 10s.

This Volume consists of two parts, which, though separate, are arranged for combined use: (1) a Chronological Table of all the Statutes, showing total or partial repeals thereof; and (2) an Index to the enactments in force.

It is prepared and published with the authority of Her Majesty's Government, and under the direction of the Statute Law Committee.

The work is of acknowledged utility in the Legal Profession, and 5,250 copies of this Edition have been taken by the Council of Law Reporting for distribution to their Subscribers.

In the present Edition the extensive improvement in the Index begun in the Fourth Edition has been continued, and other improvements are contemplated in the Editions of future years, especially with reference to the entries relating to Scotland and Ireland.

Also,

TABLES, supplementary to the REVISED EDITION of the STATUTES, showing REPEALS and REVIVALS. Price 3d.

These Tables, which are published annually, indicate what enactments have been repealed or revived since the publication of the successive volumes of the Revised Statutes, and furnish materials for bringing the Edition, without research or difficulty, into conformity with the most recent legislation.

The above are printed for Her Majesty's Stationery Office; AND SOLD BY EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE, EAST HARDING STREET, FETTER LANE, E.C.; KNIGHT & CO., 90 Fleet Street; STEVENS & SONS, 119 Chancery Lane; E. ESSAYS on the PHILOSOPHY of THEISM. By the late WILLIAM GEORGE WARD, Ph D. Edited, with an Introduction, by WILFRID WARD.

"What makes these essays of Dr. Ward so very valuable, and indeed so unique, was the remarkable robustness of Dr. Ward as a metaphysician.....Mr. Wilfrid Ward has done a very great service to philosophy by republishing these remarkable essays, which are destined, we believe, to take their place among the landmarks of English philosophy and psychology."
Spectator.

"Let us observe that the late Dr. Ward, of all men of his generation, was, perhaps, the best qualified for the task to which he specially devoted himself. We think we might, without exaggeration, claim for him the most metaphysical head that has rested on any Englishman's shoulders since the death of Samuel Taylor Coleridge."—Tab et.

"In these he shows that true poetic insight which creats the ideal under the common and familiar, which sees but rids of death to the unanointed eye.....In his general choice of subjects, and manly and tender treating them, we find a native sweetness and humanity, a domesticity of sentiment, that is very attractive."—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, in North American Review.

NEW BOOKS.

Now ready, 5 vols. demy 8vo. £3.

BOSWELL'S LIFE of JOHNSON (including the Tour in the Hebrides and Johnsoniana). New Edition, with Notes and Appendices. By Rev. A. NAPIER, Trinity College, Cambridge, Vicar of Rickham; Editor of the Cambridge Edition of the Theological Works of Barrow. With 48 Steel Engravings. Also a Large-Paper Edition, with Plates on India Paper, 104 Copies only printed (of which few now remain), 5 vols. imperial 8vo. £10 10s.

"This handsome and imposing edition of a work which justly enjoys a world-wide fame will be welcomed by every true bibliophile. It is an edition to revel over for its luxuriousness, what with its superb paper, its lordly margins, its large and clear type, its admirable engravings, and its excellent binding.....Croker as an annotator was the butt of a good deal of sarcasm, and Mr. Napier has done wisely in discarding many of his notes. Those which remain are only those which throw real light upon the work. But such service as this is not the only one rendered by the present editor, nor is it the most important. He has put together in a most readable form, as appendices, &c., a vast mass of information about Johnson and his friends, which was either not accessible before or accessible only to the uninitiated reader after an infinity of trouble."—Times.

RICHARDSON'S (DR.) DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Combining Explanation with Etymology, and copiously illustrated by Quotations from the Best Authorities.

This Dictionary, which was compiled especially for the use of philologists, does not profess to contain every word in the English language. The Explanations of the words are deduced from the primitive meaning through the various usages. The Quotations are arranged chronologically, from the earliest period to the present time. 2 vols. 4to. £4 14s. 6d.; half bound in russia, £5 15s. 6d.; russia, £6 12s. The Supplement separately, 4to. 12s.

An 8vo. Edition, without the Quotations, 16s.; half russia, 20s.; russia, 24s.

"In conclusion, I would recommend your correspondent to consult that inestimably valuable book, Dr. Richardson's 'Dictionary,' where he may satisfy his doubts on this occasion, as well as all others which may arise of a like kind. It is a book which no Englishman who loves his noble native tongue should be without, and it will be beneficial to countless millions in ages yet to come."—Mr. S. W. SINGER, in Notes and Queries, December 29, 1855.

THE CONFERENCE.

FEW more extraordinary instances of the sublime unreason which characterizes believers in the present Ministry have been seen than the reception in some quarters of the statements of the PRIME MINISTER and of Lord GRANVILLE on Tuesday. It is true that some of those persons who were at first deluded seem to have recovered their senses; but the marvellous thing is that any one should have been deluded at all. Mr. GLADSTONE, with immense parade and formality, summed up the previous attitude of the Government, and the advance upon that attitude which the Government was prepared to make. By one of the exercises of what may permissibly be called sleight-of-tongue, in which Mr. GLADSTONE has no rival, he presented two identically similar sets of propositions to the House, representing set number two as an important improvement on set number one. By Mr. GLADSTONE's own account, Government, when he rose, stood pledged to communicate certain results of communications to Parliament, and by Mr. GLADSTONE's account Government when he sat down stood pledged to present to Parliament certain results of communications. Between the two there was no difference whatever, except that the words "before the Conference meets" were inserted, and that insertion was made entirely nugatory by the fact that the announcement, though made before the Conference met, would be made after the arrangements with France and other Powers were concluded. Nothing that was drawn from Mr. GLADSTONE in his subsequent cross-examination in the least explained, improved, or further defined this position. Lord GRANVILLE was even less explicit; and in his cross examination took refuge in absolute silence on more than one point on which the greatest interest is felt in the country (for instance, the employment of Turkish troops), and on which, if reports on the subjects are ill founded, there could be not the slightest difficulty in giving satisfactory assurances, inasmuch as such assurances could in no way affect those purely financial pourparlers which, according to the Government, are going on with France.

So far then from rising with any comfortable assurance, Parliament has risen with no assurance at all, except the very uncomfortable one that some afternoon it may be informed of the conclusion of arrangements between an English Government and the European Powers by which the entire fruit of the expensive and anxious occupation of Egypt will be surrendered. That even the rumoured international audit would, in fact, amount to such a surrender is perfectly clear. But there is no security that the mysterious preliminary communications are limited to financial affairs. With a consistency which they have scarcely shown in any other matter, HER MAJESTY'S Ministers have declined to give any such assurance, and to contradict the disastrous rumours which are spreading all over Europe. To discuss those rumours in detail is an unnecessary, and perhaps a mistaken, proceeding. For, in the first place, it gives the Government the easy triumph of pointing out that in the event this or that particular step has not been taken, and in the second the particulars have but little effect on the general question. Any one who has taken the very slightest pains to ascertain the feeling of the country (not in the sense in which that phrase is constantly misused on all sides, but in the true sense—the feeling not of Conservatives merely, still less of Jingoes merely, but of the great body of reasonable and patriotic Englishmen of all political faiths) can be ignorant of the bent of that feeling as far as Egypt is concerned. Few men wish for a nominal annexation; not many care about a declared protectorate; the great majority are perfectly willing that Egypt shall, if it can, be put in the way of managing its own internal affairs. But almost all are agreed that "neither Parma, nor Spain, nor any "Prince in Europe" should be allowed again to meddle with Egypt. It is nearly impossible that such negotiations as the Government, by its own confession, is carrying on, can end without the admission of such meddling; they may very probably end by the admission of it to a degree which will make England impotent, instead of paramount, on the Nile and the Canal. M. DE LESSEPS's victory over his shareholders rather intensifies than lessens the awkwardness which would result in regard to the Canal from a multiple control, inasmuch as the new relations of England to the undertaking will be peculiarly subject to interference and disturbance by adroit representations of foreign Powers. If Ministers sympathized in this respect with the country, there can be no possible reason why they should not declare their feeling, inasmuch as by so doing they could only strengthen their own hands and save foreign Powers the risk of making a troublesome, not to say dangerous, blunder. The impossibility, therefore, of any reason, except a sinister one, for silence, makes that silence (which, let it be repeated, has yet been in no important respect whatever broken) alarming in the highest degree. That the Government is not wholly bent on surrender may perhaps be inferred from the unusual length of the negotiations, which otherwise might have been easily concluded; and this is almost the only cheerful inference which is reasonably possible in face of the fact that secret negotiations are going on about a matter where foreign Powers have or ought to have no concern beyond a purely business guardianship of their subjects' private interest. And it may be added that some Government partisans would do well to be chary of reference to other negotiations supposed to have been carried on secretly. The parallel is in many ways inexact, but it is most inexact in this, that the negotiations of 1878 ended in the modification to the advantage of England of an advantage gained by England's rivals, while the negotiations of 1884, if they have any result at all, can only end in the modification to the advantage of England's rivals of a great advantage gained by England. We are in Egypt; no Conference is needed to continue us there; a Conference may very probably result in our being turned out. Or rather it may so result if the people of England, like those of Paraguay, decide to continue idiots.

Against all these uncomfortable considerations the supporters of the Government make head or attempt to make head in a fashion which of itself shows their ignorance of the intentions of Mr. GLADSTONE, and their disquiet as to those intentions. They declare that Mr. GLADSTONE'S statements are perfectly satisfactory, and at the same time they appeal almost pathetically for an implicit trust and confidence in Mr. GLADSTONE, which, if his statements are satisfactory in themselves, it is superfluous to demand. But this attitude of despairing faith is sufficiently justified by the news from Egypt itself. Mr. CLIFFORD LLOYD has given up the unequal combat with Egyptian obstruction, French crocs-en-jambe, and English faintheartedness. Whatever the wisdom of his original appointment may have been, whatever faults of detail he may have himself committed, his retirement is a defeat for the Government, and a disaster for its projects of reform. Colonel Scott Moncrieff's note as to the internal condition of Egypt is one of the severest criticisms ever passed on the dealings of one country with another. From Nubia the Mudir of Dongola, who seems to be a person possessed of some humour, telegraphs that he has subdued the rebels, not by persuasion, but by thoroughly defeating them. The uniform contention of the Government (the consistency of which has indeed been a little broken down by such incidents as Teb and Tamasi) is that the rebels are to be subdued or brought into new and peaceful relations with Egypt, not by thoroughly defeating them, but by persuasion. Everything goes to show that the rescue of the interior garrisons cannot be effected except at great cost and difficulty, and it is at least credibly reported that the Powers which Mr. Gladstone is going out of his way to admit to a share in the management of Egypt by no means understand or approve the abandonment of the Soudan to anarchy and the Mahdi. In short, in every instance where the policy and the results of the Government are open to inspection and criticism, they are proved to have lamentably failed, or to be succeeding only in proportion to the violence which has been done to the Government principles. It is something of a paradox, to say the least, to claim confidence in the unseen actions of those whose seen actions have proved almost uniformly unsuccessful.

WOMEN VOTERS.

THE proposal to admit women to the electoral franchise excites little general interest, although the question may hereafter perhaps assume a certain importance, and it already furnishes matter for exciting controversy. The arguments in favour of the feminine vote are plausible, and they admit of full and candid statement. The reasons or motives of the other side are partly instinctive, and they sometimes bear an invidious appearance. The defects of logical faculty which may be observed in the arguments of the ladies who promote the movement are not perhaps conclusive objections. Existing constituencies are seldom guided in their choice of candidates by inferences from admitted principles, but prejudice and passion need no additional reinforcement. There is some ground for the contention that women who pay rates and manage independent households are often more intelligent and trustworthy than the lowest class of present and future electors; but the admission of women to the municipal franchise has not elevated the character of the local constituencies or increased the purity of elections. Mr. Bright, when he announced his intention of resisting the female claims which he had at one time supported, thought that the result of the municipal experiment had not been satisfactory. There is an apparent anomaly in the exclusion of an educated woman from political activities while the roughest workman in her employment may be entitled to vote; but women of the higher classes will in any case share the practical disfranchisement which awaits their equals of the dominant sex. Few among them desire the privilege which is claimed on their behalf, though a simple-minded Correspondent of a newspaper lately assumed that the division of opinion among women corresponded to the proportion of the speakers and writers who have taken a public share in the controversy. As in all similar cases, indifference and dislike to change are represented by abstention and silence. It is not surprising that women who disapprove of publicity and agitation should remain quietly at home.

It is possible that the comparative strength of political parties might not be greatly affected by the addition to the electoral lists of a number of names which is loosely estimated as equal to a seventh or an eighth of the whole. That the innovation would be advantageous to the Conservative cause is an expectation which will probably be disappointed. There is no doubt that women are more amenable than men to ecclesiastical influence; but clerical agency would not be all on one side. Modern experience also proves that anti-religious fanaticism is as unreasoning as the strongest sectarian propensity. There are women who now persuade themselves that they believe in Positivism, Agnosticism, and even in the fantastic theories which are attributed to the Buddhists. Controversies on such subjects are not likely to determine the political course of the less enthusiastic sex. In matters of more practical urgency ladies who have engaged in public movements have almost uniformly been subject to a bias in favour of objects to which they unconsciously attach a kind of moral reverence. The great majority among them are passionately opposed to the consumption of liquors containing alcohol; and they are almost unanimously bent on sacrificing sanitary considerations to their own limited conceptions of propriety or of humanity. If feminine zealots had their way, there would be no precautions against the spread of the terrible diseases, and scientific inquirers would be summarily prohibited from the prosecution of the valuable and necessary experiments. The ratepayers whom Mr. Woodall and his allies propose to enfranchise might, perhaps, on questions of this kind be numerous enough to turn the scale against robust morality and masculine common sense. The fundamental changes of the law which have been introduced in late years for the protection and benefit of women furnish a sufficient answer to the complaint that the sex requires additional securities against legislative injustice.

No answer has been attempted to the obvious objection that the proposed state of the electoral law would be more anomalous than the present. The distinction between men and women is more natural than the arbitrary preference of widows and spinsters to married women. Indeed the more candid among the female advocates of the amendment now entrusted to Mr. Woodall have never affected to disguise their consciousness that the limitation of the claim to ratepayers is little better than a practical joke. Having once succeeded in giving mistresses of independent households a right to vote, they believe, on intelligible grounds, that it would be impossible to maintain the disabilities of wives, if not of single women living with their families. In an age which regards apparent inconsistencies as more intolerable than grave public dangers the argument would probably prevail in the first instance, though experience of the preposterous consequences might ultimately provoke a sweeping reaction. It is impossible to leave out of consideration the probability, or rather the certainty, that the Franchise Bill, whether or not it includes the enfranchisement of women, is neither destined nor intended to be final. The two or three millions of new electors, having owed their own admission to the aid of their agents and natural allies within the present constitutional pale, will not fail to open the door in turn to those who may still be excluded. The promoters of the present agitation are fully convinced that the immediate enfranchisement of female ratepayers will, when the next Franchise Bill is introduced, inure to the benefit of the entire sex. The majority, or at least the half of the total electorate, will then consist of women, who, according to the theory of their rights, will, if they think fit to combine, absolutely control legislation. The equality of women with men having been once conceded will by unanswerable logic lead directly to the absurdest conclusion. At this point, indeed, the real rulers of the community will stop short; and it is highly probable that they will reverse a course which has ended in a practical paradox. It is of the essence of representative government that the electorate should have a certain degree of uniformity; and, at least in political life, men and women are neither similar nor equal. If female voters formed two-thirds or three-fourths of the constituency, they would not be allowed to govern the country. The experiment of giving political power to a class which was not strong enough to exercise or defend it was tried under favourable circumstances by the victors after the American Civil War. Through the exceptional machinery of a constitutional amendment the whole negro population of the South was invested with the electoral franchise. In some States the new voters formed the majority; and under the lead of Northern adventurers they obtained for a short time the control of the Government and the Legislature in several States. When the superior race exhibited discontent and attempted occasional resistance, the Federal troops were employed, especially during the Presidency of General Grant, to protect the State authorities. The result, which was attained in some degree with irregular violence, but in ordinary cases by lawful pressure, has been the recovery by the white inhabitants of their natural supremacy. Although the coloured population still prefers its Republican patrons, it is anticipated that in the Presidential election the South will as a solid mass support the Republican candidate. It would be equally unjust and discourteous to place Englishwomen on the level of emancipated negroes; but they have in common the quality or disqualification of inferior strength.

It is true that the inevitable failure of ambitious schemes for the political elevation of women diminishes the importance which might otherwise attach to a doubtful experiment; but it is not justifiable to introduce a questionable innovation on the ground that it will ultimately fail. Notwithstanding repeated reductions of the suffrage, the choice of those who are to govern the country is still an important function. Unwilling submission to the decision of an irresistible majority furnishes no reason for concurrence in a further injury to the Constitution. It is not certain that the House of Commons, when its title to respect has been gravely impaired, will retain the supreme power which it has possessed for several generations. Indifference to the character of the electorate can only be justified by despair; and it is possible that some redeeming element may be found to qualify the natural effects of democratic change. The proposal to enfranchise women may be regarded either as a serious project or as a measure which is doomed to ignominious failure. In either case it will not commend itself to the general judgment. The agitation in favour of the plan is intrinsically weak; nor, indeed, has it been ascertained whether any considerable number of women wish to obtain the franchise. It is easy to understand the reasons which induce some eminent converts to tolerate a change which is not, like other schemes for extending the franchise, merely an advance to pure democracy; but even when representative government has degenerated into its lowest form, it will still be desirable to maintain the doctrine that the suffrage is not a right, but a fiduciary duty. Schemes for doubling hereafter the numbers of the constituency imply a certain contempt for the franchise.

MR. TREVELYAN'S BILL.

IT has been said, with perfect justice, by persons of the most opposite casts of political thinking, that it is impossible at present to criticize the details of the Bill which Mr. TREVELYAN has brought in for transferring the soil of Ireland from landlord holders to peasant proprietors. Such criticism will no doubt be forthcoming in ample measure, and we shall not be backward in contributing to it. But the printed details must be studied before any such criticism can be given with propriety, and a very great number of side issues must be considered before their bearing can be properly estimated. Some points, however, there are which can be dealt with fairly and profitably at once, and it so happens that those points are the points of most importance in estimating the conduct of the men who have by their own confession made such a measure desirable in their own opinion, and also in estimating the probable result of the measure, supposing that it is brought into working order. It is proposed, in short, to judge Mr. TREVELYAN, his Bill, and the Government which is responsible both for him and for it out of Mr. TREVELYAN'S own mouth. We shall not here criticize the construction, the probable delivery, and the quenching powers of the fire-engine. We shall confine ourselves to the description of the fire by those who have caused it and have proposed to put it out, and we shall try to form some idea of the state of the building when, if ever, the fire has been got under.

In the first place, Mr. TREVELYAN'S speech is, in fact, an elaborate apology for the Land Act. It is very well known that that measure, as proposed, was to be a final remedy for the woes of Ireland. It was to cause no loss to landlords; it was to bring about no form of financial, no new form of agrarian, difficulty. So far from rendering land unsaleable, it was at once to put the whole Irish land question in working order. Meeting the demands of the tenants for security and saleableness of their interests, it would in general render them indifferent to the remaining burdens which would be once and for all adjusted by an equitable tribunal. Defining once and for all the extent of the landlord's interest and powers, it would make that interest and the negotiable value of those powers as easily and directly realizable as the interests and values represented in the stock of a State loan or the debentures of a wealthy corporation. If there were any tenants to whom the burdens of tenancy were in themselves objectionable, if there were any landlords who disliked the new form of limited landlordship, the purchase clauses would fully meet these minor difficulties. Such was the contention of the advocates of the Act; and, in defiance of the arguments of those who here, as elsewhere, pointed out that these expectations were not only not reasonable, but in the highest degree unreasonable, the Act was passed. Mr. TREVELYAN has come forward to tell us what are the results of its passing. According to this witness, certainly not a witness prejudiced against the Land Act, the land of Ireland is now "practically unsaleable." To buy from a limited owner, such as the great majority of Irish owners are, under the Act of 1881, "might frighten the boldest," and Mr. TREVELYAN further hints very broadly that even the boldest buyer may be further hampered by the uncertainty "how far the Government would go"—that is to say, whether the partition of landlord and tenant interest under the Act of 1881 was final or not. Yet, again, Mr. TREVELYAN tells us that, though the Land Commissioners have "laboured hard" and are well on with their primary work, the burden of appeals is in a state "which "cannot remain any longer without a remedy." We make the slightest possible comment on this picture, which has been drawn from Mr. TREVELYAN'S outlines with the most scrupulous moderation. We need do no more than remind our own readers at least that every point—the unsaleableness of land, the hesitation of tenants, the certainty of an unmanageable throng of appeals, the impossibility of leaving matters as they would stand after the passing of the Act—was urged long before the Bill passed, and scornfully denied by the advocates of the Bill. There is exceedingly little credit due to us. We only saw that two and two made four, and said so. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues only said that two and two did not make four, and now come forward to observe, with no very obvious contrition, that unluckily they do.

The general character of the means by which Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues propose to redress this trifling miscalculation remains to be briefly considered. There will be, as has been remarked, much to be said about the particulars hereafter; we deal here only with the general result. A possible total of twenty millions is to be advanced by the State (that is to say, the taxpayers of England and Scotland; for Ireland, as already receiving more than it pays, does not come into the calculation) to buy the Irish tenant's holding for him, say at twenty years' purchase, and let him have it on payment of five per cent. for thirty-three years. We leave these terms entirely undiscussed from the point of view of finance and of land value for the present. We pass over the very obvious reflection that twenty millions will not buy the whole landlords' interest of Ireland on such terms or anything like it. Let the plan be supposed in a state of accomplishment to-morrow. The State will then be for a third of a century landlord of Ireland, and defaulting tenants will, according to the scheme, be proceeded against by local authorities. Nobody, though with the prospect of being a freeholder in the next generation, will pay much more than he pays now; some holders will pay less, but the payment will be absolutely rigid. It will not be alterable at the fifteen-year periods of the Land Act; there will be no abatements, and the charity of the landlords, whose last reason for residing in Ireland will be done away with, will disappear altogether. The scheme, if carried out, will be an experimentum crucis for Mr. GEORGE in one sense, though Mr. GEORGE'S soul will be racked by the thought, first, that the money will for a time go into the landlords' pockets, and, secondly, that at the end of that time the hated principle of private property in land will be established more firmly and defended by more interests than ever. For these sorrows of the Prophet of San Francisco the moan will here at least be small. But during these thirty years the State will be exposed to two new and formidable dangers. The landlord buffer will be taken away, and the State and the rent payer will be brought face to face. The agitator will no longer have to encounter even such small difficulty of the moral and sentimental kind as besets him at present. He will no longer have to recommend the people to hold the harvest from a man like themselves, who, as at intervals they probably feel, must eat bread and drink whisky, must bring up his children and pay his tradesmen even as they. The screw will only have to be put on an abstraction, and on the particular abstraction—the Government—which all Irishmen are wont to look on as intended to supply their wants. We go no further in indicating consequences. It may be that the conditions just pointed out may influence favourably, instead of unfavourably, the chances of a system which has, without those conditions, notoriously failed in Germany and Russia, and which has only partially, and in quite unreproducible circumstances, succeeded in France. It may more reasonably be argued that, whatever the dangers or difficulties of the scheme, it has been made inevitable by those mistakes in the Land Act which Mr. TREVELYAN and his colleagues once denied so stoutly and now admit with such edifying frankness. On these, as on other matters, there will be plenty of opportunity for discussion. To whom the Government are indebted for this scheme, how the detail of a mixed court for ascertaining values will work, what is likely to be the influence on the plan of the threatened extension of Irish local self government and of the Irish franchise, with what eyes it is likely to be looked on by the great but rarely consulted or remembered body of Irishmen who are not tenant farmers—all these matters may be left aside the present. The first point of importance is, if possible, to prevent the repetition of the mistake which was committed three years ago—the mistake of blundering into huge projects of legislation with eyes obstinately shut to the inevitable consequences of those projects. The preamble—the unwritten preamble of course—of this Bill is a distinct confession that its predecessor is a failure; that most things evil which its opponents said of it have come true; that most things good which its advocates said of it have not come true. So frank an acknowledgment deserves to be met frankly, and the provisions of the Purchase Bill shall be criticized strictly on their merits. But in any part of such criticism which deals with consequences it is well to record beforehand the fact that in respect of such criticism the introducers of the Land Act of 1881 are by their own confession convicted of incompetency. Their intentions are no doubt excellent, their judgment may perhaps have been corrected a little by the course of events. But it is not entirely a recommendation to a physician who is in charge of a difficult case that he has by his own avowal brought the case to its present pass by mistaken treatment.

ROWDY RELIGION.

THE daily papers continue to be filled with letters complaining about the doings of the most noisy of recent additions to the copious and variegated hortus siccus of dissent. From day to day somebody writes to ask whether this last growth of vanity and vulgarity is to be allowed to obstruct traffic and endanger life in the streets. For the benefit of people who require to have everything written out for them in large capitals, we may observe that we are speaking of the Salvation Army. It is just as well to avoid any risk of being misunderstood, or else we might speak of these latter-day flagellants as this hideous nuisance or this blasphemous buffoonery without calling them "out of their "name." What the correspondents to newspapers have to say about them is always one of two or three things. Now it is an account of how carriage-horses are terrified and the lives of the lieges endangered by a howling mob headed by a big drum. Then it is somebody writing from a quiet neighbourhood to ask whether the inhabitants must submit indefinitely to be invaded every Sunday by a heated and gabbling mob, who collect and yell round a preaching cheap-jack, with musical accompaniments in the form of brayings from brass instruments blown by players who have received their only instruction from "the Spirit." Occasionally the tale is varied a little. The Standard has published a series of letters, from which it appears that an unfortunate omnibus driver has been imprisoned for furious driving because he could not stop his horses in the middle of a swarm of these ignoble fanatics.

All this is doubtless an old story. We have had the Salvation Army with us for many a day, and perhaps that may seem to some a good reason for continuing to put up with it. To our mind this prolonged toleration fully entitles us to insist that the pretence or even the reality of religious enthusiasm shall no longer be allowed to protect a common nuisance. The direct or indirect encouragement of the thing has been from the first one of the ugliest proofs we have seen of this generation's ready toleration of vulgarity. Even the Church of England has condoned the Army's fussy vanity and profane use of names which are sacred to every right-minded Englishman for the sake of advertisement, because the wire-pullers of the speculation profess to be moved by zeal for religion. It is not, however, necessary to suppose that they are otherwise than sincere to find a reason for regulating their public manifestations of enthusiasm. Such zeal is only felt by the stupidest of mankind, and is an insult to all religion. Indeed, this regard for uncouth piety is not itself without a dash of hypocrisy. If a foolish Roman Catholic priest were to court a mild martyrdom by carrying the Host through the street to a dying parishioner, or if Cardinal MANNING (we only suppose such a thing for the sake of illustration) were to degrade the ceremonies of his Church by marching a Corpus Christi procession through the Borough, the bray of Exeter Hall would be heard throughout the land. It would be much if we escaped a "No "Popery" riot. But we may find an even apter parallel. If the devotees of some Oriental religion—and in these days of Esoteric Buddhism we may expect anything—were to raise a holy place to some big-bellied and many-armed god, and were to provide it, as it would be easy for them to do, with the necessary staff of sacred hetaeræ, the pretence of religion would not protect them from the ordinary police measures taken against disorderly houses. The most scrupulous defenders of religious liberty would soon make necessary distinctions between freedom of worship and licence to commit a nuisance. Now, with a full recognition of the wide difference between the open practice of immoral indecency and mere rowdy disturbance, we think it is time that the same discrimination should be shown in dealing with the Salvation Army. Since there are people so coarse and ignorant as to think that they propitiate their GOD by bawling gibberish to music-hall airs, and by flourishing fusty pocket-handkerchiefs about on their knees, in the sacred name of human folly let them do these things—within four walls. When the mechanical operations of the Spirit, however, lead to disturbances in the streets, the professors should be promptly required to choose between fine and imprisonment. No sophistry about religious liberty can do away with the fact that a noisy mob rambling after a banner and a band, with a reformed housebreaker or converted potboy performing antics in front, is a nuisance. When a quiet neighbourhood is invaded every Sunday by a rabble of this sort, it is subjected to a cruel infliction. The national sense of decency is degraded by the spectacle, and by the rather cynical toleration which allows it to cover itself with fine names. The thing has been allowed to go on unchecked long enough to show that there is no wish anywhere to limit anybody's religious liberty, and now the mere public noise of the Army should be stopped on the purely mundane ground that it is a nuisance. If the necessary legal means do not exist they should be provided, and it is the duty of everybody who is not ready to submit to every vulgar imposition to exert himself to see them supplied.

THE STATE OF BUSINESS.

THE present state of business in the House of Commons is probably not regarded by the Government with sanguine hopes of successful legislation. The Franchise Bill will still occupy some time, although the remaining amendments will all be rejected by overwhelming majorities. In the early part of the Session it seemed possible that the gross mismanagement of Egyptian affairs might detach a certain number of the supporters of the Government from the Ministerial ranks. The prevailing dissatisfaction has since been greatly aggravated; but Liberal malcontents, though some of the most eminent among them from time to time speak against the Government, vote with scarcely an exception in its favour. They would probably have pursued the same course even if the Opposition had not provided them with an excuse by more than one mistake in tactics. As a rule, Liberal members cannot afford to oppose their local patrons, and the Caucuses know nothing of foreign affairs, and care little for the honour of England. For any exceptional display of independence mutinous Liberals hasten to atone by voting with the Government on strictly party issues. The great majorities on the Franchise Bill are partly composed of penitents who are anxious to obtain absolution for unwelcome criticisms on the marvellous blunders perpetrated in Egypt, of which the list is not yet exhausted. The majority on the remaining divisions on the Bill will perhaps also be swelled by a dozen deserters from the Conservative side. To the Government it can matter little whether amendments are defeated by a hundred or a hundred and fifty. The only doubt which remains as to the progress of the Franchise Bill in the House of Commons is whether it will be passed in a fortnight or in a month. The reception in the House of Lords will attract more eager curiosity.

It seems to be understood that the Merchant Shipping Bill will be dropped for the present Session. The suspicion that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN wished for a postponement is probably unjust, though it was naturally suggested by his speech. A reference to a Select Committee would shelve the measure for the present year, and it will be useless to read the Bill to the Standing Committee on Trade, unless some previous understanding can be established with the shipowners. It is not yet known whether Railway Commission Bills will be exposed to similar difficulties. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN showed in his speech on Mr. SAMUELSON'S outrageous proposal that he was not disposed to regard Railway Companies as objects of public hostility and licensed plunder, and the Bill is in most respects moderate and reasonable. It has consequently disappointed some of the freighters, who hoped that the Commission would be empowered to reopen the Parliamentary bargains under which railways have been made. If both the larger bodies of traders and the representatives of the railway interest agree to the principle of the Bill, the details may perhaps be arranged by the Standing Committee without interference with other business. The Metropolis Government Bill can scarcely be read a second time before the Franchise Bill is disposed of. No measure of equal magnitude has at any time received less support from public opinion. At the meetings which are from time to time held in its favour, Mr. FIRTH and Mr. BEAL still take prominent parts. A much abler advocate, Sir CHARLES DILKE, lately found it expedient to minimize the proposed changes by a hint that the District Councils might perhaps be allowed larger powers of local administration. To the objection that the metropolis has no real unity Sir CHARLES DILKE replied by reference to the Metropolitan Board of Works and to the Asylums Board, which already provide for wants common to the whole district. He might have cited many instances in which neighbouring urban districts combine, as in the case of the Nottingham drainage, for definite purposes without need of municipal amalgamation. There is not the smallest reason to expect that the proposed Common Council will discharge more efficiently the duties which are now performed by the Board of Works. Even the warmest supporters of Sir W. HARCOURT'S Bill must admit that there is no considerable external pressure to counteract the probable indifference of the House of Commons. The Opposition, though it may perhaps care little whether the experiment is tried this year or the next, cannot be expected to offer the Government any extraordinary facilities for carrying an unwise and unnecessary measure.

The conventional fiction that a Local Government Bill might possibly be passed during the present Session has by this time been tacitly abandoned; and, even if the London Municipal scheme is also dropped, the legislation of the year will have been sufficiently ambitious and comprehensive. It is not desirable to multiply and accelerate projects of universal change at a time when a majority of members of Parliament, and probably of electors, scarcely affects to consider the gravest political question on its merits. The Bradford Caucus, when it denounced Mr. FORSTER'S alleged disobedience to the PRIME MINISTER, was apparently unconscious that the policy of the Government in Egypt had any bearing on the Vote of Censure. It is impossible to estimate beforehand the time which may be occupied in debate on matters more urgent than almost any scheme of legislation. In a short time it will be known when the evil-boding Conference is to meet, and what are the limits of its functions. Both Lord GRANVILLE and Mr. GLADSTONE have promised to give Parliament an opportunity of expressing an opinion before the conditions of the Conference are finally determined. In the too probable contingency of a sacrifice of English interests it will be absurd to complain of Parliamentary criticism. Up to the present time Mr. GLADSTONE has provided abundant excuse for preliminary warnings and provisional protests. The declaration that English interests in Egypt, and also in the rest of the world, would be regarded as paramount was conceived in his happiest vein of oracular sophistry. In exactly the same sense it might be argued that cruelty to human beings is objectionable because animals ought not to be cruelly treated and because man is an animal. It is possible that other foreign complications may require Parliamentary notice. The wholesale slaughter in Zululand, for which the English Cabinet is responsible, cannot be indefinitely tolerated. The proposed treaty with Portugal as to the Lower Congo, and the negotiations of the International African Company with France, may also furnish subjects for discussion. It is not satisfactory to know that whatever the Government may do will be supported by the votes of a disapproving but unalienable majority.

The few members who take an intelligent interest in finance will apparently allow Mr. CHILDERS'S measures to pass without prolonged opposition; but it is possible that some expression may be given to the general doubt as to the prudence of meddling with the currency. There would be no difficulty in meeting the expense of restoring the gold coinage by the issue of a temporary loan of moderate amount. A mere shade of distrust in the soundness of the currency would cost the country more than the moderate outlay which must by some means be provided. Contrivances for disguising necessary expenditure involve a waste of ingenuity; but it is doubtful whether Mr. CHILDERS'S device may not be passively accepted. His threatened augmentation of the Succession Duty, which is much more important than the adulteration of half-sovereigns, cannot be properly discussed during the present Session. The measure will perhaps be reserved to a Parliament which will regulate taxation according to the convenience of constituents who will themselves be exempt. The vast majority of the new electors will contribute neither to the Income-tax nor to the Legacy and Succession Duties. The dissociation of taxation from representative power has long been foreseen. Democratic innovators are well advised in postponing the introduction of their financial theories till they have secured the monopoly of electoral power.

It is still uncertain whether Irish affairs may not in the latter part of the Session resume the prominence which they enjoyed in former years. Mr. TREVELYAN'S measure for encouraging the sale and purchase of land must necessarily have been unpalatable either to the Land League faction or to the owners of property, and it will impose a very heavy burden on the public revenue. Mr. PARNELL has naturally reserved to himself the right of opposing a measure which is extravagantly favourable to his clients. Neither he nor his followers pretend to regard justice in their dealings with landowners. It may, perhaps, be impossible to counteract their advice that tenants should refuse to purchase, in the hope that they may obtain the fee-simple of the land on easier terms. Their attitude during the debates on Mr. TREVELYAN'S Bill will be determined by the same considerations. During the present Session the HEALYS, the O'BRIENS, and the BIGGARS have scarcely found a sufficient vent for their energies. Even the pleasure of worrying Mr. TREVELYAN by vexatious questions must sometimes pall; and the familiar processes of obstruction could not have been revived with advantage. The Liberals, who consider themselves loyal, have voluntarily done the work of the Irish agitators. The transfer of nearly the whole representation of Ireland to the enemies of the Crown and the Empire will have been accomplished without the need of any exertion except two or three votes in favour of the Franchise Bill. The Home Rulers share with the MAHDI and his followers, excepting, indeed, the few thousands who were slain in battle, Mr. GLADSTONE'S sympathy for patriots "who are rightly struggling to be free."

THE CHANTREY BEQUEST.

NO one who has made a personal inspection of the pictures deposited at South Kensington by the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest would be likely to guess at the terms of the great sculptor's will. So far as the general public can judge, the fund exists for the purpose of assisting the families of deceased artists; of encouraging young painters, especially if they chance to be Scotch, there being apparently a "favoured nation" clause for that purpose; of buying something from every year's exhibition of the Royal Academy, the fund being evidently intended exclusively for the benefit of Academicians and their pupils. Strange to say, there is nothing whatever of this kind in the will. It provides that, after the death of the testator's widow, which happened in 1878, an addition of 300*l.* a year was to be made to the salary of the President of the Royal Academy and 50*l.* to that of the Secretary, and that the interest of the residue should be employed in collecting a gallery "of "works of fine art of the highest merit," whether by a native or a foreigner, who has worked exclusively in Great Britain. The Trustees were further enjoined to buy only works of the "highest merit," and were expressly forbidden to think of anything else in making their selection. The exact words of this part of the will are as follows:—"My "will is further that such President and Council, in making "their decision, shall have regard solely to the intrinsic "merit of the work, and not to allow any feeling of sym-"pathy with an artist or his family, by reason of his or "their circumstances, to influence them." They were expressly forbidden to give a commission; but the price paid was to be liberal, and entirely at the discretion of the President and Council. The works thus bought were to be exhibited for a month, either at the Academy or elsewhere. It was further provided that no part of the fund was to be employed in erecting a gallery, as Sir FRANCIS CHANTREY expected that a suitable building would be provided by the State. The State has fulfilled this expectation by allowing the pictures to be hung in a chamber at the South Kensington Museum, where they are very well seen. CHANTREY intended that his trustees should have the occasional advantage of larger funds at their disposal, and permitted them to accumulate the annual interest for a period not exceeding five years; and desired that they should never think it necessary to spend all, or any, of the money in hand. How far the Council of the Royal Academy has carried out the spirit of the will must be judged by an examination of the collection, and by observing the way in which the money has been laid out. Attention has been very pointedly called to the subject this year, and the idea of the highest art shown by the Trustees has been found to differ somewhat widely from that of the general public and the art critics.

The pictures exhibited at South Kensington are twenty-one in number. Four pieces of sculpture are in the same room. It cannot be said that more than four or five of the pictures are of "the highest art." One of them is the "Venus and Æsculapius," by Mr. POYNTER, which was the best picture of its year and is now the best in the Chantrey Collection. Mr. WATTS's "Psyche" is admired by those who understand this phase of Mr. WATTS's art. Mr. BRETT's "Britannia's Realm" is unquestionably his masterpiece. Very far behind these three is Mr. ORCHARDSON's melodramatic "Napoleon on board the Bellerophon." Mr. YEAMES's "Amy Robsart" is a large, but hardly a great, work. Mr. W. L. WYLLIE's view on the Lower Thames is good in its way, as is, in a very different way, Mr. ROOKE's "Ruth." Mr. JOHN COLLIER's "Hudson" is very powerful if painful. The rest of the pictures seem to have been chosen only to set off those we have named. No straining of the words will make out a water-colour by Mr. WADE to be "a work of art of the highest merit." Mr. DICKSEE has since belied the moderate promise he gave when he painted "Harmony." The great HILTON is certainly not of the "highest merit," and is the only old picture in the collection. How far did its purchase fall in with the "sympathy" clause quoted above? There are works by Mr. REID, Mr. FARQUHARSON, Mr. J. KNIGHT, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. CLARK, and others, of which we can only say that they will hold their own with Mr. PETTIE's "Vigil" and Mr. MURRAY's landscape from this year's Academy. Of the sculpture, Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON's "Python" and Mr. THORNEYCROFT's "Teucer" are worthy to stand by Mr. POYNTER's "Venus," and may in their own style be reckoned works of high art, which cannot honestly be said of the two statues associated with them. When Mr. SEYMOUR LUCAS's "After Culloden" comes from Burlington House, it may fairly match Mr. ORCHARDSON's "Napoleon"; but it is impossible for even the most leniently disposed critic to say that the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest would not have been better advised if, instead of buying twenty-eight works, they had been content with, say, eight, and had saved their money to add perhaps a REYNOLDS, perhaps a GAINSBOROUGH, perhaps a TURNER, to the collection. The present exhibition of the Royal Academy is not a very good one—indeed, some judges say it is a very bad one—but the Trustees of the fund might unquestionably by a little seeking near the ceilings of the different rooms have found at least one figure-picture and at least two landscapes better worthy of selection than those they have purchased. Their administration of the trust should be watched very jealously and carefully by the public. It is not, as Mr. GLADSTONE oddly contended, a private affair. Mr. GLADSTONE would be the last to allow such a plea if it was put forward by a London Alderman or an Irish Churchman. Possibly it is a gratifying thing to a member of an artistic body to have it within his power to recommend a "work of art" which but for such recommendation might have a slender reed to lean on in its own merits. Sympathy of a not purely artistic kind may be suspected by the profane as the reason for some recent purchases. This may or may not be the case, but certainly such a method is hardly what Sir FRANCIS CHANTREY intended to encourage by the terms of his will. The members of the Royal Academy should resolutely set their faces against what outsiders coarsely designate as "jobbery." We cannot go so far as this; but if we visit the Chantrey Gallery at South Kensington, remembering the terms of the bequest, and remembering also the very similar, but of course much larger, collection at the Luxembourg at Paris, it is impossible to think that the trustees have fulfilled their duty to the public. They may, of course, and according to Mr. GLADSTONE they do, repudiate any obligation to the public; but that it exists is not to be explained away by such a denial. The Academy is not a private association. If it is, let it drop the title of "Royal," and take lodgings for itself. But as long as it enjoys its charter it is bound by the same laws, and must perform its duties with the same regard to public opinion, as if it were governed by a Minister of State, and called a "department."

THE ART OF FICTION.

THE rule (so familiar to disappointed authors) that criticism is written by the fellows who have failed is not without its exceptions. In a pamphlet published by Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS we have Mr. BESANT, one of the fellows who have succeeded, writing on "The Art of Fiction." Few things are more interesting to all who care for any art than criticism by an artist. It may be said, as a general rule, that all discourses on the theory of any art, on æsthetics of every degree, are practically useless. But so are metaphysics and moral philosophy; yet these studies have an undying attraction, though they neither make us more moral nor more wise. Mr. BESANT's remarks on an art which he practises with such success will make no one a better novelist, though they may perhaps prevent some persons from attempting to write fiction. Yet they are full of interest to all lovers of fiction, from the housemaid with her London Journal to the learned judge or weary statesman, who are often as confirmed and indiscriminate novel-readers as the housemaid.

We have sometimes wished that every one who lives by criticism could be made to write (not to publish) at least one novel. That would show reviewers (as TURNER said of his own art) "how difficult it is," and would perhaps take the self-confidence out of them. Yet the process might fail. The late Mr. GEORGE LEWES had written Ranthorpe, and, not the less, was the author of a letter of critical advice to CHARLOTTE BRONTË, in which he seemed to think that he knew more about her art than the author of Jane Eyre. Mr. BESANT's essay will at least show some people "how "difficult it is," how laborious a task is the composition of romance. We may pass over his theories about the place of fiction among the other arts and his theory concerning amateur novelists. "These we give our daily dreadful life "to," as Mr. BROWNING says about DANTE. The novelist, Mr. BESANT says, must have sympathy, must have the enthusiasm of humanity; but it by no means follows that Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON, or any other eminent Comtist, would make a good figure if he penned a romance. The enthusiasm of humanity is not the one thing needful, and Mr. BESANT notes its absence in DE FOE, we do not quite see why. Next the novelist must have the gift of selection, like the painter, like TURNER for example, who would raise a tower some hundred feet, and introduce a lake where none was visible, in the interest of his picture. It is not easy to make out what Mr. BESANT's attitude towards such a novelist as FLAUBERT may be. He wishes the artist in romance to choose all humanity for his province and to be untiring in minute observation. No one is less squeamish in recording all emotions, even the most obscure and discreditable, of humanity; no one is more unwearying in the collection of facts and in study by actual experiment; no one, again, is more deeply convinced that his works have a moral mission than the author of L'Assommoir. Mr. BESANT believes in this universality of interest, this personal observation, this moral purpose, yet (in his recent lecture) he spoke with extreme severity of M. ZOLA. The reason is not far to seek, as much of that author's work is an abomination to the cleanly British mind. But, if we can imagine M. ZOLA without his delight in things unclean, and with a jollier mental habit (for Mr. BESANT thinks the artist should have "a hearty manner"), then the Frenchman would almost be the critic's ideal romancer. He probably agrees with Mr. BESANT "that everything in fiction "which is invented, and is not the result of personal ex- "perience and observation, is worthless." Here, perhaps,

Mr. BESANT's own practice differs from his precepts. "In "some other arts the design may be fanciful, unreal, or "grotesque; but in modern Fiction, whose sole end, aim, "and purpose is to portray humanity and human character, "the design must be in accordance with the customs and "general practice of living men and women under any "proposed set of circumstances and conditions." Yes; but if the proposed circumstances and conditions be as fantastic as in The Case of Mr. Lucraft, or All Sorts and Conditions of Men, there is more room for "the unreal, fanciful, or "grotesque" than Mr. BESANT seems disposed to allow. So much the better, of course, for the art of fiction. He who practises it, in any case, must have sympathy, humour, observation, power of description, power of selection and of dramatic presentation, and, above all, a story to tell—a story which will fill his book, as its idea fills a sonnet, without padding. Let the ambitious lady (or gentleman) about to stain foolscap ask herself or himself as to the possession of these necessary qualities, and whether the gift of style accompanies them. But the beginner is more likely to reflect that he will be no worse than most of his neighbours, which, so far, is true. His real merits he will find out when he tries to get his book published, not on commission—a thing, says Mr. BESANT, which should "never, "NEVER, NEVER" be done.

POLITICAL ELUCIDATION.

ON Saturday last the supporters of the London Government Bill assembled in the Town Hall of Kensington to consider the measure in question. The meeting, as we read in the papers, was crowded. Had it not been so, the fault would not have lain with those who manage the Liberal cause in the borough which Sir CHARLES DILKE represents in Parliament. The peculiar method of elucidating political questions which consists in packing meetings and punching heads is well understood in Chelsea, and it has been pleasantly said that it is to its powers of "elucidation," and not to any connection with mysteries, that the Eleusis Club, to which Sir CHARLES DILKE owes so much, is indebted for its name. It is known to all persons in London, and to most in the country, that the Bill excites the smallest possible amount of popular enthusiasm. Indeed it has often been said, and with absolute truth, that London is against the Bill. Nobody is better aware of the fact than those who have brought the Bill in. When, therefore, there is no genuine public opinion in favour of it, and a very strong and genuine public opinion against it—of which fact the introducers of it, living in London, are fully aware—it becomes necessary to get up something which, to the eyes of persons not living in London, may simulate public opinion.

With this object the meeting of Saturday last was convened. We are able to state positively that this was a packed meeting. Printed circulars were freely sent round in the borough begging the supporters of the Liberal members to appear early, lest those on the other side should get in first. And the letters which have since appeared in the papers show that the private applications made beforehand had been most effective. A large number of persons responded to the Liberal call, and those people who came in later on the understanding that the meeting was a public one in the ordinary and honest acceptation of the term found themselves deceived. We have before now had occasion to show how spiritless, in spite of the best of causes, the Conservative organization in Chelsea is compared with that of its Liberal opponents. The whip by which the supporters of Sir CHARLES DILKE were brought together mentioned particularly the hour at which the doors would be opened, and begged them to attend early (the italics are those of the circular); and it further added that, as there was reason to believe that opposition might be made, the Honorary Secretary trusted "that you will do "all in your power to contribute to the success of this "important meeting." The reports of the proceedings show that this appeal was not made in vain. A correspondent, writing to the Standard of Tuesday, states that he and a crowd of other people had assembled at the front entrance of the Kensington Town Hall by half-past seven, at which hour the doors were opened. Now in the circular sent round to the supporters of Sir CHARLES DILKE, which we have before us, a quarter past seven was mentioned (underlined) as the time to be present; and, when the hall was opened at the half-hour, the general public found that it was already partly filled by those who had not entered in at the door, but had climbed in by some other way. The meaning of the circular becomes thus at once apparent, and the truth of our statement that the meeting was a packed one still more evident. The subsequent events of the evening make this truth so palpable that the members for Chelsea themselves would not now dispute it anywhere in public without a playful wink at their friends. A correspondent writing to the St. James's Gazette relates how four well-known roughs attempted to enter the hall, but were repulsed by the police, till the latter were told by a well-informed Liberal that the four in question were "all right" and "our men." He goes on to relate how they proved the earnestness of their political convictions by assaulting many persons and, in particular, by knocking down, kicking, and dragging along the floor an elderly gentleman, who was at last rescued by the intervention of the bystanders. Another correspondent writing to the Standard says that, notwithstanding all the packing and all the roughs, there were so many persons present opposed to the Bill that the name of Lord SALISBURY whenever mentioned was loudly and longly cheered, and that a gentleman on the platform at this so-called "public" meeting was assaulted and turned out of the Hall for being one of the cheerers. We have both the name of this gentleman and the mode of his ejection on the independent authority of other eye-witnesses. The meeting, in short, was a fraudulent one, intended to convey to country constituencies the notion, which everybody in London knows to be untrue, that a majority of Londoners are in favour of the Government Bill.

It is difficult sometimes for well-informed persons to write gravely on a subject which is nevertheless one of the gravest in modern politics. And this is the power which our present civilization puts into the hands of party managers to manufacture, adulterate, and falsify public opinion. Mean and laughable as it is when viewed in some aspects, the subject is one of the highest public importance. It is now possible, as it was not in former days, for a handful of adroit persons, backed by adequate funds, to create the false impression that they stand as the representatives of popular feeling. To pack meetings; to meet the figures and facts of opponents, not with other facts and figures, but with a positive and untruthful denial; to send round deceptive circulars; to organize resolutions of country "Hundreds" (who are alike ignorant and careless of metropolitan life) as to the way in which our affairs can be best administered—all this is, as we have often said, nothing more or less than the deliberate manufacture of a spurious public opinion. And the result of this system applied to all political questions is to degrade and dishonour public life, and to force out of it all those who value, above any other consideration, the sense that they are gentlemen and men of honour.

FRENCH POLITICS.

THE French Senate and Chamber of Deputies are settling down to work after their holidays with a pleasant feeling that their country has scored a distinct success in Tonquin, and is in a fair way to do something striking elsewhere. The Republican majority of the legislators may further reflect with pleasure that the Bonapartist and Monarchical parties have been doing their very best to make themselves consumedly ridiculous. M. PAUL DE CASSAGNAC has hit upon a grand plan for upsetting the Republic and ruining Prince JEROME BONAPARTE. According to this notable scheme, all the Monarchical Oppositions were to have patched up an alliance by the admission of direct contraries for the purpose of destroying the existing form of government, and then when it was done they were to see what they should see. In the meantime the redoubted editor of the Pays was not perhaps averse to temporary and local alliances with the anarchists, who form the extreme of his enemies, the Republicans. It is M. DE CASSAGNAC'S opinion, apparently, that a Republican is only thoroughly hateful when he possesses some remains of moderation and good sense. This league, as might have been expected, was scarcely even stillborn. Here and there a Monarchist partisan may have fallen in with M. DE CASSAGNAC'S egregious proposal; but, as a rule, the party declined to start on such an exceedingly vague course of adventure under such a leader. While the fighting men of the Empire were scheming in this serio-comic fashion, their dynasty has been setting all Paris laughing by a family quarrel of a most commonplace character. It has been a matter of solemn debate and angry public squabbling whether Prince JEROME was or was not going to allow Prince VICTOR, his son, heir, and rival, to have lodgings for himself and a sufficient allowance. The great question was further complicated by curious stories about legacies and unknown benefactors, and doubts as to whether the whole quarrel is not a piece of amateur theatricals got up for the benefit of such persons as are easy to be led by the nose. While the enemies of the Republic are proving to demonstration that they can do nothing singly, and distrust one another too much to unite, the Chambers can turn with a quiet mind to the business of legislation. The Senate works with a distressing sense that something unpleasant for it is brewing in another place; but for the present it has a task of its own to dispose of. This is M. NAQUET'S Divorce Bill, a measure designed to deprive the large and flourishing body of French novelists of a considerable share of their daily bread. The merits of the question are simple enough on the surface. The Senate has to decide whether a country in which 2,800 judicial separations are granted yearly can or cannot allow complete divorce without shaking the basis of social order, and ruining the institution of the family.

While the Senate is trying to distinguish between the sense and the sentiment—often very mawkish and unwholesome—of the divorce question, the Chamber of Deputies is at work on the Army Bill, and is preparing to set about the revision of the Constitution. The French army has notoriously been in a state which can be satisfactory to its enemies only for a long time past. The Chamber will have to deal with difficulties which are common to most European nations, and with others peculiar to France. The system of mobilization is known to be confused; the staff, the cavalry, and the artillery are deficient in many respects. Since France has taken up an active Colonial policy it has become a matter of pressing necessity to organize a stronger special permanent force than the existing marine infantry, for prolonged service on distant stations. These, however, are comparatively minor difficulties, and could be overcome by better management, or the outlay of more money. The want of officers, and especially of non-commissioned officers, is a far more serious defect. France has not educated men enough to officer the army on a war footing; and the difficulty of finding non commissioned officers is increasing every day. Owing to the growing distaste for military service, and the general prosperity of the country, it is found impossible to tempt men to remain long content with the position of sergeant. The want is exaggerated by the French system of promoting a large percentage of sergeants to the higher ranks, by which all the best men are taken away from the discharge of humble but most necessary duties. It is obvious that the first remedy to be tried should be an increase of pay; but the Ministry, under severe pressure from its supporters, has preferred another and very French method. By the existing military law, which was copied from the Germans, young men who have received a certain degree of education, and who can afford to pay a sum of money, are allowed to serve for one year only. This has struck the severe Republican virtue of M. FERRY'S majority as an odious social privilege, a thing to be abolished. The new Bill, therefore, makes military service obligatory for three years, and declares all exemptions illegal. In this way it is hoped that educated men who find themselves doomed to three years in the ranks will be driven into filling the positions of sergeant and corporal, and the French army will be amply supplied with intelligent non-commissioned officers. The specious air of impartial justice in the measure covers its real iniquity. No importance is allowed to the contention that three years' service represents very different things to a lawyer or a man of business and to a vine dresser. The majority has shut its eyes to the obvious fact that France cannot support all the men who will be called out under the provisions of this Bill. It winks at the equally obvious truth that some exemptions will be necessary, and that they will be given underhand if they cannot be given openly. The protests of commercial bodies and the learned professions are set aside as claims for a privilege, and the clause making the three years' service obligatory has been voted. It will establish a system which cannot work, and has sacrificed the French army to a pedantic theory of social equality. Meanwhile, the consciences of the Deputies are clear. They have once more declared all men equal on paper.

The Revision Bill has this much in common with the Army Bill, that it also is to a large extent a matter of sentiment. To a foreigner there does not seem to be any reason why the Constitution should be revised at all, and many why it should be left as it is. It prevents nobody in France from having his say, and it certainly does not leave the Government unduly weak. To revise it merely because it was drawn up by Monarchical party leaders who hoped to use it for the defeat of the Republican party seems the merest pedantry, if it is not small personal spite. It is, however, the origin of the Constitution rather than its form which displeases the Republicans of the moderate party who are now in power. They are not content to know that the dangerous game played by the Duc de BROGLIE and his friends proved, as it deserved to prove, a complete failure. They will not be content till they live under a Constitution made by themselves. Apparently, however, they will be content with changing as little as possible. M. FERRY'S revision is the work of men who feel they must do something because they have talked themselves into it. He is thoroughgoing in one thing only. Public prayers are to be abolished sans phrase. The rest of the revision deals with the French institution which comes next in weakness after the Church. The powers and the form of the Senate are to be pared and pruned. Life Senators are no longer to be elected, although those who are already elected are to remain in enjoyment of their privilege. In the future, too, the communes will have votes for the election of Senators in proportion to their size. The Senate's power of amending money Bills sent up from the Chamber of Deputies is to be restricted. In short, it is less a revision of the Constitution than a revision of the Senate that seems necessary to M. FERRY. At the bottom of his heart he thinks, to judge from the Bill as far as it is yet known, that nothing need be done at all; but he is bound by his own words, and the promises made by his party when it was in Opposition and needed a cry. It is characteristic of French politics that the Revision Bill starts with a declaration that the Republic is immortal. A Bill of this kind is manifestly not calculated to please the extreme Republican party, and that is without peradventure the best thing that can be said in its favour. It was scarcely worth while revising at all if so little needed change; but changes are sometimes imposed by the necessities of parties, and then it is wise to do as little as possible. M. FERRY probably has good reason to know that there is no Conservative party to fight for the Constitution in its present accidental form.

CRICKET.

THE match between M.C.C. and the Australians is now matter of ancient history. One or two remarks, however, may be offered on an event which, though ancient, is not the less historical. In the first place, the Club were extremely fortunate to have the first innings on a wicket far more perfect than most things in a universe which is far from being complete or equal to our desires. Again, the Club was lucky in the decision of the umpire, who gave Mr. GRACE not out (on an appeal for stumping) when he had made only about a dozen runs. The bowler was Mr. COOPER, who tosses an extremely slow ball, that gets up and gets in very rapidly from leg; and Mr. GRACE did not at first seem at home with his deliveries. Mr. COOPER bowls almost exactly like Mr. CRAIG, who puzzled the Colonists a good deal at Edinburgh two years ago. After that let off, we only observed one apparent chance given by Mr. GRACE, a hard one to the bowler. He took the edge off the Australians' bowling, and the spirit out of it, wherein he was aided by Mr. STEEL. Out of practice as he probably was, Mr. STEEL played as well as we have ever seen him do, and it is impossible to beat his best. BARNES'S century was also got in his best manner; he is an exemplary bat when he has confidence. The best Australian bowler was Mr. SPOFFORTH, who never tired or grew indifferent. The fielding was far better than that of the English team. The innovation of leaving the ground in a body, during play, for refreshments was to be regretted, though palliated by the extreme heat of the weather and length of the innings. The cricket in the two Australian innings partook of the nature of skittles. BANNERMAN, Mr. MURDOCH, and, in the second innings, Mr. SPOFFORTH played cricket. Several of the others apparently went in to hit at everything, and seemed to have made up their minds to lose the match. Mr. McDonnell did, indeed, hit over the Pavilion and out of the ground in all directions. Quite undaunted by his wonderful swiping, Mr. I. D. Walker kept on Mr. C. T. Studd, in spite of many missed catches. Mr. Grace had a bad hand; but that was a reason for not putting him out for catches in the long-field. The high wind also made "skyers" difficult to judge, and Mr. O'Brien let one chance fall behind his head, though he held another admirably. Mr. C. T. Studd showed much judgment in a catch at cover-point, where the fielding of Mr. Steel was an example to all. Never before, perhaps, in such a match did a man give four chances in three consecutive balls, get missed thrice, and caught the fourth time of asking. This feat, which appears impossible, was performed by the batsman being let off in the long-field, at point, at wickets, while the ball was held by slip after it had bounded from the hand of the wicket-keeper. It was a great pity that Midwinter could not play; in fact, the Australians had all the worst of the luck.

The cricket at Birmingham scarcely counts, and a grassless wicket caused a scratch team to be disposed of for 82 and 26, while the Australians had much difficulty even then in winning. Mr. Christopherson's bowling has won him a place in the Eleven of Gentlemen who play the Australians at Lord's. But at Lord's there is grass on the wickets.

At the Universities, Cambridge has shown a lack of bowling in the match with Yorkshire, which scored three centuries in one innings. The batting, too, did not reveal very much promise. At Oxford Mr. Hine Haycock played a very long and faultless innings for Perambulators (men from the six public schools) against Et Ceteras. Mr. Whitby, who bowled so successfully against the Australians, quite failed against the Perambulators. On a very good wicket he appears to lose his sting, and he ought certainly not to be hacked about bowling in college matches. A swift bowler, especially when very young, should not take too much out of himself.

In the match between Australians and Gentlemen of England, at Lord's, one Eleven is not representative. Mr. Lucas is not playing, nor Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, nor another excellent bat and wicket-keeper, Mr. Kemp, who has again scored so freely for Oxford. Mr. Christopherson, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Bush, none of them batsmen, are in to bowl and keep wicket; while Mr. Forbes, Mr. Evans, and Mr. Rotherham are absent, and Mr. O'Brien is pursuing his studies in collegiate cloisters. In the first innings Mr. Grace and Lord Harris played well; Mr. Ridley still better, when he overcame his horror at Mr. Giffen's deliveries; and Mr. Vernon, as usual this year, was in great force. The bowlers played bowler's innings, except Mr. Steel. Australia made a bad beginning before their wicket-keeper began to hit. On the whole, the match, as far as it has gone at the time we write, shows the strength of amateur batting and the feebleness of amateur fast bowling.

THE PARK RAILWAY SCHEME.

THE Report from the Select Committee on the "Park Railway and Parliament Street Improvement Bill" was presented to the House at the beginning of the week. It is of the mildest and most inconclusive character, and we are not surprised to hear that the promoters of the scheme intend to try again next year. The Committee refuse to sanction the Bill for various reasons, but, on the whole, admit its principle. The wording of the Report is very vague and even obscure, but, so far as we can gather from it, the question of ventilation was considered the most serious one, and that of "a physical junction or an interchange "station" as next in importance. The Committee did not consider it "within their province" to offer any opinion as to the limits within which the principle of connecting a public improvement with a concession to a railway should be confined. This is a pity; the point is one on which such a Committee might have spoken strongly; and they would assured have had public opinion with them if they had expressly condemned the mischievous practice of allowing the employés of a Government department to meddle with the schemes of engineers and the professional promoters of Companies. They appear, however, to have had more than a suspicion as to the designs of the Great Western Company to which we adverted last week. Some of the witnesses "clearly "contemplated the use by the Great Western Railway of "the proposed terminus" at Westminster; and the Report draws attention, therefore, to the recommendations of an earlier Committee—that of the House of Lords in 1863—in which it is expressly stated to be undesirable that the main stations of the principal long lines of railway should be brought further into London, while it was suggested that new lines should be constructed "for carrying pas-"sengers from different parts of London to the main "stations of the long lines," and that these shorter lines should not be in the hands of the great Companies.

The question of junctions is much insisted upon. Sir Edward Watkin promised, if this Bill was passed, to apply for leave to make a junction with the District Railway when the District Railway had obtained leave to double its line. If the District Railway did not obtain this leave before 1886, then Sir Edward undertook that a junction should be made between the Westminster terminus and the Thames Embankment by means of a subway. This very disjunctive and hypothetical proposition does not satisfy the Committee, who are of opinion that the obligation on the District Railway to double its line "would be of so "onerous a nature as to be practically prohibitive"; that a physical junction with the inner line would be attended with delay and inconvenience, if not with danger; that an interchange station would be best, but that a subway of the nature and length proposed would not answer. They further observed that a physical junction would involve a diversion of the line, and would interfere with the proposed arrangements between the First Commissioner of Works and the Railway Company. Put into plain English, this seems to mean that, though Sir E. Watkin was at first willing and happy to accede to the views of the First Commissioner and his subordinate, he was quite as willing and happy to throw them overboard when he had got all he could out of them. So far, then, it is clear that the Committee refused to sanction (1) the intrusion of the Great Western; (2) the widening of the District Line; and (3) the junction of the District Line and the Parks Line. On the other hand, the Committee made no difficulty as to the introduction of the line into the Parks, conceiving this to be the province of the First Commissioner, which it undoubtedly is. But it does not seem to have occurred to the Committee that, when the First Commissioner fails to fulfil his duty in this respect, it was quite within their province to say so. The First Commissioner should not "in his province" have sanctioned the scheme, and the failure to point this out otherwise than by suggestion or implication is a very unsatisfactory feature of the Report.

With regard to the ventilating shafts the Report is scarcely more explicit. "Your Committee," it says, "do "not feel in a position to express any very decided opinion." The system of ventilating the tunnels as explained by the promoters was wholly and admittedly experimental only. Widely different views were expressed by the practical men examined, and a doubt clouded the minds of the Committee as to "whether the cost of working such ventilation "effectively would not be exceedingly heavy in proportion "to the traffic of the line." Several witnesses expressed their opinion that in a few years the Railway Company would apply "for power to make openings or 'blowholes' "in the Parks, an application which it might be difficult to "resist." There was an equal diversity of testimony as to the effect which would be produced by the ventilating shafts "and as to whether in certain states of the atmosphere "considerable nuisance might not be experienced from the "concentration at three points only of vitiated air proceed-"ing from tunnels of such length, on lines worked under "the conditions proposed." The Report is evidently an attempt to reconcile divergent views; for, after the above sentence, comes this one, which to the ordinary reader will appear wholly inconsistent with it:—"It is fair to state "that in our view such inconvenience has been greatly "overrated by many of the witnesses."

The last paragraph of the Report is, perhaps, the least satisfactory of all. The absence of any demand on the part of the public for such a railway, and the very outspoken opposition to the scheme which was revealed by those persons most to be affected by it, are passed over in a brief clause of a longer sentence, and are only used, so to speak, to round a period. They think a railway through the Parks is not, in itself, a very objectionable thing; but they think permission to make one should only be granted "when a public want of such communication has been "clearly proved. In this instance, beyond the undis-

"puted assertion that new lines create new traffic, little "or no direct evidence of any such want was brought "forward." This is by no means strong enough. There is not a word as to the opposition to the scheme which was offered by the inhabitants of Edgware Road and its vicinity. The principle conceded is a most dangerous one, and will undoubtedly be taken advantage of by Sir EDWARD WATKIN and his supporters. Unless a very much more decided report appears on the next occasion that the scheme crops up, we shall unquestionably have a railway across the Parks. The people locally affected, both in Edgware Road and at Westminster, should occupy the respite granted them in organizing a vigorous opposition, and should leave no stone unturned to defeat the scheme. Sir EDWARD WATKIN is a very determined antagonist. His conduct in the matter of the Channel Tunnel shows that even Parliament cannot always restrain him; but forewarned is forearmed, and if the next application succeeds, it will be the fault, not of the present vacillating Report only, but also of those who should have showed a more decided face and made a more determined stand.

RUSSIA AT SARAKHS.

AS usually happens nowadays on the arrival of one of the Parliamentary vacations, the Government have gone away for their holidays, leaving as many as possible of the questions which they alone have, or ought to have, the means of answering unanswered. To do them justice, however, we must admit the probability that it is only in respect to a certain number of these inquiries that they are wilfully withholding information. There is not much doubt that they could have told the House of Commons a good deal more about the negotiations for the Conference, if they had chosen to do so. No one supposes that there is any lack of matter to be communicated, if there had been the will to communicate it, or that its disclosure could possibly have embarrassed or compromised any European Cabinet but our own. When Ministers declare that there is "no "precedent" for having this, that, or the other detail of the Anglo-French "colloquings" before Parliament, they do not mean much more than is meant by the judge who reminds us that there is no rule of English law which compels any man to criminate himself. Their reticence in such matters as these is well known to be deliberate enough; but it is not so with all the questions which are at present exciting public curiosity. The Ministerial reason for not informing us exactly of what is going on in Egypt is simply Dr. JOHNSON'S reason for having misdefined one of the words in his Dictionary—"Ignorance, madam; pure ignorance." And it is almost as candidly confessed. Lord GRANVILLE and Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE cannot tell us the precise truth about Russia and Sarakhs, because they really do not know it; and the second of these two Ministers cannot tell us, to a country, where the Russian flag is flying at this moment in these regions, on the same all-sufficient ground. For there are two Sarakhs, look you, on opposite sides of the same river—to wit, Old and New Sarakhs; and, while one of these Sarakhs is undoubtedly in Persian territory, the other, according to Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE, may or may not be Persian. The position, consequently, of the English Foreign Office is this—that Russia has either certainly obtained a foothold in the territory of the SHAH, or has perhaps done so; and in that attitude, apparently, the mind of the UNDER-SECRETARY contentedly reposes, as there are some men who might be backed to sleep even on a bicycle. It would be too much, no doubt, to expect that the officials of our Foreign Office should endeavour to ascertain the precise facts of the matter by inquiry either at St. Petersburg or Teheran; but where, we would ask, is the Secretary of the Geographical Society? Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE has not hesitated on previous occasions, at the call of duty, to supplement the deficiencies of Whitehall maps by reference to this authority, and it is to be hoped that the unthinking mirth which his last appeal of this kind excited in a frivolous House of Commons has not deterred him from again resorting to the same instructor.

It would, at any rate, be advisable that he should employ the recess in filling the gap in the Foreign Office geography at so important a point as this. One of the old-fashioned "holiday tasks," upon what used to be called the "utrum" and "necne" formula, might with advantage be set to him during the coming week. In place of a dissertation on the theme "Did CÆSAR "act rightly in crossing the Rubicon, or did he not?" Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE might be requested to bring back with him to the House of Commons next Thursday a more or less carefully prepared essay on the question whether Russia has or has not crossed the Perso-Afghan river-boundary, and established herself at a point from which she will be able, with indefinitely greater ease than before, to threaten India through Afghanistan? Is it or is it not the fact that she has grasped a position which, while it enables her to overawe and to control the action of Persia, at the same time renders her practically independent of the connivance of that Power in an Indian campaign? Is it, in short, or is it not the fact that the occupation of Sarakhs by Russia has wholly, or almost wholly, abolished the zone of territory which had hitherto separated the Trans-Caspian railway from the frontier of Afghanistan, and has given Russia a direct, an easily passable, and for the most part a well-supplied road from the Caspian to the Afghan frontier? These are cases of "utrum" and "necne" in which this country must be admitted to take something more than an academic interest; and we confess that we would rather hear Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE'S elucidation of the facts than Mr. CROSS'S comments upon them before he knows, any more than we do, what they are. The UNDER-SECRETARY for INDIA had nothing apparently to tell his Lancashire audience last Thursday as to the actual position of Russia. He was, however, himself in a position to assure them that there was nothing to be disturbed about; that between us and Russia "there was a considerable country, "the country of Afghanistan"; that we were on "terms of "strict alliance with the AMEER of that country," and had given him a promise of support against unprovoked attack (which of course is a complete safeguard against his being "squared"); and that, this being so, the British public need not, any more than the holder of a promissory note signed "WILKINS MICAWBER," be under any apprehension whatever. Such grindings of the official tune, however, absolutely unvaried as is their form—for Mr. CROSS is far too unimaginative as well as too conscientious a performer to attempt improvisation on the barrel organ—have become a weariness to the ear. One may be pardoned not only for not criticizing, but for not even listening to, them. Their first note, in fact, is enough. We know what to expect when an official apologist begins by saying that "There surely is room enough in Asia for both Russia and "England." So there surely is in the House of Commons for both the Opposition and the Government. If both parties would only be equally content with their present position, there is nothing whatever in the laws of space and extension which would make it necessary for one of them to endeavour to displace the other.

Mr. CROSS, however, is only like most other of our prophets of smooth things in these days. It is one of the most ominous signs of the situation that these fair-spoken counsellors are being driven more and more into exclusive reliance upon generalities, and show a growing reluctance to grapple with facts. The veiled pundit, for instance, who undertakes to instruct us on "England's "Foreign Policy" in the new number of the Fortnightly Review displays a truly astonishing dexterity in discussing the concrete in exclusive terms of the abstract. In its extraordinarily skilful avoidance of almost every fact, phrase, and even word which it would have been thought impossible for the writer to exclude from his remarks, his article almost resembles one of those feats of composition for which "Society journals" offer a prize. As an exercise of ingenuity it is interesting; but any one who can extract from it a single sentence of definite, helpful counsel will be more fortunate than ourselves. An adviser who recommends us as the two cardinal objects of our policy to "disarm the hostility of Russia" and to arrive at "an amicable understanding with France," and who contrives in doing so to avoid the use of the words "Merv," "Sarakhs," and even "Afghanistan," in the one case, and of the words "Dual Control," or their equivalents, in the other, might carry off the guinea prize in many a weekly competition. Considering, however, that the first step towards disarming the hostility of Russia must surely be to ascertain whether the point of her weapon is or is not at our breasts already; considering that the "amicable "understanding" with France must at least await the settlement of our renewed and more obstinate struggle for supremacy in Egypt; and considering that upon both these points "G" has not a word to say, it must be admitted that, whatever his prowess as a "solver," as a counsellor he leaves much to be desired.

BASEBALL.

So far as outdoor sports are concerned, the true American has very little heart for anything but baseball. In the cold weather, when the game cannot be played, he turns his attention, in a lesser degree, to football; but even in this, as Mr. Hamerton might put it, he preserves the baseball frame of mind. There are a few Americans who play cricket, but they are not numerous enough to deserve more than a passing mention, for investigation always discloses the fact that most of them were born in England. Rowing is deservedly popular, but attracts much less attention; and in the colleges many of the boating men also handle the base-ball. Yachting has great favour among the wealthier classes; but the most devoted yachtsman of them all admires the national game, often goes to see it, and not infrequently is a good player himself. Every one who has any taste for outdoor sports loves the national game, and the visitor to America in the summer time would certainly be led to paraphrase Addison, and exclaim, "Good heavens! even the little children here play baseball!" The enormous popularity of this pastime can hardly be comprehended here. A final game between the Boston and Chicago clubs for the League championship, or the deciding contest of the College championship series, usually a desperate struggle between Princeton and Yale, is sure to draw out twenty thousand enthusiastic spectators, every one of whom can appreciate all the delicate points of play in this intricate game. It is to-day the only field sport which can draw so large an audience without the aid of betting and pool-selling.

It must be admitted that the game of baseball is not easy to learn. The American boy grows up with it, and it becomes a part of his existence. But the American girl, who likes to see the hard hitting, the running, and the fielding, spends many a long day under her escort's kind tuition before she begins to comprehend the spirit of the game. The Englishman has naturally even a worse chance of learning the game, yet, with his innate love for all that is muscular and manly, he wants to know what it is. If he visits America and does not like to betray ignorance, he always pretends to know something about the sport, and usually ends by proclaiming his belief that it is nothing more or less than the good old game of rounders. The truth is that, while it sprang from rounders, it has in the past twenty-five years developed into a great deal more—and less. Every year since professional ball-playing came into vogue in America the rules have been elaborated. Each season's experience has shown weak spots in the permissible methods of play, and these have been strengthened by new rules. Now the League-book contains seventy-two rules, some of which are subdivided into as many as fourteen sections. The rules are divided into eight classes, covering the materials of the game—field rules (treating of betting, selling of liquors, &c.), the players and their positions, definitions ("high ball," "low ball," "fair ball," &c.), the game, umpires, scoring, and construction and amendments.

Let us see, then, what this game is and how it is played. A good ground can be laid out on a piece of well-trimmed turf, 400 feet long by 300 broad, though the American grounds are much larger in order to admit spectators. Ninety feet out from the fence is the home base. Directly in front of this, 127 feet distant, is the second base. First base is 90 feet distant diagonally to the right, and third base in a similar position to the left. The four bases are placed so as to form a perfect diamond, first and third bases being the same distance apart as home and second. It is 90 feet from home to first, from first to second, second to third, and third to home. A line is distinctly marked with lime between each two bases, and along this line the player goes when making a run. Directly in front of the home base, 50 feet distant, is the pitcher's position, 4 feet wide by 6 feet long. It is marked out with lime, and the pitcher may stand anywhere within the lines when delivering the ball. The home base consists of a marble or iron plate, sunk to a level with the surface of the ground, and securely fastened. The other three bases are canvas bags, 15 inches square, filled with sand or sawdust, and fastened by straps to short stakes firmly driven into the earth. Positions for the batsmen are marked out on either side of the home base, for the accommodation of right- or left-handed strikers. They are 6 feet long, 3 feet wide, and 1 foot away from the base. The field should be in the same condition as for cricket.

Nine men on each side are required to play the game. They are assigned to the following positions—pitcher, catcher, first, second, and third basemen, short stop, left, centre, and right fielders. The catcher plays behind the home base, and returns the ball to the pitcher after the latter has delivered it. The pitcher's position has been defined. His duty is to deliver the ball for the batsmen to strike at, and, just as in cricket, his object is to deceive the striker as much as possible and make him strike at dangerous balls instead of easy ones. The first baseman covers his base and a portion of the field adjoining. The second baseman, in addition to his base, has to cover most of the in-field between first and second. The in-field, be it understood, is that portion inclosed within the lines running from one base to another. It is also called the diamond. Third baseman covers his base and a small portion of the in-field. The short-stop covers most of the field between second and third. This extra man in the in-field becomes necessary because, from the position of the batsmen, players hit the majority of the balls to that side of the field. Three fielders cover the out-field, or all that portion beyond the diamond. The left fielder plays behind the short stop, at a considerable distance, the centre fielder behind the second baseman, and the right fielder nearly behind first base. We are now ready for the game, except—two very important things—the ball and the bat. The ball is made of yarn wrapped around a small sphere of solid rubber, the whole covered with white leather. The bat is made of ash or willow, round and diminishing in thickness from the outer end to the handle. The rules declare that the ball must weigh not more than 5¼ ounces, nor less than 5, and must be not more than 9¼ inches in circumference, nor less than 9. The bat must not be longer than 42 inches, nor more than 2½ in diameter at its thickest part.

The game of baseball is played in nine innings, and of course the victory goes to the side making the most runs. A run is a complete circuit of the bases, from home to first, thence to second, thence to third, and back home. The runner need not run further than from one base to the next at a time, though he may go all the way round if he can. The striker is allowed to make three strikes at the ball, only being required to strike at good balls. A bad ball is called a "ball," and counts against the pitcher, seven of them delivered to one batsman entitling that man to take first base. If the batsman does not strike at a good ball, the umpire calls a strike against him just as if he had struck at it. When three strikes have been made, the player must run to first base. If, however, the catcher holds the ball struck at the third time on the fly or the first bound, the striker is out. If the catcher does not hold the ball, he must throw it to the first base-man. If that player catches and holds it, while touching his base with any part of his person, before the striker reaches the base, the striker is out. All these possibilities occur when the ball has not been hit. If it is hit, it becomes at once either a fair or a foul ball. A fair ball, not to enter into the delicacies of the rules, is one which is driven forward inside the lines leading to first and third bases. Flags, called foul flags, are placed well out in the field on the continuation of these lines beyond the bases, so that in case of a long hit the umpire can at once tell whether the ball is fair or foul. A foul ball, naturally, is one which goes outside or behind the lines mentioned. The striker may not run on a foul ball. The only kind of hit that counts in baseball is a forward drive, though the ball may be cut slightly to one side without going behind the foul lines. Though the striker may not run on a foul, he may be put out by its being caught on the fly. If he hits a fair ball, he must at once run to first. If the ball is hit sharply along the ground, it is nearly always stopped by one of the in-fielders, who at once throws it to first base, just as the catcher does in the case of a third stroke. If the striker fails to reach first base before the baseman has the ball, he is out, as before described. If successful in reaching the base, he must run to second at the first chance, and so on round till he reaches home again. He may be put out after once reaching first base by being touched with the ball when not having his foot on some one of the bases. A fair ball caught on the fly, of course, puts the striker out, and no person who may be going round the bases at the time may run on a fly catch. Neither may any player on a base run on a foul ball. Long high hits are usually caught by the out-fielders. The safest kind of hits in baseball are hard low hits, which go over the heads of the in-fielders and fall short of the fielders. As soon as one striker has gone to first base, the next one steps up to his position. Three men on each side must be put out to close the innings. Twenty-seven men are put out in a nine-innings game. If at the end of nine innings the scores of the two sides are even, they must play on till one side or the other gets a lead, which finishes the game.

It will be easily comprehended that the better the play in this game, the fewer are the runs. With thoroughly effective pitching, catching, and fielding, it is rarely that many runs are made. The scores of some well-played games in the season of 1882, the brightest in baseball annals, show the average:—

October 7, Chicago v. Cincinnati	2 to 0
April 10, Detroit v. Eclipse	4 to 3
April 17, Cleveland v. Cincinnati (11 innings)	7 to 4
May 10, Yale v. Brown	4 to 2
June 24, Princeton v. Yale	8 to 7

The model game of ball, so far as runs are concerned, would be won by a score of 1 to 0. In one of the games of 1883 this score was made in a game of 15 innings.

This gives, we believe, in the briefest possible space, an outline of the pastime. We have purposely avoided touching upon any of the finer points, as they would only serve to confuse the reader. There is a small army of rules covering the pitching, which any old cricket-player can at once see is the chief point in the game. Most of these relate to the delivery of the ball, though this year much greater latitude is to be allowed, so that a man may throw a ball in pretty nearly any way he likes. If the pitcher makes a movement as if to deliver the ball and does not do so, a "foul ball" is called by the umpire, and all runners on bases are entitled to advance one base without being put out. Three "foul balls" forfeit a game. The pitcher in a game of baseball must be a man of nerve and intelligence. He must use his head, just as a good bowler does, studying the peculiarities of each striker, and endeavouring by varying the methods of his delivery to deceive the batsman, and make him strike at poor balls. At the same time he must watch any runners who may have reached or passed first base, and endeavour to avoid giving them any opportunity to make a base. Again, he is directly in front of the batsman and close to him, so that he frequently has to face balls hit straight at him with force enough to send them to the other end of the field.

Coolness, pluck, and never-failing presence of mind are the requisites of every good ball-player, but of the pitcher most of all. Good pitchers can deliver a ball with great speed or very slowly with apparently the same movement of the arm. They have learned a twist which causes the ball to take a laterally curved course likely to deceive all batsmen of small experience. They can send a ball from a low point of delivery so that it will rise, or from a high point so that it will fall, without diminishing its speed. By a judicious alternation of these different tricks, they render it difficult for a batsman to make a good hit. Next to the pitcher in importance comes the catcher. The difficulty of his work consists in this:—when the striker has made two strikes, or when he has reached first base, the catcher must stand up close behind the batsman, and catch the balls on the fly. In the case of a third strike good players never risk taking it on the bound, for a great twist or an uneven bit of ground may cause it to bound out of his reach, and thus give the striker his first base. After a man has reached first base, the catcher must "play up," as it is called, in order to return the ball quickly to the pitcher with a view to prevent the runner from making a base while the ball is going from pitcher to catcher and back again. The catcher must have hard hands—for gloves afford small protection—a quick eye, and must be a sure and swift thrower. The basemen and short stop must all be good hands at stopping swift grounders, and catching sharp line hits, high short flies, and swiftly thrown balls, and must all be good throwers. The fielders must be sure catchers of long-fly balls, either running or standing, and powerful throwers. The fielding in a game of baseball would probably impress an Englishman unacquainted with the game more than anything else. The most swiftly hit ball, if it goes anywhere within the reach of an American in-fielder, is almost certain to be stopped. It will then be thrown to the proper base with such speed and accuracy that it will describe an absolutely straight line as it passes through the air. To see a catcher throw accurately to second base, fully 135 feet from where he stands, is a very pretty sight; and a catcher who cannot do this is sure to be out of employment very quickly. The third baseman has the greatest number of long throws to make in a game, and must be a good general player. To watch a good game of baseball is to see a good exhibition of strength, activity, nerve, and decision. There are so many combinations of circumstances in the game which require sudden and radical changes in the methods of play that it is no exaggeration to say that a ball-player must have wits in every part of his body. Even to one who knows little about it, the game is a pretty sight. The closely-cropped green turf, marked over with the white lines, the pretty silk foul flags waving on each side, the picturesque costumes, the bustle of intelligently directed activity that follows every hit, and the enthusiasm of the assemblage of spectators combine to form a really stirring picture. The usual costume for the game consists of a flannel shirt, with a shield on the breast bearing the name of the club, or its initial letter, flannel knee-breeches, woven hose, cricketing shoes, and a flannel cap or hat. Each club has its own uniform. The chief mark of distinction is the stockings, every club having its own colour or pattern. This was carried to such an extent at one time that the various clubs were known by the colour of their hose, the Boston men being called the "Red Stockings," the Chicago club the "White Stockings," and other clubs the "Blue Stockings," "Brown Stockings," and so on through a whole artist's catalogue.

The extent of professional baseball-playing in the United States is great. Every prominent city has its club, and some have two. There are, in round numbers, four hundred men who earn their living by this popular game. They are well paid, moreover. A good pitcher gets 600*l.* per year. Catchers, base-men, and short-stops receive from 400*l.* up. Fielders earn from 240*l.* to 400*l.* There are three important associations of professional baseball clubs known as the National League, the American Association, and the North-Western League. The leading clubs of the National are the Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Detroit, New York, Philadelphia, and Providence; of the American—the Alleghany, Athletics, Baltimore, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Metropolitan (of New York); of the North-Western—the Bay City, Fort Wayne, Grand Rapids, Quincy, and Springfield. These associations control all matters relating to the eligibility of players, the contests for the championship, and the rules of the game. Each organization has its own set of rules, which are amended according to necessity during the winter. Each has its regular championship series of games for handsome trophies, which are held by the winning club until the following season, when they are again contested for. The season begins on April 1, and terminates on October 31. The men are then put under the care of a trainer, and kept at gymnasium work and outdoor athletic training all winter. Club-swinging and throwing at a mark are important parts of their exercise. Full records of their work at the bat and in the field are kept throughout the season, and at its close averages are struck which have an important bearing on the player's salary for the next season. A club very seldom succeeds in keeping the same nine men together for more than one season, as bidding for good players is spirited. Improper conduct of any kind renders a player liable to expulsion from the League. If expelled, no club in the League may again employ him. The skill which is attained by the American professional baseball player is little short of marvellous. Some of them have been in the business for more than twenty years, and at more than forty years of age are still agile as cats—a fact which speaks much for the physical value of their training.

Amateur baseball clubs are practically innumerable in the United States. Every village of 3,000 inhabitants has at least one, and frequently two. The skill of the amateur players ranges all the way from the worst that is possible up to a level almost, if not quite, equal to that of the professionals. Every little boy who has a spark of animation in him begins to play at the game as soon as he can hold a ball in his hands; and it is no uncommon thing to see the game very respectably played by boys of from twelve to fourteen years of age. The city of Brooklyn has the largest number of amateur clubs. This is owing to the fact that the city provides them with a magnificent ground—a perfectly level, smooth, and close-cropped piece of turf, half a mile long by a quarter of a mile wide, known as Prospect Park Playgrounds. Here on a Saturday afternoon in summer a dozen baseball matches and half a dozen cricket matches can be seen in progress at once.

The best amateur clubs in the country are the College organizations. Yale University has had the finest nine for several years, with Princeton a close and exceedingly troublesome second. There is a League of college clubs known as the American College Baseball Association. Its members are Amherst, Brown, Harvard, Princeton, and Yale. A regular series of matches for the College championship is played every year, and each game is attended by an enormous audience. The final game is nearly always between Princeton and Yale on the Polo Grounds at New York, and is always witnessed by from 20,000 to 25,000 people. The College coaches, gaily decked with colours and provided with strong-lunged guards, add colour and noise to the scene. The College clubs play often against the professionals, and always make a good struggle; and it is not unusual for the College team to win such a match.

"THE STAKE IS TOO GREAT, SIR."

WHEN we are appointed to that Chair of Moral Philosophy we shall take as a thesis for our first prælection the position "that the virtues called gratitude and philanthropy are possessed in perfection only by the people called cynics." Among the amiable and virtuous of this world examples of ingratitude and dislike of their species are but too frequent. Even Mr. Gladstone, the best of men, used sometimes to speak of the late Lord Beaconsfield as if he did not altogether like him, and Mr. Bright (who, to adopt the phraseology of Southey's glover, is almost better than the best of men) sometimes speaks with less than warmth, at least affectionate warmth, of Tories. Dr. Parker, another pattern good man, does not like bishops, and, in short, we might go on ad tedium. Now the cynic likes everybody who is ridiculous—that is to say, almost everybody who is human—and does not dislike those who are not. When he puts his hand in the pie of human folly, and, as he can rarely fail to do, draws out a plum, he does not say, like that pharisaical Jack, "What a good boy am I!" he says, "What a nice plum this is!" and "How kind of it it is to be so nice!" He can never be unhappy till the supply of fools runs short, and if he is of the right breed he can never be cross with his fool. The fools pass and other fools succeed, but they are green (very green) in the grateful memory of the true humourist who has once enjoyed them.

The first comers in the lucky bag of the present week are Mr. Auberon Herbert, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. J. B. Firth, and, above all, Mr. Walter J. Stanton, a member of Parliament of no very widespread fame, who has written an immortal letter to the Daily News, and furnished a title to this article. Of Mr. Auberon Herbert we shall not say much. It would appear that he is in the stage of convalescence from the political malady that has long weighed on him, and it is always well to be tender to convalescents. His affectionate wrestlings with the Bradford Caucus and the defenders of the Bradford Caucus are, indeed, sufficiently comic; and the genuine surprise with which he discovers that New Radical is only Old Tory writ large in all the worst senses of Old Toryism, and not in any of the good ones, has a certain simplicity about it which is mighty refreshing. Why it should have taken Mr. Herbert so long to find out what many people doubtless not Mr. Herbert's superiors in natural abilities have known all along, and why Mr. Herbert should take the trouble to read parables not destitute of some literary elegance to the crass stupidity and the more crass dishonesty of Caucusdom, are indeed curious problems. But Mr. Herbert has always been conspicuous for a certain childlike habit of taking things very seriously, and it is just possible that he takes Caucus-mongers for honest men—a noble and memorable exaggeration of the most chivalrous and wildest delusions of Don Quixote. Mr. Herbert, however, is chiefly interesting to us, in so much as he has begotten (spiritually speaking) Mr. Stanton, and thereby given us the title and the staple of our article. Neither with Mr. Firth do we purpose to deal longer than a Chicago pigman deals with a Chicago pig. The simple mention of the simple fact that Mr. Firth has been writing to all the papers threatening to make the opponents of the London Government Bill pay the expenses of their opposition in propriâ persona when the Firthian Municipality reigns, and that Mr. Firth evidently thinks this sort of thing likely to advance his cause, is quite sufficient. A certain bear story is something musty, but the heroes of that story did not endeavour to induce the bear to come down by threatening him with the elaborately painful manner in which they were going to skin him. Nor, to change the order of thought, is Mr. Firth's very astute colleague likely to approve the foretaste which Mr. Firth has here given of the methods of procedure of the new Municipality. But that is quite enough for Mr. Firth, who is evidently not acquainted with the history of Rehoboam.

Mr. Herbert Gladstone may detain Democritus a little longer. Mr. Herbert Gladstone has been talking about the House of Lords, and praying that "the fiery cross of agitation" may, in certain events, go forth against that wicked House. Mr. Herbert Gladstone's particular utterances were of no importance; they seldom are of any. But that very fact makes it very pleasant for the humourist to lean back in his chair and contemplate Mr. Herbert Gladstone attacking the House of Lords. The head and front of that House's offending in the view of Mr. Herbert Gladstone and his fellows is that its members enjoy their position and influence as sons of their fathers, and as nothing else. It is not true of the House of Lords, as it happens, but it is very remarkably true of Mr. Herbert Gladstone. If Mr. Herbert Gladstone were not his father's son, he might be an assistant-master at a public school, or a clerk in the City, or a curate, or a barrister with no very vivid prospects of briefs. Being his father's son, he is a member of Parliament; he has his speeches reported at considerable length, and he has repeated opportunities of showing how absolutely destitute of talent he is. His modest assurance and his perfect readiness to hear himself speak distinguish him, no doubt, from the herd of merely sheepish young persons. But his other distinctions come solely from the fact that he is his father's son. Which things being so, Mr. Herbert Gladstone is shocked that we have a House of Lords. It is painful to find this obvious obliquity of vision in one so young.

The minor butterflies duly fixed on their cork and admired, we come to Mr. Walter J. Stanton, a kind of Purple Emperor, who cannot be handled too lovingly or admired too much. Mr. Stanton finds fault with Mr. Herbert for finding fault with the Bradford Caucus, and delivers his thoughts on the subject. Now the great charm of Mr. Stanton is his complete ingenuousness. There is no need, there is no excuse, for attributing motives to him. He is not like the journalists who fall foul of other journalists for objecting to tricks with the marriage law because they have themselves taken up with a deceased wife's sister; like the dramatists who pick holes in Shakspeare because Mr. Irving fills the Lyceum better than their managers can fill other theatres with their plays; like the other dramatists who forget to inform the Pall Mall Gazette, among details of facture, as to the shop at which they buy their copies of Scribe and Labiche and Dennery; like the black-balled candidates for clubs who betray the secrets of the ballot-box by perpetually sneering at those clubs in print. Mr. Stanton is downright Dunstable, or shall we say straightforward Stroud? It appears to Mr. Stanton that "an independent representative is an anomaly." Other people may hold their backs and heads up, but Mr. Stanton is "a' for booin'." The Caucus, the genesis and constitution of which are pretty well known, is to Mr. Stanton "the accepted indicator of the views of the constituencies." But Mr. Stanton is not yet at his climax. "What would Mr. Herbert have?" he says; "Lord Salisbury, with an unknown policy on all vital questions?" "The stake, sir, is too great." And having made this delightful, this pyramidal confession that his view of his duty depends on the amount of the stake, Mr. Stanton observes sagely that "on Votes of Censure members of Parliament must take deep counsel with their consciences." He has already taken deep counsel with his, and its answer is "The stake, sir, is too great."

Now let us grant at once that Mr. Stanton has here made (or perhaps announced, for it has often been made privately before) one of the greatest moral discoveries of this or any age. "What is the criterion?" Our pastors and masters used to drone into our ears—"What is the test of conduct?" "How are we to know what we ought to do, and what we ought not?" How many million reams of paper have been blackened, how many lungsful of breath have been drawn and emptied, how many heads and hearts have ached in deliberation over such questions? At last the master-bowman, Mr. Stanton, of Stroud, has cloven the mark. Look, says Mr. Stanton, at the stake. Have you only been able to lay a few hundreds against your horse? By no manner of means give directions to pull him. Have you been successful in standing to win some thousands, a good many thousands? Who, if a sensible man, would then dream of not giving suitable directions to the intelligent jockey? "The stake, sir, is too great." It is impossible to conceive greater sternness than that with which (except in the case of players of very small fortune) a censor on Mr. Stanton's principles would deprecate intentional revoking at sixpenny points. "The stake, sir, is not great enough." But with ponies up, and the long odds both sides, in what Mr. Justice Hawkins delicately calls "the other animal," and plenty of casual bets scattered about and nobody looking over your hand, what fool would refuse to make the winning trick when he knew that his opponents would throw down their cards and all chance of detection be lost? "The stake, sir, is too great." You must take deep counsel with your conscience and ask it whether, on the whole, it is not better that good men like you and your partner, who will make the best possible use of it, should have all these monies rather than bad men with an unknown policy on all vital questions. And if your conscience is a healthy one, it will not, according to Mr. Stanton, have any difficulty in the matter. "The stake, sir, is too great." It is quite unnecessary to point out what a thoroughly comfortable doctrine this is. In the witness-box especially it makes all the rough places smooth, all the nasty little casuistical points that bother men invisible. Is the stake big enough or not big enough to warrant your swearing what you know not to be truth; giving as your opinion what you know is not your opinion? In some cases an exact parallel to Mr. Stanton's case appears between Carey Street and the Strand. A friend, one of the best of men, is charged with misconduct to a client or mismanagement of a patient. Your evidence is called for as to the propriety of the treatment. If you say what you think, misfortune will happen to the good fellow your friend, and profit will probably accrue to some ruffian of a rival whom you hate. "The stake, sir, is too great." You swear that in your opinion Smith's treatment has been all that it ought to be, when in your heart you not only think, but know, that Smith has bungled the case as a hospital dresser ought to have been ashamed to bungle it. The Rev. Mr. Stanton, S.J., assures you that you have done quite right. "The stake was far too great, sir," and it was out of the question to do harm to an excellent fellow, and perhaps do good to a pestilent rascal.

If Mr. Stanton thinks these applications rather ugly, if he would not (as no doubt he would not) run foul because "the stake is too great, sir," pop a harmless heart on a suit of clubs, of which he has plenty, to secure the long odds in "monkeys," or perjure himself in the witness-box to benefit a friend and keep a foe from benefit, what does he mean by his "Stake is too great, sir"? Mr. Forster was asked to vote that the Government had acted in a certain way; he refused; he is censured; Mr. Herbert protests against the censure, and Mr. Stanton protests against Mr. Herbert, not because Mr. Forster did not really follow his conscience, but because the stake being so great, the conscience ought to have held its tongue.

SIR BARTLE FRERE.

MR. THACKERAY once published something like a defence of what probably appeared to his fine taste the pomposity of having used the classic name of Proconsul to describe the great officers who have built up and ruled our Indian Empire. The indiscriminate use of Greek and Roman titles out of their proper places is almost uniformly a foolish pedantry; but in this case the exception to a good rule was fully justified. To find a parallel for the men who created our Indian Empire we must go back to the soldiers and statesmen who conquered the ancient world. The type, too, has been peculiarly English since the time of Dupleix and La Bourdonnais. In the space of less than a century and a half, the list of Englishmen and Scotchmen who have shown the highest qualities of statesmanship in the direction of the Indian government has grown so long and so illustrious that all Europe could not show another to match it. Sir Bartle Frere, although in his later years he was associated with other and less worthy scenes, will probably be best remembered because he won a high place on that roll of honour. He did not reach the highest rank. He will not stand by the side of Cornwallis and the Lawrences, but a man may do much less than they and yet do great things.
